

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. CASES

HOUSE OF LORDS,

ON APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

SHEEHY AND OTHERS v. MUSKERRY.

Jurisdiction. Rehearing. Enrolment. Practice.

A Bill was filed in Chancery in Ireland, impeaching leases and mortgages as not in due execution of powers in a settlement ; also impeaching, on various grounds, a decree of the Court of Exchequer, and a sale in pursuance thereof, of the mortgaged estates, subject to the leases. When the cause came to be heard the plaintiff's counsel informed the Court that no judgment would be required as between the plaintiff and mortgagees, an arrangement being in progress by which the mortgagees and purchaser under the Exchequer decree consented to a redemption of the estates, on payment by the plaintiff of a sum certain. The Lord Chancellor then heard counsel as to the validity of the leases, but conceiving that the consideration of the question as to the validity of the mortgages and sale was withdrawn by the arrangement, and that in the absence of the purchaser he had no jurisdiction to give a decision on the leases, he dismissed the bill as against the defendants claiming the benefit of them.

Held, by the Lords, on an appeal against a decree made on rehearing, which reversed the decree of dismissal, that it was open to the Lords to consider the merits of this decree, though not appealed from, and to declare that the arrangement, instead of withdrawing from the consideration of the Court the plaintiff's claim to relief against the mortgages and sale, was an admission of his right to that relief, that the decree of dismissal was therefore erroneous, and that it was competent to the Lord Chancellor, at the time of making that decree, to adjudicate between the plaintiff and the lessees as to the validity of the leases ; and the cause was remitted, with a declaration and direction to hear it on that question, and to decree, &c.

A bill seeking to set aside leases, and a sale subject to them, is not multifarious : semble.

Whether after sale of property subject to leases, the vendor is entitled to impeach the leases without setting aside the sale : quære.

* 2 * An order having been obtained for a rehearing, upon a motion to discharge it on the ground that the decree was enrolled, the Lord Chancellor ordered the enrolment to be opened, without any application to vacate it ; then reheard the cause, and decreed against the leases.

Held, that the orders and proceedings were irregular ; that although the opening of an enrolment is in the discretion of the Judge, with which a Court of Appeal would not interfere, still that discretion ought to be regulated by precedent and authority.¹

Upon a rehearing, a party is not bound by untrue recitals, inserted by mistake in the former decree ; nor by declining to take a case for the opinion of a Court of Law.

December 7, 8, 11, 12, 14, 18, 1837. June 11, 1839.

JOHN FITZMAURICE, being seised in fee of certain lands, called the Springfield estate, in the county of Limerick, charged with a legacy of 1000*l.* for his sister, by a settlement dated the 16th of January, 1732, and made upon his marriage with Anne O'Dell, conveyed that estate to trustees, to the use of himself for life, remainder to the first and every other son of the marriage, in tail male, with ultimate remainder to himself in fee ; and he reserved a power to charge 4000*l.* for younger children of the marriage. Anne died, leaving two children, John and Mary, the issue of the marriage ; and upon the marriage of Mary, in 1759, her father, by virtue of the power reserved in the settlement, charged the said estate with the sum of 4000*l.* and with the sum of 1000*l.* (the legacy charged for his sister, which he had paid off), and conveyed the estate to trustees for a term of 200 years, upon trust to raise the 5000*l.* thus charged thereon for his daughter. This charge afterwards became vested in one John Godley, for his own benefit. John Fitzmaurice (the elder) subsequently purchased other lands in fee-simple, called the Farrihy estate, in the county of Limerick, and Gurtahedy, in the county of

* 3 Cork ; and after his marriage with his second wife, * Hester Littleton, he, by a settlement dated the 23d of April, 1768, conveyed the Farrihy estate, and all other estates in the counties of Limerick and Cork, which he had power to dispose of, to trustees, to the use of himself for life, remainder to Hester, his wife, for life : and he thereby also covenanted that after his decease, his said wife should have a life use in all his personal estate. John Fitzmaurice, the younger, died in January, 1775, intestate, leaving an only child, Anne; and John Fitzmaurice, the elder, died in March, the same year, also intestate, and without any issue of his second marriage, leaving the said Anne, his granddaughter, his heiress-at-law, and Hester, his widow, him surviving.

In May, 1775, Anne Fitzmaurice, being then a minor, married Sir Robert Tilson Deane, afterwards created Lord Muskerry. In June, 1776, in order to terminate differences which had arisen between them and Hester, the widow of John Fitzmaurice, touching her rights under the post-nuptial settlement of 1763, a deed of compromise was executed by the said Hester of the first part, Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, of the second part, and certain trustees of the third and fourth parts, whereby, after reciting the said settlement of 1763, in consideration of the said Hester assuring to the said Sir Robert all her right and interest in and to the real and personal estate of her late husband, she and Sir Robert conveyed the said Springfield and Farrihy estates, and the lands of Gurtahedy, to trustees for a term of ninety-nine years, with powers to lease or mortgage the same to secure to the said Hester an annuity of 1083*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* during her life; and subject thereto, in trust for the use of Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, and her heirs and assigns.

* In 1779, Dame Anne Deane having attained the age of * 4 twenty-one, and there being then two sons of the marriage, a deed dated the 25th of May in that year, was executed by and between the said Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, of the first part, and Thomas Lloyd, of the second part, whereby, for assuring the lands therein mentioned and for making a provision for a jointure for Anne, and a further provision for the children of the marriage, they, the said Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, granted unto the said Thomas Lloyd, his heirs and assigns, the Springfield and Farrihy estates, in the county of Limerick, to the use of the said Sir Robert for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to the said Anne for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to Robert Fitzmaurice Deane, their then eldest son, for life, and to his first and every other son in tail male; with remainder to their then second son, John Fitzmaurice Deane, for life, and to his first and every other son in tail male, with remainder to the use of the third and every other son of Sir Robert on the body of the said Anne begotten or to be begotten, in tail male, with an ultimate remainder in fee to Sir Robert. And it was thereby provided and agreed, "that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Sir Robert, from time to time, and at all times during his life, to lease or demise all or any part or parts, parcel or parcels, of the aforesaid towns, lands, &c., and premises, for any time or term of years or lives, and with or without covenants for renewal, and in case of the determination of all or any of the aforesaid lease or leases respectively, from time to time to make new or other leases thereof in manner aforesaid, and with or without any fine or fines, as he shall think fit;" and it was also

* 5 agreed, "that it shall and may be *lawful to and for the said Sir Robert to charge and encumber all and singular the said towns, lands, &c., and premises aforesaid, or any part or parts thereof, with any sum or sums for the younger child or children of the said Sir Robert, begotten or to be begotten on the said Anne, in such proportions and manner, and payable at such time or times, as he shall by deed or will appoint." And it was further agreed, "that it shall also be lawful to and for the said Sir Robert to raise and levy, by one or more sales or mortgages of all or any part of the premises, any sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of 20,000*l.*, or to charge the premises aforesaid therewith, to and for such use and uses as he shall, at any time or times, by deed or will appoint." And by the same deed, Sir Robert and his wife covenanted to levy one or more fine or fines before the end of the then next Trinity term, unto the said Thomas Lloyd and his heirs, of all the said towns and lands, to enure to the uses of said settlement. On the back of the deed there was a writing, signed and sealed by the said Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, in the following words: "It was agreed between the parties within mentioned, previous to the execution of the within deed, that the within named Robert F. Deane and John Thomas F. Deane, and every other child of said Sir Robert Tilson Deane and Dame Anne, his wife, who shall, under the limitations within mentioned, be possessed of the premises within mentioned or any part thereof, to (a) make leases of the whole or any part thereof, for any term not exceeding three lives or thirty-one years, provided such lease be made to commence in possession, and that the best improved yearly rent that can be had for the same at the time of making

* 6 such lease, be reserved thereby, * and that no fine or other consideration shall be taken for or on account of the making thereof."

In Trinity term, 1779, Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, in pursuance of their covenant, levied a fine of the lands comprised in said settlement, to the use thereof. The lands of Gurtahedy were not included in the settlement or fine; they, as well as the Springfield and Farrihy estates, were Dame Anne's property in fee-simple.

By indenture of lease, dated the 26th of August, 1779, Sir Robert and Dame Anne, his wife, in consideration of 1000*l.*, demised to William Sheehy, for the term of 999 years, at the rent of 20*l.*, part of the Springfield estate, described as the lands of Rosnerilane, containing ninety-eight acres, and other part of the lands of Springfield (subject to a lease made of the latter on the 28th of February, 1746, by John Fitzmaurice to Isaac Howell, for three lives, at a rent of 40*l.* 3*s.*); and Sir Robert covenanted for himself and his wife, their heirs, executors, &c., to levy one or more fine or fines unto the said William Sheehy, his executors, &c., of all the premises thereby demised.

By indenture of lease, dated the 28th of October, 1779, Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, in consideration of a sum of 2000*l.*, demised to Roger Sheehy, the younger, the lands of Clonmore, another part of the Springfield estate, and containing 450 acres, for a term of 999 years, at a rent of 50*l.* This lease contained permission to the said lessee, his executors, &c., during the demised term, "to graff, cut, and burn the soil and surface of all or any part of the lands thereby demised, without incurring or being subject or liable to any penalty or forfeiture whatsoever for the same, notwithstanding the several Acts of Parliament * in force in Ireland, to prevent the practice of burning * 7 land." And it also contained a clause empowering the said lessee, his executors, &c., to quit and surrender the demised premises at the end of every year of the said term, upon giving six months' notice in writing; and also a covenant on the part of Sir Robert and wife, to levy one or more fine or fines to the said Roger Sheehy, his executors, &c., of all the said lands, for the more effectual confirming the said demise.

By indenture of lease dated the 14th of June, 1780, Sir Robert and Anne, his wife, in consideration of a sum of 5708*l.*, demised to Roger Sheehy, the elder, other parts of the lands of Springfield and Farrihy, containing together about 630 acres, all situated in the county of Limerick; and also the lands of Gurtahedy, containing 17½ acres, situated in the county of Cork, subject nevertheless to remainders of unexpired terms of different leases then subsisting, and set out in a schedule annexed to said lease; to hold the same for the term of 999 years, at the rent of 50*l.*, without impeachment of waste, and with power to the said lessee, his executors, &c., to cut, fell, and carry away all timber and other trees then growing, or which thereafter should grow on the said demised premises, and to graff and burn any part of said premises as often as they or he should think proper. The schedule referred to specified five leases for lives of different portions of said lands as subsisting at the date of the said indenture, all which were executed previous to the settlement of 1779. The rents reserved by them were greater than the rent reserved by this indenture.

This as well as the aforesaid leases contained covenants on * 8 the part of Sir Robert and his * wife, to levy fines to the lessees for confirming the said demises; but it did not appear that any fines were ever levied. They also contained the usual clauses of entry and distress, &c., and a reservation of the royalties. All the lands demised by the three indentures, except the lands of Gortaheedy, were lands comprised in the settlement of the 25th of May, 1779. The said lessees entered into possession of the premises respectively demised to them, and they or their representatives continued in the undisturbed possession for near forty years. The interest in the second lease (28th of October, 1779) became vested in the two appellants, Edward and John Sheehy; the interest in the first became vested in the appellants, W. J. Sheehy and his son Bryan Sheehy, and a moiety of the interest in the third became vested in the appellants, Anne Westrop and her son T. J. Westrop.

The sum raised by Sir Robert Tilson Deane, by means of fines on these and on two other leases, each for 999 years, to one Furlong and one Heffernan, of the lands comprised in the said settlement, amounted altogether to 10,208*l.*

By a deed dated the 29th of April, 1780, reciting the settlement of 1779, and the power thereby given to Sir Robert to raise by sale or mortgage any sum not exceeding 20,000*l.*, he mortgaged the Springfield and Farrihy estates, subject to the said leases, to St. John Chinnery, for a sum of 6000*l.* Sir Robert was created Lord Muskerry in 1781; and by a deed dated the 7th of April, 1783, he executed a further mortgage to St. John Chinnery of the said estates, subject as aforesaid, for a sum of 4500*l.*

The annuity to Hester Fitzmaurice, under the deed of June, 1776, having become largely in arrear, she * filed a * 9 bill in Chancery in February, 1780 (afterwards amended), against Lord and Lady Muskerry and their said sons and the lessees in the several leases before mentioned and the person in whom the charge for 5000*l.* was then vested and others, praying that the leases might be declared fraudulent and void as against her, and that an account might be taken of the sum due to her on foot of her annuity, and that the same might be raised by sale or mortgage of the lands comprised in the trust term created for securing the said annuity. Hester Fitzmaurice died in June, 1790, and thereupon Lord Westcote, her executor, revived the cause and filed an amended bill in 1792, making Broderick Chinnery, who was the personal representative, devisee, and heir-at-law of St. John Chinnery, the mortgagee, a party, and putting in issue the said two deeds of mortgage for 6000*l.* and 4500*l.*: and by further amendment in 1793, William Fitzmaurice Deane, third son of Lord and Lady Muskerry, was made a party to the suit. All the defendants, except Lord and Lady Muskerry and their sons, put in answers, and in December, 1797, there was a decree of reference to the Master, to take an account of the sum due to the plaintiff, and an account of all prior and subsequent incumbrances.

In January, 1802, the Master made his report, finding that 10,819*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* was due to Lord Westcote as representative of Hester Fitzmaurice, the principal sum of 5000*l.* only due to J. Godley on foot of the charge created by the settlement of May, 1759, and the sum of 15,430*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* to B. Chinnery, for principal and interest on the said mortgages.

In November, 1802, the cause came to be heard, on the report and merits, before Lord REDESDALE, then Lord * Chancel- * 10 lor of Ireland, who decreed that the sum of 10,819*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, found due to Lord Westcote, should be raised by mortgage of the estates comprised in the trust term created by the deed of June, 1776, and that the trustees thereof should execute mortgages of the remainder of the term to a trustee, to be named by Lord Westcote; and he also declared that the said several leases to the Sheehys, Furlong, and Heffernan, were fraudulent and void, as against Hester Fitzmaurice and her representative, and that the full and fair rents for the estates discharged from the leases ought to have been paid from time to time to the receiver appointed in the said cause in 1784, from the time of his appointment; and he referred it to the Master to set fair rents on the estates comprised in said leases from year to year, and to take an account of what remained due for such rents after giving credit to the tenants for the sums paid by them to the receivers; and his Lordship declared that, in case the said tenants should redeem the mortgage to be so made for raising the arrears of the annuity, by payment of what should be found due for rents beyond the rents reserved in their respective leases, or by payment out of their own money, they should be entitled to stand in the place of Lord Westcote, for so much as they should pay beyond the rents reserved by their respective leases.

While these proceedings were pending in the Court of Chancery, B. Chinnery, in the name of his brother, St. John Chinnery, filed a bill (in November, 1784) in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, against Lord and Lady Muskerry, their two sons and others, to foreclose the mortgages for 6000*l.* and 4500*l.* St. John Chinnery died in 1787 without issue, leaving his said brother * 11 his heir-at-law, whom he also appointed * his sole residuary devisee and executor. He revived the cause, and a decree was made therein in 1791, referring it to the chief remembrancer to take an account of the sum due on the mortgages; but before any further proceedings were had in that cause, the decree of 1802 was pronounced in the Chancery cause.

By a deed dated the 11th of December, 1802, Lord Westcote, in consideration of a sum of 4000*l.*, assigned to B. Chinnery the debt of 10,819*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, with the benefit of the Chancery decree of November, 1802: and by an indenture of the same date, the trustees of the term of ninety-nine years, created by the deed of June, 1776, to secure the annuity to Hester Fitzmaurice, by the direction of Lord Westcote, and in pursuance of said decree, mortgaged the lands comprised in said term to B. Chinnery, his executors, &c. Having thus become assignee of Lord Westcote's debt, under the decree of November, 1802, B. Chinnery entered into agreements with the tenants under the said leases, and he thereby agreed to accept 1500*l.* a year from them until the sum due to Lord Westcote should be paid, and the tenants respectively paid that stipulated sum, and also kept down the interest on the 5000*l.* charge.

In 1804, B. Chinnery revived the Exchequer suit, and having by supplemental bill stated the decree in Chancery, and the assignment to him of Lord Westcote's interest, &c., also stating the death of Lord Muskerry's eldest son, and making his third son a party defendant, he obtained a decree to account, in February, 1806. In 1807, the chief remembrancer made his report under this decree, and a sum of 20,085*l.* 7*s.* 9½*d.* was reported due to B. Chinnery on foot of the mortgages executed to St. John Chinnery, * and also 10,093*l.* 4*s.* 4½*d.* as assignee * 12 of Lord Westcote, and 5000*l.* was reported due on foot of the charge formerly vested in Godley, by whom the same had been assigned to B. Chinnery pending the cause. In February, 1807, this cause was heard on the report, and on the merits, when a decree was made for a sale of the Springfield and Farrihy estates, for payment, with interest and costs, of the sum reported due on foot of the said mortgages, subject nevertheless to the debts decreed due to Godley and Lord Westcote, and to the remedies for the recovery thereof, pursuant to the decree of November, 1802; and also subject to the several leases to the Sheehys, Heffernan, and Furlong.

In 1808, B. Chinnery, who had been some time before created a baronet, died, having bequeathed to his two sons, St. John and Richard Boyle Chinnery, minors, the sums due on foot of said mortgages and charge, and on foot of Lord Westcote's demand; and appointed his widow, Alice Chinnery, his executrix, who proved his will, and revived the suit in the Court of Exchequer. The chief remembrancer, pursuant to the decree of February, 1807, in the Exchequer, set up the Springfield and Farrihy estates for sale, subject to the 5000*l.* charge and Lord Westcote's debt, and to the said several leases to the Sheehys, Heffernan, and Furlong; and in November, 1810, Dame Alice Chinnery became the purchaser, and in May, 1812, the estates were accordingly conveyed to her by a deed of conveyance, purporting to be made between the chief remembrancer, Lord and Lady Muskerry, &c., but it was executed by the chief remembrancer only.

Robert Lord Muskerry died in July, 1818, leaving Anne, Lady Muskerry, his widow and executrix, and two sons, the Hon. John Thomas F. Deane, who * thereupon became Lord * 13 Muskerry, and the respondent, then the Hon. Matthew F. Deane, his only surviving children.

The original bill in the cause, out of which this appeal arose, was filed in May, 1819, by John Thomas Lord Muskerry and the respondent, and their mother. John Thomas Lord Muskerry died in 1824 without issue, whereupon the respondent became Lord Muskerry, and in 1826 he, having revived the suit, filed an amended bill against Dame Alice Chinnery, the children of

Sir B. Chinnery, and the said lessees or their representatives, which, after stating a variety of dealings and transactions between Robert, first Lord Muskerry, and Sir B. Chinnery, in addition to the several matters before mentioned, charged (among other things) that the said several leases were not authorized by the leasing power in the settlement of 1779, but were made in fraud thereof, because the former and annual rents were reduced, and some of the lands thereby demised were subject to prior leases then unexpired, and the lessees were dispunishable for waste, &c. ; that Lord Muskerry having raised 10,208*l.* by taking fines upon the leases, and also 10,500*l.* by the mortgages to St. John Chinnery, had exceeded his power to charge under the said settlement, which limited him to 20,000*l.* ; and that said mortgages having been made subject to said fraudulent leases, were contrary to the intent and meaning of the power ; that the proceedings and accounts taken in the Exchequer cause were fraudulent and erroneous, and that if due credits had been given, nothing would have been found due on foot of said mortgages ; that the decree in said cause was also erroneous in directing a sale for payment of subsequent mortgages * subject to a prior charge and other prior incumbrances, without providing for the payment thereof out of the produce of the sale ; and the bill, after impeaching the said decree on several other grounds, prayed that the said leases might be declared not to have been warranted by the leasing power in the said settlement, and might be decreed fraudulent and void as against the plaintiff (the respondent) claiming in remainder under the said settlement, and that the mortgages to St. John Chinnery might be declared not warranted by any of the powers in said settlement, and might be deemed fraudulent and void, and that the final decree in the Exchequer might be declared to have been fraudulently obtained, and that accounts might be taken of what was due to Dame Alice Chinnery, as representative of Sir B. Chinnery, on foot of her demands as assignee of Lord Westcote's and Godley's demands, and that in taking such accounts, such sums only should be allowed as Sir B. Chinnery actually and bonâ fide paid as assignee of Lord Westcote and Godley respectively ; and in case the said mortgages, or either of them, should be deemed a subsisting lien on said estates, then that accounts might be taken of the sums due on foot thereof, and that in taking such accounts, such sums only should be allowed as were actually and bonâ fide paid for the same, and that, upon payment thereof, plaintiff might be decreed entitled to redeem said mortgaged premises, and the same should be reconveyed accordingly; and that an account might also be taken of the sums received by Sir B. Chinnery or his representatives, or which without wilful default he or they might have received out of the Springfield and Farrihy estates, &c., &c.

The defendants, the Chinnerys, in their answer, insisted * that the said mortgages were in due execution of the * 15 power in the settlement to raise 20,000*l.*, and also insisted on the validity of the final decree in the Exchequer cause, by which Dame Alice Chinnery had become the purchaser of the Springfield and Farrihy estates.

The appellants also put in their several answers, and insisted on the validity of the leases, and that the rents reserved in them respectively were the reasonable and just yearly value of the lands demised, allowances being made in respect of the fines paid on them by the lessees; and that all prior leases of the same, except the lease to Isaac Howell, were surrendered before the leases in question were granted, and that they were in due execution of the power contained in the settlement of 1779, and their validity was not affected by the subsequent mortgages.

Lady Muskerry, Dame Alice Chinnery, and several of the parties died, pending the proceedings, and bills of revivor and amendment were filed as occasion required.

The cause was heard before Lord PLUNKET on the 21st, 22d, 23d, &c., and 29th of November, 1832; and his Lordship on the last mentioned day directed that the parties might be at liberty to submit a case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas upon the question, "Whether the leases dated respectively the 26th of August and 28th of October, 1779, and the 14th of June, 1780, and made by Sir Robert Tilson Deane, afterwards created Baron Muskerry, and Dame Anne his wife, to W. Sheehy, R. Sheehy the younger, and R. Sheehy the elder, respectively, or any or either, and which of them, were or was warranted by any power contained in the deed dated the 25th of May, 1779?" And all further directions were reserved until the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas should be had. * A case * 16 was framed pursuant to that order; and the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas certified in February, 1834, that the said leases were not warranted by any power contained in the deed of settlement of the 25th of May, 1779.

The cause came on for hearing before Lord Chancellor SUGDEN in February, 1835, upon that certificate, and for further directions.

During the hearing counsel informed the Court that a compromise was agreed upon between the respondent and the committee of the defendants, the surviving children of Sir B. Chinnery, who were lunatics, and that a petition was to be then presented to his Lordship, on behalf of the lunatics, for a reference to the Master to inquire whether the proposed compromise would be for the benefit of the lunatics. (a) The only question then left to the Court being as to the legal validity of the leases, the Lord Chancellor, for the better adjudication of that question, called to his assistance the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron. The point was elaborately argued before them sitting with the Lord Chancellor, but his Lordship did not ask them to deliver their opinions in Court, being himself clearly of opinion that as the bill had been filed to impeach the mortgages and the sale, and as Lord Muskerry had withdrawn from the consideration of the Court the question as to their validity, he had no jurisdiction to decide on the validity of the leases, and that Lord

Muskerry could not impeach them without impeaching the

By his Lordship's decree, after reciting as therein recited, and that plaintiff (the respondent) "by his counsel, in open Court, having waived insisting on any relief as sought by his bill, in respect of the said final decree pronounced by the Court of Exchequer in said bill mentioned, and the said sale in pursuance thereof, &c., and it appearing that under the said decree in the Court of Exchequer the said lands, &c., were sold to the purchaser, Dame Alice Chinnery, subject to said indentures of lease of the 28th Oct. 1779, and 14th June, 1780," it was ordered and adjudged, &c., that the plaintiff's bill, &c., should be dismissed with costs as against the defendants, E. Sheehy, &c., the representatives of the lessees of the leases of the 28th of October, 1779, and 4th June, 1780 (the lessees who appeared at the hearing), save as to the costs incurred in respect of the said proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas, as to which it was declared that all parties should abide their own costs.

(a) The Lord Chancellor on the same day made an order of reference to the Master on the petition as prayed. The Master, by his report on the 8th of April, found that the compromise (which was, that the Chinnerys should reconvey the mortgaged premises to the respondent for 24,000*l.*, principal and interest on the two mortgages and charge) was for the benefit of the lunatics.

On the 8th of May, 1835, the respondent presented a petition to Lord PLUNKET, who had then succeeded Sir EDWARD SUGDEN as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, praying for a rehearing of the cause, for the reasons stated in the petition, (a) and his Lordship on the same day ordered the cause to be set down to be reheard.

The appellants, Edward and John Sheehy, subsequently * moved his Lordship to discharge that order, as having been * 18 obtained by suppression of the fact that the decree was enrolled. Affidavits were filed for and against that motion. The affidavit on behalf of the Sheehys was made by their solicitor, who therein deposed that the counsel for the plaintiff, at the hearing of the cause, declined calling on the Court for any relief against the Chinnerys; that on the 18th of April the enrolment of the decree of dismissal was lodged by his six clerks in the rolls' office, pursuant to the docket signed by Lord Chancellor SUGDEN on the 14th of April; and the said decree was, as deponent was advised and believed, duly enrolled. The affidavits on behalf of Lord Muskerry, made by his solicitors, stated, that after said decree of the 12th of February, 1835, was pronounced, they received instructions from him to enter a caveat against the enrolment thereof; and that, on making inquiries at the bill office with that view, they discovered that the solicitor for the defendants (the Sheehys) caused engrossments of the said decree to be lodged in the rolls' office; and on inquiry there, the deputy-keeper of the rolls said he did not consider the engrossment so lodged to be an enrolment, as it was a transcript of the decree in a short form, as directed by the new rules, which, he said, did not apply to enrolments of decrees, or alter the practice in that respect, and therefore he would not give a certificate of the decree being enrolled, but that a parchment copy of it, signed by the Chancellor, was lodged in the office: and the Master of the Rolls, whom the deputy-keeper consulted on the point, was of his opinion. These deponents also stated that the allegation in the affidavit of the solicitor for the Sheehys, and the statement in the said decree, that plaintiff's counsel in open Court * waived * 19 praying any relief against the Chinnerys, was not founded in fact.

The Lord Chancellor, after hearing counsel on the matter, made an order on the 28th of May, 1835, "that the said engrossment be opened, for the purpose of rehearing the cause."

The cause was accordingly reheard by his Lordship, and on the 11th of June, 1835, a decretal order was pronounced, which recited and decreed, among other things, as follows: "And it appearing to the Court that the recital contained in the said decree of dismissal of the 12th of February, 1835, stating that the plaintiff (the respondent), by his counsel in open Court, had waived insisting on any relief as sought by his bill, in respect of the final decree pronounced by the Court of Exchequer, &c., and the sale, in pursuance thereof, was erroneously inserted therein, being unfounded in fact and not warranted by any statement or waiver made on the part of Lord Muskerry; and upon reading the order of reference of the 5th of February, 1835, made on the petition in the matter of Richard B. Chinnery, Maria and Louisa Chinnery, lunatics, and inasmuch as the subject of that reference was depending at the time of pronouncing the said decree of dismissal; and upon reading the Master's report of the 6th of April, 1835, made in pursuance of the said order of reference, and inasmuch as the defendants, the Chinnerys, are now parties before the Court in this cause, insisting on their rights by their committee and by their counsel; and upon reading the order made the 8th of May, 1835, on the petition of the plaintiff (the respondent) for a rehearing of this cause so far as regards the said decree of dismissal: it is this day ordered, &c., that the said decree be reversed. And the Court proceeding to hear

* 20 * this cause upon further directions against the defendants, the Chinnerys, upon reading the Master's report of the 6th of April last, made in pursuance of said order of reference of the 5th of February, 1835; it is ordered, &c., that the said report do stand confirmed as between the plaintiff and the Chinnerys, and that the compromise therein set forth be carried into effect; and, accordingly, it is further ordered that the said plaintiff is entitled to redeem the mortgages of the Springfield and Farrihy estates, on payment of the sum of 24,000*l.* to the defendant, R. S. Ball, as committee of said lunatics, and personal representative of the late Sir B. Chinnery and Dame Alice Chinnery respectively, with interest from the 1st of February, 1835, until paid, &c.; and that all necessary parties join in a reconveyance of the said premises to the plaintiff, discharged of the said mortgages ; and in default of payment of the 24,000*l.* within the time named, it is ordered, &c., that the plaintiff's equity of redemption be absolutely foreclosed, and that the Master set up and sell the mortgaged premises, or a competent part thereof, and out of the money arising from the sale that the said sum of 24,000*l.* with interest, or so much thereof as shall remain due, be paid ; and it is further ordered, &c., that the plaintiff, as administrator of the Dowager Baroness Muskerry, release the said R. S. Ball, and the said lunatics and their estates, from all claims and demands whatsoever for arrears of dower, and also from all demands relating to the rents of the mortgaged premises up to the 1st of February last ; and that the committee of the said lunatics on their behalf, and all other necessary parties, release the plaintiff and his estates from all claims and demands whatsoever of the said lunatics up to that day, save as far as relates to the mortgaged debt * and as between the plaintiff, and the said lunatics * 21 and their said committee, that each of the parties abide their own costs ; and as between the several other parties, that the said cause stand over to be further heard, with liberty to all parties to adopt such defences as they shall be advised, arising out of said compromise, and the decree now pronounced in pursuance thereof."

The cause was accordingly further heard, on the question of the validity of the leases, on the 12th of June and following days ; and on the 13th of July, 1835, Lord PLUNKET delivered his judgment on that question, declaring the leases not to be authorized by any power in the settlement of 1779, and pronounced a decree as follows: " Upon reading the case submitted for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, and the certificate of the learned Judges of that Court thereon, setting forth that, &c., and they were of opinion that the leases in the pleadings mentioned, dated respectively the 26th of August, 1779, &c., were not warranted by any power contained in the deed of settlement dated the 25th of May, 1779 ; and the defendants, the lessees (the appellants), by their counsel in open court, declining to accept an offer made by the Court, to send the said case for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, &c., &c. ; it is ordered and decreed, that the said decree of the 12th of February, 1835, be reversed, and it is declared that the insertion therein of the waiver therein recited was not warranted by the facts. And it is further decreed and declared, that the said three leases, dated respectively the 26th of August, 1779, the 18th of October, 1779, and the 4th of June, 1780, made by the said Sir R. Tilson Deane, afterwards created Baron Muskerry, and Dame Anne, his wife, to William * Sheehy, &c., were not, nor was either of them valid at law, or warranted by any power contained in the deed of settlement of the 25th of May, 1779, and that there was no ground for sustaining any or either of them on equitable principles; and the said leases being invalid at law, and not sustainable on equitable grounds, it is further ordered and declared that the same are void, and that they be and are hereby set aside, and that an injunction do forthwith issue to put the plaintiff into possession of the premises comprised in the said leases respectively.” (a)

The appellants, by their petition of appeal, prayed that the orders for rehearing, and for opening the enrolment of the decrees, made respectively on the 8th and 28th of May, 1835, and also the last stated decree of the 13th of July, 1835, be reversed or altered.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. J. Russell, for the appellants. — The order for rehearing was obtained by withholding from the Court all knowledge of the decree of dismissal having been enrolled. On that ground the appellants moved to discharge the order; but Lord PLUNKET, without inquiry into the fact or manner of enrolment, and without any application to vacate it, spontaneously ordered the enrolment to be opened for the purpose of the rehearing. Both these orders are clearly irregular. One effect of enrolling a decree is to prevent a rehearing; and an enrolment cannot be opened except for fraud or surprise, or some irregularity.

The party affected by it might have prevented the enrolment by petition for rehearing, presented in due time, or might have suspended the enrolment by caveat for a month. (m) Instead of doing either, he acquiesced in the decree and paid the costs, never contemplating a rehearing until the learned Judge who made the decree of 1832 again became Lord Chancellor.

But it was alleged that the deputy-keeper of the records in Ireland did not deem the enrolment sufficient, because the engrossment did not recite all the proceedings in the cause in the old form; and the new orders of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, for dispensing with recitals, did not, in his opinion, apply to enrolments. The best answer to that objection is, that Lord PLUNKET treated the enrolment as regular by ordering it to be opened. Besides, the affidavits of the solicitors for both parties showed that there was an actual enrolment before the caveat was tendered.

If, then, the order to rehear was irregular, the decree pronounced on the rehearing cannot be allowed to stand. But that is not the only objection of form to this decree: it contradicts an averment of a fact in the former decree, asserting that that decree contained a false statement. That was a course of proceeding quite unprecedented. It is not competent for a Judge to strike out of the record, much less to contradict, a statement, signed by his predecessor, of what took place before the latter in open court. At law, no * averment, nor pleading, nor evidence, * 24 nor argument, is allowed against a record, every part of which, as long as it remains on the files of the Court, must be taken to speak absolute verity: per Lord ELLENBOROUGH, in Ramsbottom v. Buckhurst. (a) The same rule holds in equity. The record of Sir EDWARD SUGDEN's decree remains unaltered. The statement contained in it, of a waiver of relief against the Chinnerys, was not only true, but was admitted by the proceedings before Lord PLUNKET, whose decree, notwithstanding, declares that it contains a false statement.

Another objection, not only of form but also on the merits, to Lord PLUNKET's decree—an extraordinary decree, with two dates—is, that without containing a declaration that the Exchequer decree of foreclosure, and the sale in pursuance of it, were void, it proceeded to declare, on the prayer of the vendor, that the leases were void, as to some of the defendants, and, as to the other defendants, it directed the cause to stand over, with liberty to them to make such objections to that declaration as they might be advised. This part of the decree would, if allowed to stand, go to the extent of establishing a rule of equity, that a person who sold all his estate had still a reserved interest in respect of leases, subject to which the purchaser bought the estate, and which, therefore, the purchaser could not himself impeach. Was it open to the vendor to impeach them in the absence of the purchaser, and deprive him of the security of solvent tenants? No such equity is recognized in the Courts in England: something partaking of that doctrine appears in a case said to have been decided in Ireland. Maguire v. Armstrong. (a) One of the objects of * 25 the bill in the * present case was to set aside the Exchequer decree and the sale, and then to leave it open to the reversioner to impeach the leases. That was the proper course; but this decree gives a different relief, for it sets aside the leases at the suit of the vendor, and sets them up against the purchaser, contrary to the scope and prayer of the bill. That was the irregularity which Sir EDWARD SUGDEN foresaw when he found that by the compromise between the respondent and the Chinnerys, the consideration of the question as to the validity of the sale was withdrawn. He found, after hearing argument on the point and giving it due consideration, that, in the absence of the purchasers of the estate, he had no jurisdiction to give any decision on the leases, and he therefore dismissed the bill. But he at the same time expressed his clear opinion that the leases were warranted by the power (b), and in that opinion the Chief Baron concurred; and the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas said he was impressed with the argument, although he had signed the Common Pleas certificate that the leases were not warranted. (c) There are cases in which purchasers succeeded in setting aside leases granted anterior to their purchases; but it is quite new to hold, as Lord PLUNKET did, (d) on the authority of Maguire v. Armstrong (which his Lordship said was supported by the case of Taylor v. Stibbert), that a vendor, after parting with his whole interest, should impeach leases of the property so parted with, and to declare the tenants to be trustees of an equitable interest reserved in him against the purchaser. It would seem, if such an equity were allowed to exist, that no one can sell his estate * 26 * out and out. That doctrine was not countenanced by Taylor v. Stibbert. (e) The lessees in this case had a right to set up the sale to the Chinnerys as a protection against the claim of the respondent to impeach them. He, instead of proving that the estates were improperly mortgaged, and that the Exchequer decree and sale were wrong, admitted them to be right by agreeing to give 24,000*l.* to the purchasers for a reconveyance, thereby withdrawing the question between him and them from the consideration of the Court. The validity of the leases, except as against prior incumbrances, was recognized not only by the Exchequer decree, but also by Lord REDESDALE's decree in the Chancery suit in 1802: and to the benefit of that decree the lessees are entitled in respect of the sums of money paid by them in pursuance of it, and of the agreement into which they entered with Sir B. Chinnery in 1803.

Mr. Knight Bruce and Sir William Follett (Mr. C. Beavan with them), for the respondent. — The appeal against the decree is not sustainable on the merits, and it should not be allowed on the alleged miserable ground of irregularity of the previous orders. The consequence of deciding that the rehearing was irregular would be to leave the respondent remediless, inasmuch as by the standing orders of the House (a) an appeal against the decree of dismissal of February, 1835, would be now too late. But the order to rehear was not irregularly obtained, as the decree had not been enrolled according to the established practice of the Court; at all events it was very doubtful whether the new general orders of the Court of Chancery in Ireland had changed that * practice, and this was therefore a fit case for the exercise * 27 of the discretionary power of the Court to open the enrolment. A Court of appeal is never inclined to interfere with such exercise of the discretion of the Court below. The keeper of the records must be allowed to be the proper judge of the practice in his own office, and in this matter he had the sanction of the Master of the Rolls. The appellants have never obtained a certificate of the enrolment. The keeper of the records refused to grant any, being most positive in his opinion that the short engrossment of the decree left with him was not an enrolment. A caveat was lodged before that defect could be corrected.

The decree of dismissal did not extend to all the appellants: some of them did not appear at the hearing; it is therefore incompetent to them to object to the opening of the enrolment, and that incompetency applies to all the appellants, in consequence of the misjoinder in this appeal. An objection of form on one side, may be justly met by a like objection on the other.

The objections to the form of Lord PLUNKET'S decree are, first, that it contained a contradiction of a statement of fact in the decree of dismissal. And it has been argued, that any statement inserted in a decree, and appearing on the record, cannot be contradicted. But if Lord PLUNKET was right in rehearing the cause, then there was no final decree, and consequently no record. There was a final record in the case of Ramsbottom v. Buckhurst. (a) Suppose a decree recited the consent of counsel, and that no such consent was given, would it not be open to the parties affected to question the statement and correct the error?

It would be extremely unjust to hold that a party may not * 28 * question the recital of a waiver of relief in a decree where there was no waiver. From a comparison of the affidavits of the solicitors on both sides, with the notes of the registrar, it is evident that the recital of waiver of relief against the Chinnerys, as stated in Sir EDWARD SUGDEN'S decree, was not warranted by what the respondent's counsel stated, or by the state of the proceedings before the Court. Nothing that took place could bar the relief sought against the Exchequer decree and sale. They were both properly impeached by the respondent, on the authority of recent decisions of this House. Mullins v. Townsend, (b) Earl of Bandon v. Becher. (c) The lessees could not be in any manner affected by that sale; they were strangers to it, and had no right to interfere in any arrangement between Lord Muskerry and the Chinnerys. By that arrangement, in effect, the Chinnerys granted to Lord Muskerry the relief which his bill prayed against them; they submitting to a decree of redemption. That arrangement was only in progress, and not concluded until more than two months after Sir EDWARD SUGDEN pronounced his decree, in which he declared that, in consequence of the question regarding the sale being withdrawn by the arrangement, he could not decide the questions regarding the leases. All the parties interested certainly assented to the proposed arrangement. The Lord Chancellor fiated the petition for a reference to the Master, to inquire whether that arrangement would be beneficial to the Chinnerys: he afterwards summoned the Common-law Judges to hear with him arguments of counsel on the questions affecting the leases; yet he most unaccountably declares in his decree that he cannot decide these questions in consequence of the arrangement, although *the arrangement * 29 was not more complete at the date of the decree than on the days of the hearing before himself and the Common-law Judges.

Another objection, which goes to the substance as well as the form of Sir EDWARD SUGDEN's decree, was the declaration therein that he had not jurisdiction over the questions affecting the leases, in the absence of the parties interested in the sale under the Exchequer decree. One main object of the suit was to impeach the leases. The submission of one set of defendants, the purchasers under the sale, to a decree of redemption, in order to put an end to litigation on that part of the suit, did not affect the relative position of the plaintiff and the other defendants, in respect to the validity of the leases; or if it had any such effect, it was to strengthen the plaintiff's title. The clear understanding of all the parties and their counsel, and of Sir EDWARD SUGDEN himself, was that the suit as between the respondent and the lessees was to proceed, notwithstanding the proposed compromise. Lord PLUNKET, by his decree, put the true construction on the facts as they were stated to him to have taken place, and as they did take place before his predecessor. The technical objections raised against that decree should not be allowed to stand in the way of having the appeal against it heard and decided on the merits.

[We abstain from reporting the arguments of the learned counsel on either side, on the questions as to the validity of the leases, — which occupied the House for four days, — because the House did not give any opinion on the leases, and the arguments on them in the Court below, before the Lords Chancellors of Ireland, are twice reported, by Messrs. Lloyd & Goold, Cas. Temp. Sir EDWARD SUGDEN, p. 200; and Cas. Temp. Lord PLUNKET, p. 188.]

* THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, so long a time * 30 having elapsed since this case was argued, I think it right to enter more minutely into the facts as far as they bear upon two points which were raised in the argument. The first of these points is one of form and practice, being whether it was competent for the Court, in the then state of the proceedings, to pronounce such a decree. In order to come to a conclusion upon this point, it will be necessary shortly to examine the different interests of the parties to the cause. In 1775, Anne Fitzmaurice was seised in fee of the Springfield estate, subject to a charge of 5000*l.* vested in John Godley, and in fee absolutely of two other estates, called Farrihy and Gurtaheedy. She married Sir Robert Tilson Deane; and her mother-in-law, Hester Fitzmaurice, making a claim upon the estate, it was arranged that she should accept an annuity, charged upon a ninety-nine years' term over all the estates, in full of her demand.

In 1799, a post-nuptial settlement was made of the estates of Springfield and Farrihy, under which these estates, after life estates to the husband and wife, were limited to the two sons, then living, for life, remainder to their sons in tail male, remainder to any other sons of the settlor in tail; and power was reserved to Sir R. T. Deane of granting leases and of charging the estate with 20,000*l.* This power of leasing he exercised by granting a lease dated the 26th of August, 1779, now vested in the appellants, W. J. Sheehy and Bryan Sheehy; by granting another lease, dated the 28th of October, 1779, now vested in the appellants, Edward and John Sheehy; by granting another lease, dated the 4th of June, 1780, now vested in the appellants, Ann Westropp and T. J. Westropp. He also exercised the power of charging the estate by two mortgages to St.

On the 18th of November, 1802, a decree was made in a suit instituted to compel payment of the arrears of the annuity secured to Hester Fitzmaurice under the deed of the 20th of June, 1776, the right to which was then vested in Lord Westcote by mortgage of the estate charged; and it was by that decree declared that the leases were fraudulent and void as against the charge, and that the tenants were to account for the full value from the year 1784; but the tenants were to be at liberty to redeem the charge, and, as against the estate, to be repaid what they might pay for that purpose either by way of rent or sums advanced by them. This suit was instituted in the Court of Chancery in 1782; and in 1784, Chinnery, the mortgagee, filed a bill in the Court of Exchequer to foreclose; and in 1787, a decree was made in the latter suit, merely of reference to take the accounts; and in December, 1802, soon after the decree in the Chancery suit, Lord Westcote assigned to Chin-nery, the mortgagee, all his interest under that decree. On the 19th of February, 1807, a decree of foreclosure was made in the Exchequer suit, upon the report of the deputy remembrancer, who found a large sum due upon Chinnery's mortgage, but subject to the decree in Chancery of 1802, and to the leases, and to another mortgage or charge of 5000*l.* then vested in Godley, but which was afterwards assigned to Chinnery. Under this decree, a sale of the Springfield and Farrihy estates took place before the remembrancer; and Alice Chinnery, in whom the mortgage was then vested, became the purchaser, but subject, according to the decree, to Lord Westcote's charge, Godley's * charge, * 32 and the leases. In 1812, a conveyance was directed to be made under the purchase, but it was not executed except by the deputy remembrancer.

In 1819, a bill was filed in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, by the respondent, then first tenant in tail, and the other parties then interested under the settlement of 1779, impeaching the titles of the mortgagees and of the lessees. In 1832, the cause came to be heard before Lord PLUNKET, who directed a case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, as to whether the leases were warranted by the power contained in the settlement of the 25th of May, 1779. In Feb., 1834, the certificate of the Judges of the Common Pleas was obtained, finding that the leases were not warranted by the power. Before the cause came on for hearing upon this certificate, an arrangement having taken place between the plaintiff (the now respondent) and the Chinnerys, in whom the mortgages and Lord Westcote's charge were then vested, the Court was informed that no judgment was required as between the plaintiff and the mortgagees; upon which Sir EDWARD SUGDEN, then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, expressed his opinion, that the plaintiff having waived all relief against the mortgagees, and as to the sale in the Exchequer suit, no judgment could be pronounced as to the leases; and therefore dismissed the bill as against the defendants claiming the several leases. Before this time, that is, on the 5th of February, 1835, one of the parties interested in the mortgages being a lunatic, a reference was made to inquire whether the proposed arrangement would be for the benefit of the lunatic; and after the decree, that is, on the 8th of April, 1835, the Master reported in the affirmative. This decree, according to the case made by the * defendants, was enrolled, but, that is denied by the * 33 plaintiff.

On the 8th of May, 1835, an order for rehearing was made as of course; and on the 28th of May, 1835, upon an application by the appellants to discharge that order, an order was made to open the enrolment for the purpose of the rehearing.

On the 13th of July, 1835, Lord PLUNKET pronounced his decree upon the rehearing, carrying into effect the terms of the arrangement, giving to the plaintiff the benefit of the redemption, on payment of the sum agreed to be paid upon account of the mortgages and charges; and, as against the lessees, declaring the leases void, they having declined to take another case for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench.

The appeal is against the orders of the 8th and 28th of May, 1835, and the final decree of the 13th of July, 1835. The two orders may be considered together, the question as to both being the regularity and propriety of the order for rehearing; that is, whether, under the circumstances, the Court was precluded by the enrolment from rehearing the cause.

It appears, from the affidavit of Mr. Furlong, the plaintiff's solicitor, that it was a subject of doubt whether there had been, in fact, any enrolment of the decree; the deputy-keeper of the rolls having objected to the engrossments left with him, as being merely copies of the decree in the short form, and that he had, therefore, consulted the Master of the Rolls, who was of opinion that they were not to be considered as an enrolment; and therefore he declined to give any certificate of the enrolment, and, in fact, there was not any such certificate. Mr. Furlong having received this information, explains the reason of his not having made any application to the Court to vacate the

* 34 enrolment; but it appears that the defendants, * Edward and John Sheehy, moved to set aside the order for a rehearing, upon the ground of the decree having been enrolled, whereupon Lord PLUNKET ordered that the enrolment should be opened, for the purpose of rehearing the cause.

There certainly is a want of regularity in this proceeding, which may, perhaps, be accounted for by the doubt which appears to have existed as to whether there had, in fact, been any enrolment; and if the Lord Chancellor was of opinion that under the circumstances there had been no enrolment, or that there was doubt about it; or that, if the enrolment was good, there was sufficient ground for vacating it, he may have thought it right to remove the doubt by his order of the 28th of May, 1835. The question, however, now is, whether it be necessary to dispose of this appeal upon the ground of this irregularity, and, after all the expense and delay which has been experienced, to send the parties back to commence their proceedings de novo, so far as to make it necessary for the respondent to appeal against the decree of the 12th February, 1835, instead of deciding any of the questions between the parties upon the appellant's appeal against the decree of the 13th July, 1835. A Court of appeal is always unwilling to adopt such a course, when it is possible to reach any of the merits of the case. In questions respecting the enrolment of decrees, the Court exercises a discretionary power; (a) and although such discretion ought to be regulated by precedent and authority, yet the circumstances of this case were very peculiar, and I think that your Lordships will not consider it to be your duty upon this question of form to refuse to entertain the other points in the cause.

* If, then, your Lordships feel at liberty to consider the *35 merits of the decree of dismissal of the 12th of February, 1835, it is material to consider that the decree contains in its recitals the grounds upon which it was founded. It recites that the plaintiff had, by his counsel in open Court, waived insisting on any relief in respect to the final decree in the Exchequer, and the sale made in pursuance thereof, and that it appeared that the lands had been sold subject to the leases. It proceeds then to dismiss the bill against the lessees with costs. It is unnecessary to consider whether, if these recitals in the decree of the plaintiff having waived insisting on any relief in respect to the decree of the Exchequer, and the sale made in pursuance thereof, were consistent with the fact, it would necessarily lead to a dismissal of the bill against the lessees, because it appears to me evident from the proceedings, independently of the affidavits, that the recital must have been inserted from a misapprehension. It is, indeed, stated in one of the affidavits that it was introduced after the hearing, and this is not contradicted; but upon a rehearing, there can be no reason for binding the plaintiff by this evident mistake by the officers of the Court. The whole transaction proves that the plaintiff's counsel could not have done what the decree recites, because the arrangement with the Chinerys was to be carried into effect by a decree. The proposal was, that the defendants should submit to a decree; and a reference had been obtained to inquire on behalf of one of them, who was a lunatic, whether it would be for his benefit to submit to the proposed decree. Now, from the terms of the recital, it would be inferred that the plaintiff had waived all relief against the decree and sale in the Exchequer; whereas, in fact, * 36 the defendant had at * the time agreed, subject to the inquiry, to submit to a decree in the plaintiff's favour. This having been so arranged, the counsel might naturally have informed the Court that the plaintiff had not to trouble the Court to adjudicate as against the Chinnerys; but not because the relief against them had been abandoned, but because the terms of it had been arranged; and this, no doubt, led to the mistake. If this had been rightly understood at the time, I cannot think there would have been a decree of dismissal without any decision upon the merits. A decree so arranged with the Chinnerys must have had the same effect as if the Court had pronounced it; with this difference only, that the lessees might themselves have disputed the plaintiff's title to any interest in the estate. It was not competent for any of the defendants at the hearing to insist that the relief prayed against the Chinnerys and against the lessees had been improperly joined in one suit; and if not, and if the plaintiff had shown a good title to relief against the Chinnerys, and had so established an interest sufficient to entitle him to dispute the validity of the leases, the Court could not have declined to adjudicate upon the subject.

It was, indeed, contended, that independently of this title to question the leases, there was sufficient interest left in the plaintiff, notwithstanding the sale in the Exchequer, to entitle him to ask a decree to set aside the leases, the sale having been subject to the leases, so that nothing more was disposed of than what remained of the estate after deducting the interests comprised in the leases; so that so much of such interests as had not been effectually given to the lessees, not belonging to the lessees and not having been sold, remained undisposed of in the original * 37 decree; but it * is not necessary to give any opinion upon that point, because if the plaintiff had an equity to set aside the decree in the Exchequer and the sale had in pursuance thereof, or if these proceedings were in themselves defective, his title to raise the question respecting the leases cannot be disputed; and I have the satisfaction to find from the printed report that Sir EDWARD SUGDEN entirely concurs in this view of the case, and gives it as his decided opinion that the suit was not in its original joinder multifarious, but that the plaintiff, disputing the title of the mortgagees under the decree in the Exchequer and the sale, was clearly entitled in the same suit to raise his objection to the leases. If, then, he was so entitled to assert in one suit his equity as against the decree and sale, and also against the lessees, he must have been entitled in that suit to relief as to both, if he succeeded in making out his case. Suppose, at the hearing, he had made out his case so far as to set aside the decree and sale in the Exchequer, or to prove that they were defective and void, and that he was therefore still entitled to the equity of redemption, he would, no doubt, in that case have been entitled to ask of the Court a decision as to the leases, and this right could not properly depend upon the greater or less degree of resistance which the mortgagees might make to the plaintiff's title to relief as against them. If, at the hearing, they had, by their counsel, said that they could not resist the plaintiff's title to redeem, the hearing, as against them, would have been closed, and the title as to the lessees would alone have remained for decision ; but this is, in fact, what was done ; the terms upon which the plaintiff was to have his decree against the mortgagees had been the subject of negotiation, but the groundwork of the whole was that the plaintiff should have a decree for redemption * against them ; nor could the defendants, the lessees, be * 38 in any degree prejudiced by this, for notwithstanding this arrangement, it was quite competent for them, and it necessarily formed part of their case, that the plaintiff had no title to question the leases, not having in him sufficient estate and interest to enable him to do so. For this purpose it was part of their case to insist that by the decree in the Exchequer, and the sale had in pursuance of it, the plaintiff had lost that estate and interest which was necessary to enable him to question the leases ; and this was as much open to them after the arrangement with the mortgagees as before it took place, for if the lessees could show that before that arrangement the plaintiff had not any such estate and interest, his acquiring the estate and interest of the mortgagees, even before the hearing, would not have improved his situation ; but, in fact, he had it not at that time. If, as seems to have been understood at the time, the plaintiff had consented to the mortgagees keeping the estate under the sale, the plaintiff's position, as between himself and the lessees, would, no doubt, have been materially altered ; but as the arrangement was that he should redeem the mortgages, I think that he was as much entitled to a judgment against the lessees, according to the merits, as if he had proved his title to redeem adversely against the mortgagees. Possibly the lessees may have relied upon the mortgagees fighting that part of the case which turned upon the want of title in the plaintiff; but as it was undoubtedly competent for the lessees to have done that themselves, they cannot complain if a decree has passed against them from their having omitted to insist upon a point in the case which was open to them.

* 39 It appears to me, therefore, that your Lordships * must come to the conclusion, that the grounds for the dismissal in February, 1835, cannot be maintained. If that be so, it appears to me that there is the greatest difficulty in your Lordships proceeding any further in adjudicating upon the question between the parties; I mean, so as to pronounce any judgment upon the leases, as to which the case stands thus: there has been no adjudication below upon that subject; there is the certificate of the Court of Common Pleas against the leases; there was an argument in February, 1835, before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, assisted by the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Chief Baron, but no judgment was pronounced upon it, the Lord Chancellor having been of opinion that the suit must be dismissed upon the point of form already observed upon. He, indeed, expressed a strong opinion in favour of the leases, but carefully guarded against any inference that he was deciding upon their validity. When the cause came on again before Lord PLUNKET, the lessees declined taking any other case for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, and Lord PLUNKET made his decree setting the leases aside. After the opinion of one Court of Law has been obtained upon a case, if the Equity Judge entertains doubts as to the opinion returned, or thinks the case of so much difficulty and importance as to require further consideration, it is almost, of course, to send it for the opinion of another Court; it is certainly not necessary so to do, as the Judge in equity may take upon himself to decide against the opinion of the Court of Law; but clearly the parties cannot require him so to do, or complain of his declining to decide the question without further assistance. If, therefore, the parties against whose case the Judges have certified, decline the offer of the Court to have another case sent to another discretion if you were to open the door to further litigation, on behalf of a party who had declined to accept the offer of the Court below to put the case in the ordinary course for final adjudication.

But there certainly are great peculiarities in the present case : what had taken place in the cause may naturally have led the lessees to think that they had a good ground for getting rid of the suit, without referring their title to further question ; which ground they must have abandoned had they accepted the offer of a second case. I do therefore think that it would be hard, and might lead to injustice, if we were to bind them by their refusal to accept that offer, particularly in a case in which there has been such a conflict of opinions upon the point of law : and I am the more inclined to think so because I do not see in the last decree any such inquiries and reservations of right, as it would seem the lessees would be entitled to before their leases could be taken away : for instance, I find that in the decree of 1802, they are ordered to account from 1784 to the party entitled to the arrears of the annuity, without reference to the amount which has been given upon the leases. Now before that can constitute a part of the claim of the Chinnerys, the lessees have a right to reserve those payments against the estate, and to stand in the place of that party for what excess of rent they might so pay, or what they might themselves advance. What was done upon this does not appear from the appeal papers, but it is obvious that a considerable demand may have arisen in favour of the lessees from the provisions of that decree ; but the decree of July, 1835, * simply declares the leases void, and proceeds to put the * 41 plaintiff into possession.

Now, it is very possible that these and other points may have been overlooked in the contest which was going on as to the principal matters in issue ; and this affords another reason to induce this House not to attempt finally to settle the decree between the parties. It is, however, quite sufficient that, as to the question about the validity of the leases, there has been no judgment below, except the last decree, which proceeds upon the lessees' refusal to accept the offer of another case ; and which for the reasons I have given, I think ought not to bind them. I think, therefore, that for the purpose of obtaining such an adjudication, the case must be sent back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland ; that Court will of course use its own discretion as to the manner of disposing of that question ; that is, whether by deciding it itself, or calling for further assistance from another Court of Law. My object is, that this question should come before the Court relieved from all the difficulties with which it has hitherto been embarrassed: and this, I think, will be attained by this House declaring that it was competent for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, at the time of making the decree of the 12th of February, 1835, to adjudicate between the plaintiff and the defendants, the lessees, as to the validity of the leases: and, with that declaration, remitting the case to that Court, to be heard upon that question, and to make such decree between the plaintiff and the lessees as shall be just.

It is true, that if the lessees should adhere to the course they followed below, of declining another case, and should not ask for inquiries as to advances made by the lessees, expense might be saved by your Lordships now dealing with the case upon
 * 42 that ground: * but unless I am so informed, I shall not suppose that to be the case. I therefore move your Lordships that the case be remitted to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, with the declaration and direction proposed.

It was declared by the Lords, &c., "that it was competent for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, at the time of making the decree of the 12th of February, 1835, (a) to adjudicate between the plaintiff and the defendants, the lessees, in the said suit in the Court below, as to the validity of the said leases: And it was ordered, that with this declaration the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to be heard upon that question, and to make such decree between the said plaintiff and the said defendants, the lessees, as shall be just and consistent with this declaration and judgment." 71 Lords' Journ. 370 & 648.

[After the cause was remitted, a case was sent by the Lord Chancellor to the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, and the questions as to the validity of the leases were again fully argued. Three of the Judges, viz., Chief Justice BUSHE, and Justices BURTON and PERRIN, certified that the three leases to the Sheehys were not, nor was any of them, warranted by the power contained in the deed of the 25th of May, 1779: Mr. Justice CRAMPTON, the Municipal Elections. Practice. Competency of Procedure. Competency of Appeal.

The House of Lords will, on appeal, interfere with the practice of the Courts below in respect of procedure, when the form of procedure admitted below appears to be incompetent and to lead to dangerous results.

A bill of suspension and interdict is an incompetent procedure to try and determine the merits of contested municipal elections.

Procedure by bill of suspension and interdict cannot be taken against a party in possession of an office, to question his right thereto, by a party who is not in possession ; nor can it apply to a case where neither party is in possession, nor to acts done anterior to the act of election.

Where a party is in the legal and undisputed possession of a municipal office, it is competent for him, by suspension and interdict, to protect his office against the unauthorized intrusion of a party who has no title to the office : but it does not put into office a party who has the abstract right to it.

An interlocutor, passing a bill of suspension, and granting interdict, is subject to appeal to the House of Lords, within the 48 Geo. 3, c. 151.

May 30. June 3, 6, 13.

MR. WILLIAM MILLS was elected a member of the town council of the city of Glasgow, at the first municipal election under the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 76 (in November, 1833) ; and on the 7th of November, 1834, he was chosen by the council to be lord provost, that office having become vacant by the resignation of Mr. Graham, who had been elected to it in 1833, under the new system. Mr. Mills remained in office as provost until November, 1837, being three years from the time of his election as lord provost (the statutory period), and four years from the

(a) The question which was raised but not decided, in the case of Monteith v. M'Gavin (ante, Vol. V. p. 459), namely, whether an application to the Court of Session, by bill of suspension and interdict, is a competent mode of procedure to try the validity of an election of a municipal officer, and of his right to the office in a Royal burgh in Scotland, has been, among other questions, determined in the present case.

* 44 time of his election as * town councillor. On the 7th of November, 1837, a new election of town councillors took place ; and Mr. Mills, having been one of the third part of the councillors who were bound by the provisions of the statute to go out of office on that day, went out accordingly, but was again put in nomination for one of the wards of the city, and was replaced in the council for that ward. The poll-books were transmitted to him next day as lord provost, in order that he might, with the assistance of the town-clerk, cast up the votes and declare the persons elected, &c. ; but in consequence of a protest by several registered voters and town councillors against Mr. Mills, insisting that his period of office expired on the 7th, and that, as there was no provost, the senior magistrate was the proper officer to cast up the votes and declare the elections, and generally to act as chief magistrate until a provost was elected. Mr. Henry Paul, who filled the office of first bailie, by the advice of the assessor of the city presided with Mr. Mills at that meeting, and both signed the minutes. On the 9th of November there was another meeting for the purpose of swearing in the councillors who had accepted, and at that meeting Mr. Paul alone presided, and administered the oaths of office to the new town councillors, and to Mr. Mills among the rest ; which was alleged as the reason of his not presiding, as he could not administer the oaths to himself. On the 10th of November, in pursuance of the provisions of the statute, a meeting was held for the purpose of electing a provost and other office-bearers. Mr. Mills claimed to preside at that meeting, insisting on his right to hold the office of lord provost until a successor should be elected ; some of the councillors protested against his presiding, and that Mr. Paul
* 45 was senior magistrate and had the exclusive right ; * against which there was a counter protest by other councillors. The result was that Mr. Mills and Mr. Paul presided together.

Mr. Dunlop (the respondent) was proposed by one party for the office of lord provost ; Mr. Fleming (the appellant) was proposed by another party. There being an equality of votes, Mr. Mills declared that he gave his casting vote for Mr. Fleming, and Mr. Paul declared that he gave his casting vote for Mr. Dunlop.

Mr. Mills declared Mr. Fleming duly elected lord provost, and Mr. Paul declared the same of Mr. Dunlop; whereupon a councillor protested that the latter had not been duly elected, and against his induction into office, and protested that Mr. Fleming had been duly elected and ought to be inducted: another councillor made similar protests against Mr. Fleming, and in favour of the election and induction of Mr. Dunlop. Mr. Mills then administered the oaths of office to Mr. Fleming, who subscribed thereto; and Mr. Paul administered the like oaths to Mr. Dunlop, who subscribed the same. Mr. Mills then invested Mr. Fleming with the gold chain and other symbols of office which he himself held. Mr. Fleming and Mr. Dunlop then took the chairs respectively vacated by Mr. Mills and Mr. Paul, and they both subscribed the minutes of the election of certain magistrates and office-bearers elected at the meeting, &c.

Mr. Fleming continued, subsequently, to do several acts appertaining to the duties and privileges of lord provost, without any interference or interruption by Mr. Dunlop, who also performed some acts, and was recognized by his party as the duly elected lord provost.

Mr. Dunlop presented, as soon as was possible, a bill of suspension and interdict to the Court of Session, alleging therein his right to the office of lord * provost, and praying * 46 the protection of the Court against the attempts of Mr. Fleming to usurp that office and its privileges, and to molest him in the execution thereof. The bill set forth, among other things, extracts from the 15th, 16th, 17th, 22d, 24th (a), and other

(a) The 15th section enacts that upon the first Tuesday of November, 1834, and in every succeeding year, the electors in such burghs (contained in schedule C., which includes Glasgow) shall in their several wards or districts, and the other burghs, at their meetings, assemble and elect, in manner hereinbefore prescribed in relation to the first election under this Act, one-third part, or as nearly as may be one-third part, of the council of such burghs, in the place of the third part thereof who shall as hereinafter directed go annually out of office.

The 16th enacts that upon the said first Tuesday of November in the year 1834, and in every succeeding year, one-third, or a number as near as may be to one-third, of the whole council of each such burgh shall go out of office; and in the said year 1834, the third who shall go out shall consist of the councillors who had the smallest number of votes at the election of councillors in this present year (1833); and in the succeeding year (1835), the third of the councillors first elected under this Act who shall go out shall consist of the councillors who at such first election under this Act had the next smallest number of votes (the majority of the council always determining, where

* 47 sections of * the Statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 76, for regulating municipal corporations in Scotland: it stated the proceedings at the election of councillors on the 7th of November, and insisted that Mr. Mills must be held, upon the true construction of the Act, to have that day gone out of office, not only as councillor, but also as lord provost; and that his re-election as councillor, instead of resuscitating the office of provost in him, or destroying the fact of his having vacated it, was in itself a proof of the vacancy, which was left to be filled up by a new election. The bill also set forth, at length, the minutes of the three meetings of the council on the 8th, 9th, and 10th of November, with the protests and counter protests, to the effect hereinbefore stated.

The Lord Ordinary, by an interlocutor of the 17th of November, 1837, appointed the bill to be intimated and answered, &c., and the bill and answers to be printed, &c., in order to be reported to the Court, &c.

Mr. Fleming accordingly lodged answers, in which he gave in a narrative of facts; and, in conclusion, relied on the following pleas in law: 1st, that the application to the Court by bill of the votes for any such persons shall have been equal, who shall be the person to retire); and thereafter the third of the councillors so annually going out of office shall always consist of the councillors who have been longest in office; provided always that any councillors so going out of office shall be capable of being immediately re-elected.

The 17th enacts that the councillors of all such burghs not contained in schedule F. to this Act annexed (Glasgow is not contained in that schedule) respectively so elected and accepting, shall upon the third lawful day after the election of the whole number of such councillors in the present year (1833), assemble in the town-hall or other usual public place of meeting within such burgh, and shall there by a plurality of voices (the councillor who had the greatest number of votes at the election of councillors having a casting or double vote, in case of equality) elect from among their own number a provost, or chief magistrate, the number of bailies fixed by the set or usage of such burgh, a treasurer, or other usual and ordinary office-bearers, &c.

The 24th enacts that when any magistrate or office-bearer, other than the provost or chief magistrate and treasurer, shall be in the third of the council going out of office, the place of such magistrate or office-bearer shall be supplied by election by the council, as soon as the full number thereof shall have been completed by the annual election of the third then hereby directed to take place; the said election to be made by plurality of voices, and the chief or senior attending magistrate to have a double or casting vote in case of equality. Provided always that the provost or chief magistrate, and the treasurer, shall always remain in office for the period of three years, and that they, as well as all the other magistrates or office-bearers, shall at all times be capable of being re-elected.

suspension and interdict was not a competent mode of procedure to try and determine the question as to the validity of the election; and, if it were, the proper parties were not called (viz., the whole councillors): 2dly, assuming that it was a competent procedure, that he was validly elected, and legally in possession of the office: and, * 3dly, assuming that his own election * 48 might be held liable to objection, that Mr. Dunlop had no right to the office, nor title to interfere with him in the exercise of it.

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause to the Court.

The Lords of the second division of the Court of Session, in the bill chamber, having considered the pleadings, and heard argument thereon, pronounced an interlocutor on the 7th of December, appointing the case to be put to the roll on the 15th; and another interlocutor on the 16th of December, passing the bill, and granting the interdict as craved. (a)

Mr. Dunlop expedited his letters of suspension and interdict, and served Mr. Fleming on the 21st; but Mr. Fleming had, on the 20th of December, presented his petition of appeal to this House against the interlocutors. Mr. Dunlop soon afterwards presented to the House a petition, praying that the petition of appeal might be dismissed as incompetent. Both petitions were referred to the appeal committee, who sustained the appeal.

While the appeal was pending various acts and arrangements, not necessary to be noticed here, took place between the parties respectively and the town council of Glasgow, for the more convenient discharge of the duties of the office of lord provost, without prejudice to the rights of either, until the decision of this House should be obtained.

The appeal was heard on the 30th of May, and the 3d and 6th of June, 1839.

The Lord Advocate (Mr. Rutherford) and Mr. M. D. Hill, for the appellant. — If any review can be had of * municipal * 49 elections, on the merits, while conducting in accordance with the new statute (b), the procedure must be by action of reduction and declarator. The merits of the election could not possibly be tried and determined in a proceeding by bill of suspension and interdict, especially where it is brought against the party in possession; the effect of interdict being to prohibit the party from acting, thereby leaving the office as it were vacant, and the duties unperformed, as it could not put another party in his place. The bill in this case put the merits of the election in issue; it set forth the governing clauses of the Act, (a) and the minutes of the meetings of council; from which conclusions are drawn that the election of the appellant was invalid, and that of the respondent valid. The appellant's answer embodies opposite conclusions. The Court below would consequently have, in this form of procedure, to try and determine the validity of the election. The new statute did not alter the laws and usages applicable to the trial of burgh elections under the old system; the 36th section of the new Act declared that all former laws and usages remain in force, except so far as they are inconsistent with the new Act. The only alteration effected in respect to the elections by that Act, is the substitution of a triennial, for an annual, election of lord provost and treasurer. No case can be found, after diligent search of the reports and records for a century, in which a bill of suspension and interdict was applied to the trial of a contested burgh election. The procedure has ever been by reduction and declaration, or by petition and complaint, a * 50 summary * proceeding given by the Acts 7 Geo. 2, c. 16, and 16 Geo. 2, c. 11, which is now deemed to be taken away. When the procedure by suspension and interdict was first attempted in Orr v. Vallance, (b) in 1831, the Court of Session decided that it was incompetent, and that decision was referred to in 1832 as settled law, in the case of Watson v. The Commissioners of Police of Glasgow (c). [Those cases, and others that were cited in this part of the argument, are stated by the Lord Chancellor, post, p. 57 et seq.]

(a) 16 Dunl. B. & M. 254.

(b) 8 & 4 Will. 4, c. 76.

It would be a most dangerous position to hold that the election of the appellant was invalid on the ground that Mr. Mills was not the proper presiding officer, on the 10th of November, to give the casting vote; yet that is the ground of the respondent's claim of right to the office. The existence of corporations depends on the fundamental principle of perpetual successions. The continued existence of the municipal functionaries is necessary for the administration of the offices of the corporation until successors to them are elected. Were there a discontinuance of the office of provost in Glasgow, the greatest inconvenience would follow; the civil, judicial, and administrative powers would be all in abeyance. By the 24th section of the Municipal Corporations Reform Act, the provost and chief magistrate shall remain in office for three years. There was to be a perpetual continuance from the day of their election until, by the lapse of three completed years, their powers should be transmitted to their successors by new election, or retained by themselves by re-election. Mr. Mills's period of three years in the office of provost was not completed until the 10th of November. Although, * therefore, he was among the third of the council going * 51 out of the council within the statutory period of three years, there was no discontinuance of the office of provost until the close of the 10th of November and a successor was elected. The 10th, 31st, and other sections of the new statute, gave additional force to that position.

(c) Fac. Coll. 10 March, 1832.

Mr. Paul, on whose casting vote the respondent's assertion of right to the office of provost is founded, had no lawful casting vote; he was not the senior magistrate, and had no right to preside. The concession by Mr. Mills, on the recommendation of the assessor, to allow Mr. Paul to preside with him, does not affect the question. His office of senior bailie was subject to annual election, and he was out of that office in fact on the 7th of November, and his powers were extinguished, unless he was re-elected on the 10th. But as the election of provost precedes that of the bailies, he would have no right to preside at the election of provost: should it be held that his powers as bailie continued until the election of a successor or his own re-election, then by the same rule the powers of Mr. Mills as provost commenced, and the provost unquestionably is the senior magistrate and has the casting vote.

No question can be raised now as to the competency of this appeal. Objections were made to it before the Lords of the appeal committee, who disposed of them by sustaining the appeal: that would be a sufficient answer to any objection that might be made to the appeal at the bar, on that point. There was no ground for objecting that the appeal was prohibited by the Act of the 48 Geo. 3, c. 151. If the Lord Ordinary had refused the bill, unquestionably that would be a final judgment, and therefore appealable. * Then why should the appeal lie * 52 against the interlocutors admitting the bill, as much as if it had been refused? In any view, the interlocutors, as far as they granted an interim interdict, were subject to appeal.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Knight Bruce, for the respondent. — This appeal is incompetent, in the terms of the Act 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, (a) as being an appeal against an unanimous judgment of an interlocutory nature, without leave of the Court below. It was not a judgment or decree finally exhausting the merits, but merely opening the way for a final discussion of them upon the letters of suspension. The interlocutory orders on the suspension and interdict did no more than direct a change of the possession of the office. It is frequently necessary, in the course of a cause in the Court of Session, to make regulations respecting the interim possession of property and offices; and it would lead always to serious inconvenience, and sometimes to an obstruction of the administration of justice, if these regulations were subject to appeal without leave of the Court, as every appeal had the effect of bringing up the whole record, and of stopping further proceedings in the Court below: besides, it was not usual with the House to interfere with the practice or procedure of the Courts below, which are admitted to be the best and the only proper judges of their own forms of procedure.

* 53 The question between the parties on the merits is * on whom did the election fall? That question depends on another; namely, whether the casting vote, which indisputably resided in Mills or Paul, belonged to the former or to the latter? And that question again comes to this: had Mills ceased to be provost on the 7th, when he ceased to be a town councillor; or did he continue, not only to the 10th, but to the completion of the 10th of November? But on reference to the minutes of the meetings, and to the provisions of the statute, it would appear quite clear that the casting vote given by Mills was inadmissible, as he had not then a status or privileges under his former office of provost, which had wholly ceased on the 7th, when he ceased to be a councillor, for he could not be provost when he was not councillor. That position is confirmed by the fact that Mills did not preside at the meeting on the 9th, when Paul alone presided, and his title to preside on that day as senior bailie and chief magistrate continued till the election of provost on the 10th; he therefore was the person who had the casting vote, and that vote being given to the respondent, gave him the election. The respondent being therefore duly elected lord provost, he was entitled to have the appellant interdicted from molesting him in the exercise of his office. [It is not necessary to repeat the arguments applied to the merits of the election, as there was no decision given on them by the House].

With respect to the objections to the procedure, it cannot be doubted that the Court of Session had jurisdiction to give redress in this case. The respondent avers a wrong done to him; that he was duly elected lord provost, and is molested by the usurpation of his office by the appellant, who had no title to assume the office, and the respondent seeks to interdict him * from so acting. The Court has undoubtedly jurisdiction * 54 to give protection to the respondent; but in what shape that protection is to be afforded is not a question of jurisdiction but of form, which the party has a right to choose, and the Court, it is submitted, a right to adopt and approve. In cases of wrongful encroachment on legal rights, where a summary remedy is necessary, the procedure by suspension and interdict is well recognized. (Erskine, B. iv. tit. 3, sect. 20; Darling's Practice, 283, and the cases there cited.) The summary redress by the Acts of the 7 & 16 Geo. 2, are no longer available. The procedure by reduction and declaration would give the respondent no redress, and would be wholly inapplicable to this case, for the title is with the respondent. The only shape, therefore, in which the appellant could obtain redress was the mode of proceeding by suspension and interdict. No doubt was entertained of the competency of this procedure in a recent case of usurpation on the rights of a municipal councillor, by a party pretending a right to exclude him. Scott v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh. (a)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — This case raises a question of the utmost importance; not so much as affecting the interests of the parties to this litigation, but as respecting the general rule, which, if not properly laid down for the guidance of the Court below in future cases, may be extremely prejudicial to the corporations and corporation law of Scotland. It has been considered that the provisions of the statutes of the 7 Geo. 2, c. 16,

(a) 1 Dunl. B. & M. 347 (N. S.)

* 55 and 16 Geo. 2, c. 11, giving a summary * remedy, by application by petition and complaint to the Court of Session, in questions arising out of municipal elections, do not apply to the system of corporations now established under the Municipal Corporations Reform Act. I think your Lordships will find that from that circumstance a course is likely to be adopted, which, if not properly regulated, may lead to very serious consequences as affecting these corporations.

The facts of the case which gave rise to the present litigation were simply these: Upon the election in November, 1837, in the corporation of Glasgow, two persons were candidates for the office of lord provost; the votes of the council being equal for each, the election came to be decided by the casting vote of the presiding officer. It was made a matter of question, whether the lord provost, who had been in office the three preceding years, was the presiding officer; that is, whether he continued lord provost up to the 10th of November, when the election took place, or whether he had ceased to be lord provost on the 7th of November. If he had ceased to be lord provost, another person would be entitled to preside as the senior magistrate. The question therefore was, whether the one or the other had the casting vote: the one voted for the one side, and the other voted for the other; so that the question who had been elected lord provost, turned on the question who was the presiding officer at that election. There was no possession of the office by either party; each claimed to have been properly elected, and there was nothing done which could be said to put either party in possession. Under these circumstances one of the parties applied in the bill chamber for an interdict. The Lord Ordinary reported it to the inner * 56 house, and the inner house, upon * an application for a suspension and interdict, granted an interdict against one party; and that is the subject of this appeal. The first question therefore raised, independently of the merits of the election, is, whether this be a proper course of proceeding to decide upon the merits of the election under the circumstances which occurred in this case.

It seems to be a statement common to both sides that there is a great paucity of authorities to be found in the records of proceedings in the Court of Session on this subject; and that may be accounted for during the period anterior to the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 76, when the statutes of George II. (a) were in force. I find, however, that although there may be but few cases, there seems to be no question as to certain propositions that may be laid down; namely, that a proceeding by suspension and interdict cannot apply against a party in possession of an office; it is equally clear that it is not applicable to proceedings prior to the election. It can hardly be supposed to apply to any case, except where, from the proceedings at the election, it is a matter of doubt who has been elected, neither party being in possession of the office which is the subject of the election. But there is ample authority that this mode of proceeding is not the mode to decide the question of election in a burgh election at all.

There is another class of cases, indeed, with regard to which the authorities seem consistent; namely, that where there is an undisputed right to an office, and the party is in possession of the office, it is not incompetent to apply this mode of proceeding for the purpose of protecting the person in possession of the office against an unauthorized intrusion by a mere stranger;

* but your Lordships, I think, will find that it is confined * 57 to cases where the title to the office is so clear and so free from doubt that there is no question to be adjudicated upon as to the title to the office. I find almost all these propositions laid down, and by all the Judges, in the case of Orr v. Vallance, (a) (in 1831). The Lord Justice Clerk in that case says: "I have a clear opinion that this application (for suspension and interdict) is incompetent. I apprehend that there is no point more thoroughly fixed than that there is no process for reviewing proceedings of town councils filling up a vacancy, real or supposed, other than by petition and complaint, or reduction." Petition and complaint do not apply now to the corporations in Scotland. "Then what is the nature of this? It is in form, no doubt, a complaint against the actings of this person Vallance as chief magistrate; but what is put in issue is the validity of the election by the town council, and we have the regular minutes of the election as an appendix to the bill. If we could sustain such applications under the miserable cover that they are only against the actings of the man, there would be no case in which the same sort of argument might not be used to sanction a bill of this kind, instead of a complaint or reduction, in which it is a fundamental principle that the council, one and all, must be called. It is not necessary to enter into the question whether all the parties are called, for on the incompetency alone I think the bill must be refused." Lord GLENLEE said: "I am of the same opinion. If Dods" — the party who was unquestionably in possession of the office — "had applied, it would have been a different case; but the complainers had no title in them, and we must first * 58 * of all enter into the consideration of the merits of the election, which is incompetent in the present shape." [His Lordship having read the concurring opinions of Lord CRINGLETIE and Lord MEADOWBANK, said:] It is impossible that any doctrine can be laid down more distinct in itself or more directly applicable to the present cause. They say that that Court cannot try the merits of an election in a proceeding by suspension and interdict. But that case is supposed to have been interfered with by the case of Watson v. The Commissioners of Police of Glasgow, (a) which took place in the following year (1832). The circumstances of that case are by no means similar. It was not a burgh election. The learned Judges took a distinction between the two cases, recognizing to the full extent the doctrine laid down in Orr v. Vallance; the Lord Justice Clerk saying, "The case of Vallance is in no respect parallel to the present; the former referring to a burgh election, as to which there must be either a petition and complaint, or a reduction."

At an earlier date than those cases (in 1825), was the case of Drysdale v. The Magistrates of Kirkaldy, (b) the facts of which are not similar to the present; it is only valuable for the doctrine laid down, "That where a question of right to an office is in dispute, a declarator is necessary; and that a suspension and interdict is the proper form for complaining of any interference or molestation in the exercise of an office, the right to which does not require to be declared." Up to the time at which it was declared that the summary proceedings under the statutes of George II. were not applicable to the present state of Scotch * 59 burghs, there does not appear to have been any difference * of opinion amongst the learned Judges there, that the question of an election in burghs could not be tried by suspension and interdict.

After it was found that that mode of proceeding was not applicable, it appears to me that an attempt has been made, or rather a disposition has been manifested, to introduce a mode of proceeding which was not considered as competent before that time.

(a) Fac. Coll. 10 March, 1832.

(b) 4 Shaw & D. 658.

Now, upon all the cases to which I have referred, nothing can be more clear than this proposition, that where a party was in possession of an office, his title to that office could not be questioned by proceedings of suspension and interdict; that it was necessary to proceed by process of reduction or declarator. There are obvious reasons, to which I shall presently advert, which show how utterly incompetent a proceeding of suspension and interdict would be to effect the object in view. But I am now referring to it only for the purpose of showing that, up to the year 1831, no doubt was entertained that suspension and interdict was not applicable to that state of things. Previous to this very election, one of the circumstances which gave rise to the election of Lord Provost, was the election of one of the councillors of the name of M'Gavin; and your Lordships will find, by referring to the report of M'Gavin's Case, (a) which was argued during the last session, that M'Gavin was actually elected, — actually then in possession of his office. Those who questioned his right to be a councilman depending upon a supposed defect in the list of electors, applied for a process of suspension and interdict. The Judges thought, under the circumstances, it was not a case in which they ought to grant an *interdict, but they sus- * 60 tained the competency of the proceeding; so that in M'Gavin's Case they sustained the competency, although the proceeding by suspension and interdict was applied to a party actually in possession of his office, which in the three cases I have mentioned was considered by all the Judges as a totally incompetent proceeding for the purpose of questioning the title of a person in possession of an office.

Such is the state of the authorities; now for one moment let me call your Lordships' attention to the effect of proceeding by the process of suspension and interdict. The result, and the only result of it, can be to prohibit one party, the party against whom it is directed, from exercising the functions of an office which he either is in possession of, or which he claims the right to exercise; it decides nothing as to the right of election. It may prevent one man from exercising the duties of the office, but it does nothing towards putting any other person in his place; an observation which occurred to me when your Lordships were considering the case of Monteith v. M'Gavin, and was strongly exemplified by what had then taken place, but had not then been brought under your Lordships' consideration.

(a) Monteith v. M'Gavin, 5 Cl. & Fin. 459; 3 Shaw & M'L. 290.

The only means of trying the right of parties to any office in a corporation, must be, first of all, to try the right of the party in possession, and then by some process to try the right of the party who claims to stand in his place. The proceeding by suspension and interdict may do the one, — it may undoubtedly displace the party in possession, not by depriving him of the office, but by prohibiting him from exercising the functions of the office. It does not declare that any other person ought to be elected

* 61 in * his place, but prohibits the individual from exercising the functions of the office. It is not, therefore, surprising that the learned Judges, up to the time when the difficulty arose with respect to the Statute 7 Geo. 2, c. 16, considered that the proceeding of suspension and interdict was wholly inapplicable for the purpose of trying the right to an office. In the present case, it is true that the party against whom the process was addressed cannot be considered as in possession of the office; because, a question having arisen as to the mode of election, both parties having claimed to be in possession of the office, in point of law it may be considered that neither of them is actually so. Now, if the learned Judges adopted this course of proceeding with the intention of deciding which of the two was really the lord provost of Glasgow, then they did that which in the cases of Orr v. Vallance, Drysdale v. The Magistrates of Kirkaldy, and Watson v. The Police Commissioners of Glasgow, to which I have referred, the Judges themselves stated distinctly that it was not competent for them to do upon that proceeding, because it would then be a proceeding to adjudicate upon the merits of an election in a case of suspension and interdict. But if they went on the ground that this is a mere intrusion, by a stranger, on the office of a party properly elected, they could never come to that conclusion without adjudicating that the other party had been first properly elected, and then to treat the other as a stranger intruding. They could not so treat him without considering the merits of the election. It is perfectly clear that they would have first to adjudicate on the merits of the election, and then to treat the other party as a mere intruder. But that applies only where the party is actually in possession; and if one party is not in

* 62 * possession, no more is the other party. I apprehend it is extremely difficult to explain the course that has been adopted, upon the supposition that they were acting upon that which is recognized as a competent mode of proceeding for protecting a party actually in possession of an office, against the unauthorized intrusion of a stranger. But if, on the other hand, they exercised a discretion as to the merits of an election, it must have been, in their opinion, a matter free from all doubt that the party upon whose account they allowed the suspension and interdict was the party duly elected.

It is not my intention, in the view I take of this case, to give any opinion as to the merits of the election; but to this extent I think your Lordships are bound to attend to what took place. It cannot be considered a matter free from doubt and difficulty which of the parties should be held to have been duly elected, the point turning upon the construction of the Act, as it is contended for by the appellant, being that the lord provost for the time being, who by the Act is to remain in possession of his office three years, is, according to his construction, to go out of office at the anniversary of the day of election; whereas the argument on the other side is, that he is to remain three municipal years in the office, and that he shall retain his office till his successor is appointed. There appear difficulties enough on either side, upon considering the different clauses of the Act, — difficulties, which the Judges of the Court of Session can hardly have considered before they came to the conclusion that there was no question at all to discuss between the parties; but if there was any question to be discussed between the parties, then they were adjudicating upon the right of election, and were in a cause * of * 63 suspension and interdict deciding which of these two parties had been properly elected lord provost, contrary to all preceding authorities, and contrary to the doctrine which has been acted upon in all the cases to which I have referred. That is the state of the contest between these parties. The Court of Session has, by an interlocutor upon a bill of suspension and interdict, prohibited the one party from exercising the duties of the office, and put no other party in possession of the office, leaving the town of Glasgow just as much without a lord provost by any adjudication of right as it was before.

It was urged at your Lordships' bar that great inconvenience would arise from interfering with the interlocutor, inasmuch as it would leave the parties, and all those interested in the affairs of the corporation, in a state of uncertainty as to who was lord provost. It is perfectly true that great inconvenience must arise from this state of things. But in a question which affects all the corporations of Scotland, and which therefore it is of the utmost importance to have rightly understood at the earliest period, — after the question has arisen, no inconvenience that may arise to any particular corporation ought to induce your Lordships to take a course that might be productive of mischief to the general administration of the affairs of corporations. Would no inconvenience arise from sustaining the interdict that has been pronounced? It is admitted that it is no adjudication upon the right to the office; but it is said, if the party had not appealed, and therefore if the process had gone on in the usual course, it was essentially necessary, according to the rules laid down for that purpose, that within a certain number of days a suit should

* 64 be instituted. But that suit would only have been a * more formal way of calling for the same species of interference by interdict, which had been already made by the Lord Ordinary in the bill chamber; that would leave the matter just where it was. It is said that the Judges might have called upon the parties to adopt proper proceedings, by which a proper adjudication might have been obtained. If your Lordships think that this interdict ought not to stand, it will be competent to either party to adopt those proceedings which may lead to an adjudication upon the question of right; nor am I aware that any time will be saved in coming to a final conclusion as to who is lord provost of Glasgow, by your Lordships' adopting either the one course or the other. I have referred to the principal authorities which have been cited as impeaching the competency of the proceedings by suspension and interdict. But if that had been a recognized course of proceeding, that is, if the Court had, by means of this summary process, the power of deciding questions upon controverted elections without the delay of a regular suit for that purpose, one would be inclined to ask, why was that summary proceeding given by the Statute of Geo. 2? If any summary process already existed, why give that summary process in addition, by petition of complaint? Nothing can be more rapid than the proceeding by suspension and interdict; and if it is competent for the judges by that proceeding to adjudicate upon the merits of an election, it could not, in point of rapidity, be improved upon by any other mode of proceeding. It is evident, therefore, that it was not known at that time that there were already existing in the Court of Session, means of deciding by summary process, and therefore the statute gave a mode of proceeding by petition of complaint.

* 65 * My Lords, two cases, and two only, have been cited as interfering with the doctrine laid down by the learned

Judges in the case I have referred to. The first is that of Chalmer v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh; (a) but that case does not appear on examination to be one which can have any influence upon your Lordships' judgment in the present instance. It was not a burgh election, which, according to the doctrine of the learned Judges already adverted to, makes a distinction between that and the other cases; nor was it an original application to the Court of Session to interfere with the existing right by suspension and interdict. It was a process of suspension and interdict, it is true; but it was an appeal to the Court of Session from the adjudication of the magistrates of Edinburgh, who had decided upon an election matter subject to their jurisdiction: therefore, although the proceeding was undoubtedly by suspension and interdict, it was a proceeding of such a nature as prevents it from being an authority in favour of the present proceeding. One cannot, however, but observe in that case something contrary to what is laid down generally as applicable to all cases of proceeding by suspension and interdict; namely, that it was a proceeding against the party actually possessed of the office. It might, therefore, well be a question, if the case was material to the present purpose, whether that decision would not be liable to be impeached upon the ground of its being a proceeding by interdict against the party actually in possession of the office. The other case referred to is Gray v. The Magistrates of Anstruther Wester. (b) That is a case which, so far from being applicable to the present, was a case where * the pro- * 66 ceeding was by petition and complaint, under the Statute of 7 Geo. 2, c. 16.

My Lords, it may, perhaps, be found necessary, if the Court of Session has lost the jurisdiction given to it by the Statute of 7 Geo. 2, and is incapable of administering justice in the case of controverted elections in burghs in Scotland by summary proceeding, that the legislature should interfere, in order that the Court of Session should have the summary power given to it which it had under the Statute of Geo. 2, and which it appears it has lost, with reference to the existing corporations of Scotland. Whether that ought or ought not to be done, is not now the matter for consideration; but the circumstance of the Court having lost the power under that statute, can be no reason why the power should be exercised under a jurisdiction which it appears, at the time when the Municipal Corporations Reform Act was passed, was found incompetent, and over and over again declared to be incompetent, for the purpose of trying elections in burghs in Scotland. It is impossible that justice can be done by this course; it is wholly incompetent to carry into effect that which must be the object of every Court, in interfering with questions as to the validity of these elections. But then another strong reason against your Lordships' sanctioning a proceeding of that character, is this: that there are already modes of proceeding which, although not summary, are calculated to meet every possible case that can arise. If the party is improperly in possession of an office, it is not a matter of dispute that the Court of Session has jurisdiction by process of reduction to displace him from that office. If the party be not actually in possession of that office, then there is nothing to reduce.

(b) Fac. Coll. 29 June, 1819.

* 67 If a question arises, which of two parties is * properly elected, then the proceeding by process of declarator is, beyond all question, competent and suited to the purpose of enabling the Court of Session to adjudicate between the parties, and to say which of the two is to be considered as properly exercising the duties and functions of the office. It is very true that these are not summary proceedings; but it is equally true, as I apprehend, and not disputed on either side at the bar, that, coupled with these proceedings, the proceeding by suspension and interdict might very well be applied; so that, pending the proceeding in which ultimate adjudication was to take place, the Court might, in the mean time, by virtue of this process of suspension and interdict, regulate as to the party who should happen to be in possession of the office. Whether that be or be not a course of proceeding consistent with the practice of the Court of Session, it is not necessary at present to consider; it was represented at the bar, and I find it referred to as the recognized practice in some of the cases to which I have adverted. The present question is, whether it is a wholesome practice that in the present case the Court of Session should proceed by suspension and interdict only.

There is another point to which I shall have to call your Lordships' attention. But upon the merits of the case, considering that this is a question at least difficult to be decided, which of these two parties is properly elected,—and therefore a question in which the proceeding by interdict cannot be supported upon the ground of its being a mere intrusion upon an office of which some other person is clearly and legally in possession, — I should advise your Lordships not to sanction a proceeding which, if acted upon by the Court of Session in Scotland, must obviously lead to serious consequences. * It has been objected that * 68 this appeal is incompetent, because this is not a final adjudication between the parties, and under the statute no appeal lies from an interlocutory order. The very general terms used in the statute (a) prohibiting appeals against interlocutory orders, no doubt, have created considerable difficulty in several cases which have occurred; and it is often matter of difficulty to ascertain within the meaning of that Act whether a particular proceeding is to be considered as interlocutory or not. From the best information I have been able to obtain as to the nature of this proceeding, it cannot be considered an interlocutory proceeding. It is a preliminary proceeding, it is true, but it is final as far as that proceeding itself is concerned, the proceeding being by application made ex parte in the first instance to the Lord Ordinary, in the bill chamber, stating the case and praying for an interdict; it prays that the Lord Ordinary may pass the bill and grant the interdict. If he passes the bill and grants the interdict, as far as passing the bill is concerned, it is merely an authority for a more regular proceeding being commenced; but it is final: he may refuse the bill, and if he refuses the bill nothing farther can be done in that proceeding; but the party may apply again to the same or to another Lord Ordinary, for letters of suspension and interdict. In considering whether this is final or not, and whether it is a subject of appeal or not, you must suppose the Lord Ordinary either to decide the one way or the other: suppose he refuses the bill, that may be productive of the greatest possible evil to the parties; but the opinion of the Lord Ordinary is final; that is, he refuses the interdict, because that is the effect of his refusing the bill; and he denies to the party the opportunity of * pursuing that remedy at least, though he * 69 may adopt some other, or may again apply to the Court for a similar remedy.

It seems hardly necessary to consider this any further, because I find by reference to a case which I believe was referred to in the argument, that your Lordships have entertained appeals upon proceedings of this kind. I find, in the case of Scott v. Brodie (b) (in 1803), that the Lord Ordinary had passed the bill and granted the interdict. That was the subject of an application to the Court of Session, which sustained the bill, but varied the terms of the interdict; so that there was the order of the Lord Ordinary confirmed, as to the principal part, by the Judges of the Court of Session. The interdict was in some degree altered; that was made the subject of appeal to your Lordships' House. Now, that was in precisely the same terms as the present, for all material purposes; for, although here the Lord Ordinary did not himself originally exercise a jurisdiction, but reported the case to the inner house, and the bill was in the first instance passed and the interdict granted by them, yet it was in that case the order of the Court of Session passing the bill and granting an interdict, that was made the subject of an appeal to this House. I do not apprehend, therefore, that your Lordships will feel any difficulty in exercising your jurisdiction in this case, and that you will not consider that it is taken away by the Act of Parliament, inasmuch as the proceeding, though preliminary, is a proceeding complete in itself, and therefore it is to all intents and purposes within the meaning of the Act a final adjudication, upon which an appeal will lie to this House upon the provisions of the Act.

(a) 48 G. 3, c. 151.

(b) Fac. Coll. (1803).

* 70 * I by no means wish to be understood as giving any opinion as to whether a jurisdiction exists by suspension and interdict in other cases; it is a question of practice which is much better left to those who are familiar with the practice of the Court of Session. But looking at the authorities which are to be found in the books, and finding this to be a question in which an interdict could not be granted without an adjudication upon the merits of the election, and finding that all the Judges have laid down, in the case to which I have referred, that it is not competent in proceeding by suspension and interdict to adjudicate upon the merits of the election, I think your Lordships will adopt the safest course by not sanctioning a proceeding which may lead to dangerous consequences, and which is contrary to all the authorities to be found in the books; but that your Lordships will adopt a much safer course by remitting it to the Court of Session to consider what is the best course to be taken in these cases, but not permitting them to interfere with the merits of an election upon a proceeding by suspension and interdict. The best way to effect that object, I submit to your Lordships, will be to reverse the interlocutor passing the bill and granting the interdict, which has been pronounced in the Court below.

The order made was, that the interlocutors complained of be reversed, and that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session, with instructions to refuse the bill of suspension, and to do otherwise therein as may be just and consistent with this judgment.

BIGNOLD v. SPRINGFIELD, In re NORWICH CHARITIES.

SAMUEL BIGNOLD and Another Appellants.
 THOMAS OSBORN SPRINGFIELD and Others Respondents.

Statute — Construction of Charities. Jurisdiction. Competency of Appeal.

By Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, § 71, it is enacted that all the estate and interest of such bodies corporate, or members thereof, as were seised or possessed of any real or personal estate in trust for charitable uses, should, in respect of such uses and trusts, continue in the persons, who at the time of passing the Act (1835) were such trustees, until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament should otherwise order, and should thereupon utterly cease and determine: provided that, if Parliament should not otherwise direct on or before the said 1st of August, the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal should make such orders as they should see fit, for the administration, subject to such charitable uses and trust as aforesaid, of the said charity estates and funds. Parliament did not pass any subsequent Act on the subject before the 1st of August, 1836.

Held, that the administration of the charity estates and funds did not continue in the persons so described, after the 1st of August, 1836; and that it was competent to the Lord Chancellor, after that day, to make orders for the appointment of new trustees for their administration.

Orders made by the Lord Chancellor in the matter of such charitable estates and funds, by virtue of the said Act and of the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, which last gives an appeal to the House of Lords, are subject to such appeal.

Whether orders made by virtue of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, alone, are subject to appeal, quære.

April 24, 1837. February 19, 21. June 25. August 5, 1839.

At the time of passing the Act of Parliament of the 5th & 6th Will. 4, c. 76, entitled, "An Act to provide for the regulation of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales," the corporate body of the city of Norwich, or some members thereof in their corporate capacity, stood solely, or together with other persons elected solely by such body corporate or solely by some particular * number of its members, seised or possessed for some estate or interest in various hereditaments, sums of money, chattels, securities for money, and other personal estate, producing an annual income of about 8000*l.*, in trust for various charities.

“ And whereas divers bodies corporate now stand seised or possessed of sundry hereditaments and personal estate, in trust, in whole or in part, for certain charitable trusts ; and it is expedient that the administration thereof be kept distinct from that of the public stock and borough fund ; be it enacted, that in every borough in which the body corporate, or any one or more of the members of such body corporate in his or their corporate capacity, now stands or stand solely, or together with any person or persons elected solely by such body corporate or solely by any particular number, class, or description of members of such body corporate, seised or possessed, for any estate or interest whatsoever, of any hereditaments, or any sums of money, chattels, securities for money, or any other personal estate whatsoever, in whole or in part, in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses or trusts whatsoever, all the estate, right, interest, and title, and all the powers of such body corporate, or of such member or members of such body corporate, in respect of the said uses and trusts, shall continue in the persons who at the time of the passing of this Act are such trustees as aforesaid, notwithstanding that they may have ceased to hold any office by virtue of which before the passing of this Act they were such trustees, until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament shall otherwise order, and shall immediately thereupon utterly cease and

* 73 determine : provided * always, that if any vacancy shall be occasioned among the charitable trustees for any borough before the said 1st day of August, it shall be lawful for the Lord High Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal for the time being, upon petition in a summary way, to appoint another trustee to supply such vacancy ; and every person so appointed a trustee as last aforesaid, shall be a trustee until the time at which the person in the room of whom he was chosen would regularly have ceased to be a trustee, and he shall then cease to be a trustee : provided also, that if Parliament shall not otherwise direct on or before the said 1st day of August, 1836, the Lord High Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal shall make such orders as he or they shall see fit for the administration, subject to such charitable uses or trusts as aforesaid, of such trust estates."

On the 16th of August, 1836, the appellants presented their petition to the Lord Chancellor, by their description of "two of the inhabitants of the city of Norwich, and also two of the persons who at the time of the passing of the Act of Parliament (the said Act) were members of the body corporate, called the mayor, sheriffs, citizens, and commonalty of the city of Norwich, on behalf of themselves and all other the persons who at the time of the passing of the said Act were members of and constituted such body corporate." The petition, which was entitled, "In Chancery; in the matter of the charitable estates and funds heretofore vested in the mayor, sheriffs, citizens, and commonalty of the city of Norwich, as trustees for charitable purposes," and which was certified and allowed by his Majesty's Attorney-General, under the provisions of the Act authorizing the Court to give summary relief * by petition in cases of abuses of * 74 charitable trusts (a), set forth the said section of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and stated that at the passing thereof there were vested in the corporation of Norwich, or some of its members in their corporate capacity, various estates, &c., in trust for various charities; all which were stated to be detailed in the 27th volume of the reports of the charity commissioners, to which reference was made; that the said corporation was composed of the mayor, who was an alderman, twenty-three other aldermen, two sheriffs, — one of whom was one of the twenty-three aldermen, — and sixty common councilmen, making in all eighty-five persons, two of whom had recently died; that petitioners were two of the aldermen; that consequently under the said Act, as they were advised, all the said charitable estates and properties became and continued in the survivors of the said eighty-five persons, upon and for the trusts, &c., to which they were properly applicable, and they had accordingly the management and administration thereof up to the 1st of August (1836); that no subsequent Act of Parliament had passed in relation to these matters, nor had any direction been given by Parliament in respect of the same; that from the nature of the said charities, by reason of their magnitude, the number of persons entitled to participate in them, and the purposes to which they were applicable, it was of essential importance that they should be administered by persons lawfully authorized; and that petitioners and the other members of the said corporation, could not safely proceed with the administration thereof without the sanction and direction of the Lord Chancellor. The petition therefore

* 75 prayed * that it might be declared that, "according to the true construction of the said Act of Parliament, all the said charity estates, funds, and properties do now remain and continue vested in your petitioners and the others of the eighty-three surviving persons aforesaid, or in such of them as are or may be living at the time of making the order to be hereupon made, upon the uses and trusts and for the purposes to which, at the time of the passing of the said Act, the same were applicable as aforesaid; and that your petitioners and the said other persons may be at liberty and may be authorized to administer and apply the same, and the rents, interests, dividends, and annual profits thereof, upon and for such uses, trusts and purposes, in like manner as the same have been heretofore applied; or in case it shall appear to the Court that such is not the true construction of the said Act, then that your petitioners and such other persons as aforesaid may be appointed trustees for the aforesaid purposes, or otherwise that it may be referred to the Master of the vacation to appoint proper persons to be such trustees, with liberty for your petitioners and the said other persons to propose themselves as such trustees, and that in the mean time your petitioners and the said other persons may be at liberty to act in the administration of the said estates and funds, rents, and income thereof; and that all proper directions may be given for effectuating the aforesaid purposes, and for duly administering the said estates and premises, and that the costs of and incident to this application may be paid out of the said trust estates; or that your Lordship will make such further or other order as to your Lordship shall seem meet."

On the 19th of August, 1836, the respondents presented * 76 their petition to the Lord Chancellor, therein * describing themselves, the first as mayor, the others as merchants or manufacturers, of the city of Norwich, and all as being members of the then body corporate of the said city; which petition was entitled, "In Chancery; in the matter of the charities in the borough and city of Norwich, called respectively the Great Hospital, Doughty's Hospital," and twenty-six other charities particularly named.

"And in the matter of an Act of Parliament (52 Geo. 3, c. 101), entitled, 'An Act to provide a summary remedy in cases of Abuses of Trusts created for Charitable Purposes.'

"And in the matter of an Act of Parliament (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), entitled, 'An Act to provide,' &c. This petition stated, that King Edw. VI., by letters-patent, dated the first year of his reign, granted to the then corporation of Norwich and their successors the late hospital of St. Gyles, in Norwich, and also divers rectories, &c., lands and hereditaments, in the said city, and in the counties of Norfolk, Essex, and Sussex, upon trust, for the maintenance of certain charities in the said city, and for the maintenance of poor persons, and for other charitable purposes. The petition then stated, that divers other estates and properties, real and personal, and divers manors and personal estates, describing them particularly (all the same charities that were mentioned in the appellants' petition), had been for many years vested in the late corporate body of the said city, upon the various charitable trusts therein mentioned, and that the same had been hitherto administered by the said late body corporate. The petition then set forth the 71st section of the said Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and referred to other sections; and that, in consequence of there being no longer any trustees or trustee, the affairs of the said charities * could not be * 77 legally administered, and the direction of the Court became necessary for the administration of the charitable trusts, and the petitioners, as members of the town council of the said city, were interested in the administration thereof; the petitioners therefore prayed that it might be referred to one of the Masters of the said Court to approve of some proper persons to be appointed trustees of the said charities; or that his Lordship would make such other order for the administration of such trust estates as to his Lordship might seem just and fit.

Affidavits were filed in support of the said petitions, respectively entitled as the petitions were; and the two petitions came on to be heard together before the Lord Chancellor, who, by an order dated the 20th of August, 1836, and entitled in the four several matters of the titles of the petitions, was pleased to order that it should be referred to the Master of the Court in attendance during the vacation to appoint proper persons to be trustees of and for the charity estates and property then late vested in or under the administration of the corporation of Norwich, or any of the members thereof in that character, which were affected by the 71st section of the said Act (5 & 6 Will. 4) ; and that all deeds, books, papers, and writings in the custody or power of the parties, relating to the said charity estates and property, should be produced before the said Master upon oath as he should direct, and that he was to be at liberty to state any special circumstances as he should think fit ; and his Lordship did reserve the consideration of all further directions, and of the costs of the said applications ; and any of the parties were to be at liberty to apply to the Court as there should be occasion.

On the 22d of March, 1837, the respondents presented a petition to the House, by which, after reciting the two petitions hereinbefore stated, and the Lord Chancellor's order on them, and the appellants' petition of appeal against that order, they submitted that the said order of the Lord Chancellor was final and conclusive, and that no appeal lay therefrom, and prayed that the said petition of appeal might be dismissed with costs, or that the benefit of the objection to the said appeal might be reserved to the respondents to the hearing.

The latter petition was referred to the appeal committee ; and in pursuance of an order of the House, made on the suggestion of that committee, the question as to the competency of the appeal came to be argued on that petition at the bar of the House by one counsel on each side, on the 24th of April, 1837, before answer was put in to the petition of appeal.

Mr. Pemberton, for the respondents. — The point raised by the preliminary objection is, whether under the 71st clause of the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, giving the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal power to make orders for administering the charities theretofore vested wholly or partly in the corporate bodies, there is any appeal from such orders. It has been considered that, as Parliament had not made any provision in respect to those charities before the 1st of August, 1836, the interests of all those who as members of corporate bodies were seised of estates, real or personal, in trust for such charities, had ceased, and the provisions of that 71st clause took effect.

* 79 Both the petitions presented * to the Lord Chancellor on the 16th and 19th of August, 1836, were entitled in or referred to the matter of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and it was under the jurisdiction thereby given that both classes of petitioners claimed relief from his Lordship, although one of the petitions was signed by the Attorney-General, under the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101. The Lord Chancellor's order of reference to the Master was likewise entitled in the matter of the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, being entitled in all the matters in which the two petitions were entitled.

It is clear that if there is a new jurisdiction created by Act of Parliament, no appeal lies from that jurisdiction, unless appeal is given by the Act constituting it ; and for the same reason, if new powers be vested in a Court already existing, that new jurisdiction so grafted upon the old tribunal is not subject to review by any other tribunal. If this matter is to depend upon the Municipal Corporations Act alone, there can be no question that the order is final, as being an order made under this new jurisdiction, which is not vested even in an ancient Court, but in certain individuals, and which jurisdiction might have been just as well vested in the Secretary for the Home Department, or the first Lord of the Treasury. The only question, therefore, for the House now is, whether by reason of one of those petitions having been entitled in the matter of the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, by which an appeal is given to this House, the jurisdiction which is specially established by the Municipal Corporations Act can be so connected with that other jurisdiction as to be also the subject of appeal.

It is not necessary to remind your Lordships that the jurisdiction of this House to review orders of Courts of Equity was in its origin the subject of much * controversy. *Lord * 80 Wharton v. Squire, (a)* Since that case no jurisdiction has been entertained by this House to review orders of Courts of Equity, unless such orders have been pronounced in judicial proceedings between suitors ; and in no case where a special jurisdiction has been created by Act of Parliament will an appeal lie to this House, unless the Act expressly grants it. Accordingly there is no appeal from orders in lunacy ; there was none from orders in bankruptcy ; but by a recent Act (b) a special discretion is vested in the Lord Chancellor to review orders of the newly created tribunal in bankruptcy ; and the Lord Chancellor's orders in bankruptcy, and those of the new tribunal, are by express enactment made subject to review by this House.

This question was much discussed in the case of Wall v. The Attorney-General, which originated in the matter of the estate of Boyd and Benfield, bankrupts, against whom extents had issued at the suit of the Crown, and orders had been made by the Court of Exchequer, under those extents, for sale of their estates, and to take an account of the incumbrances thereon, and to ascertain priorities, to realize the property, and distribute it. All those latter orders were made as orders on further directions, there having been a report from the deputy remembrancer, exceptions thereto, and then further directions, — the usual proceedings in a suit in a Court of Equity. In the winding up of the causes (there were ten altogether), it was determined by the Court of Exchequer that the Crown was entitled to payment of its debt, with costs and with interest, out of the fund in Court, which consisted of moneys arising from the produce of the estates, and

* 81 from time to time paid into Court and * vested at interest, and which, in consequence of the accumulation of interest during the time the matter was pending, far exceeded the amount of the Crown debt. Against that order an appeal was presented to this House, on the ground that the moneys originally constituting the fund in Court had been paid in to the credit of the causes generally, and had not been appropriated to the payment of the Crown debt, and therefore the Crown could not take advantage of the increase which had taken place from vesting the moneys in the public stocks. Both parties to the appeal came to argue the merits at the bar; but as soon as the case had been opened, Lords ELDON and REDESDALE intimated their doubts whether an appeal would lie from such orders, and they desired the appeal to stand over until the question of its competency should be argued at the bar. That question was argued by Sir Robert Gifford, then Attorney-General, on one side, and Mr. Fonblanque on the other; I speak from my recollection of the case, having been counsel in it. Lords ELDON and REDESDALE, after the matter had stood over for one or two sessions, dismissed the appeal as incompetent, (a) at the same time intimating their

Indies, for which sum they and others passed their bond to the Commissioners of the Navy; and that in 1798 they received 100,000*l.* to be remitted in supplies to his Majesty's troops at the Cape of Good Hope. They failed in their duty of sending the supplies; and on a commission issued out of the Court of Exchequer, a large balance was reported due from them to the Crown in respect of the last mentioned sum, and extents were issued in 1800 to the sheriffs of Dorsetshire, Hertfordshire, &c., by which their estates were seized into the hands of the Crown. After the issuing of the extents, Boyd, Benfield, & Co. were declared bankrupts, and assignees were appointed. The assignees, and a great number of persons claiming interests in the estates as trustees, mortgagees, and incumbrancers, were defendants to the writs of extent in ten several causes. There were references directed to the deputy remembrancer to take accounts of the property, and of the incumbrances thereon, to ascertain priorities, &c.: reports were made, and orders were made on these reports and sales directed, and the produce was from time to time paid into Court, and vested in the three per cent consolidated bank annuities. By a final order dated the 22d of December, 1815, it was ordered that so much of the funds in Court as would, at the time when the moneys were invested, have answered the sum then due to the Crown, should be considered as then appropriated to the payment of the Crown debt, and that the dividends thereon, from the time of investment, should be considered as belonging to the Crown; also that the costs of the Crown be paid out of the general fund.

by the remembrancer, pursuant to a reference to him in the matter of an extent, no bill being filed, is not subject-matter of an appeal to the House of Lords.

Against that order an appeal was brought by certain of the incumbrancers and by the assignees. To the appellants' case the following reasons were annexed, signed by Sir Samuel Romilly and Mr. Fonblanque:—

1. For that when a Court of Equity takes upon itself the application of a fund for the payment of debts or otherwise, no part of such fund is to be considered as appropriated to any particular claim, without the express direction of the Court; and that if such fund be productive of benefit, such benefit belongs to those who would have been affected with the loss, if any loss had accrued thereon. •

2. That no appropriation was made by the Court of Exchequer of any part of the moneys paid into Court, or of the stock purchased therewith, prior to the last order now appealed from; and that if such stock had fallen in price, the loss would have fallen on the debtors' estate.

3. That by such retrospective operation, the debt due to the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, though only a simple contract debt in its creation, is made to carry interest.

4. That the case is not such as to entitle the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury to the costs of the proceedings.

The following reasons in support of the order were signed by Sir Robert Gifford (then Attorney-General), and Mr. Gaselee (afterwards Mr. Justice GASELEE, on behalf of the respondent:—

1. The debt, though originally in simple contract, on being found by the

* 82 * It is clear, from the proceedings in that case, that the
 * 83 jurisdiction exercised by the Court of Exchequer * was its equitable jurisdiction ; and from decisions of that Court, as a Court of Equity, there is in ordinary cases an appeal to this House. The reason upon which the House, in dismissing that inquisition, became a specialty debt ; and from that time and the actual seizure of the property under the extents, or, at all events, from the 20th day of July, 1808, when the said debt was liquidated, and by the report of the deputy remembrancer and the confirmation by the Court ascertained to amount to the sum of 56,665*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* (which is the period fixed upon by the order), so much of the produce of the estates as was sufficient to answer that debt became the property of the Crown ; the Crown might have applied for, and obtained an order for the payment of it out of Court. It was, however, suffered to remain, and has been made productive ; and having accumulated by the addition of the dividends from time to time received upon it, the Crown must be considered entitled to that accumulation as arising from the use and employment of its own funds.

2. Another way of considering it might be upon the posting of interest ; and in the case of The Drapers' Co. v. Davis, 2 Atk. 211, Lord HARDWICKE said, “ The Court often decrees interest from the time the demand was liquidated, though the debt did not carry interest in its own nature ; ” and in that case the Court gave interest on the arrears of an annuity from the time the Master's report was confirmed (a period of twenty-eight years), in favour of the representative only of the annuitant. The present case is still stronger in favour of the Crown, which only seeks to have the accumulations made from the use of its own property.

3. With respect to the costs, they are expressly given by the 25 Geo. 3, c. 35, § 1.

The House did not pronounce any judgment on the merits ; but on the objection to the competency of the appeal, an order was made, dated the 10th of June, 1824, which, after reciting the names of the parties to the ten causes, was to this effect :— After hearing the first counsel for the appellants, an objection was taken by the respondent's counsel that the appellate jurisdiction of the House did not extend to the order, as being made on the law side of the Court of Exchequer, &c. ; and Counsel having been afterwards heard on the question as to the appellate jurisdiction in the case, and due consideration had, &c. :—

It was declared “ that the said petition of appeal is not a proper proceeding for the purpose of obtaining the judgment of the House on the rights of the appellants, as affected by the order complained of in the appeal : and, therefore, it is ordered that the appeal be dismissed, without prejudice, nevertheless, to any proceeding which the appellants may be advised to institute for the purpose of obtaining relief touching the order so complained of, in case such order is in any manner injurious to the rights of the appellants, and finally to obtain the judgment of this House thereon in a proper proceeding for the purpose, in case the appellants shall not otherwise obtain that relief as they may be advised they are entitled to.” (56 Lords' Journ. for 1824, p. 309.)

appeal as incompetent, proceeded, was that the 79th section of the Act * 33 H. 8, c. 39, enacts, that if any person of * 84 whom any such debt shall be demanded, allege or plead “in any of the said Courts, good, perfect, and sufficient cause and matter in law, reason or good conscience, in bar or discharge of the said debt, &c., and the same cause or matter so alleged or pleaded, &c., be sufficiently proved in such one of the said Courts as he shall be impleaded, &c., for the same, that then the said Courts, and every of them, shall have full power and authority to accept and allow the same proof, and to acquit and discharge all persons that shall be so impleaded for the same.” The consequence of the construction which has been put upon that statute is, that you may plead to an extent any matter which would constitute an equitable defence; and it being competent to the parties to plead equity, they could have relief by filing a bill for the same purpose. If a bill had been filed in that case, the Court would have proceeded on its ancient jurisdiction; and if the order had been made on a bill filed, it would undoubtedly have been subject to appeal; but as all the proceedings took place under the jurisdiction vested in the Court by the statute, (a) which had not given power of appeal to this House, the appeal was dismissed as incompetent.

In the case of O’Sullivan v. Hutchins, a reference to arbitration had been made a rule of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, under the Irish Act 10 Will. 3, c. 14, and that Court made an order thereon, which was the subject of appeal to this House; but the learned Lords then present in the House being of opinion that no appeal lay against such an order, the Act giving no such jurisdiction, dismissed the appeal. That case, which was before the House in 1825, is mentioned in a note to the report of O’Neil v. Fitzgerald, (b) which * was the case of an * 85 appeal from an order pronounced by the Court of Exchequer in Ireland by summary proceeding, when there was no cause pending. It is difficult to understand from the report what was the result of the objection made to that appeal; but it appears that the House, in the first instance, was of opinion that it had no jurisdiction. The scanty mention of O’Sullivan v. Hutchins, (c) is less satisfactory.

(a) 33 Hen. 8, c. 39; and 25 Geo. 3, c. 35.

(b) 3 Bligh, N. s. 24.

(c) O’Sullivan v. Hutchins. The facts of this case, as they appear in the prints of the cases (in Lincoln’s Inn Library), were these: — Appellate Jurisdiction. Differences having arisen between the appellant, O’Sullivan, and the respondent, Hutchins, respecting an agreement for An order of the Court of Chancery

* 86 * If the rule be, as I apprehend it is, that no appeal lies to this House from a new jurisdiction established, nor from any new power grafted on an old jurisdiction, without express power of appeal, let us see whether that rule applies to this case.

[Here it was suggested by Mr. Knight, that one ground of argument for his clients would be, that the order which is the subject of the appeal, was not merely an order made by the Lord on an award, made between parties, upon a submission to a reference which was made a rule of Court, according to Act of Parliament (10 Will. 3), no bill being filed, is not subject-matter of appeal to the House of Lords.

a demise of land by the latter to the former, they consented to refer them to arbitration, and their submission was made a rule of the Court of Chancery in Ireland (under the Act 10 Will. 3, c. 14, an Act of the Irish Parliament), in a cause in which the respondent was plaintiff and the appellant was defendant. The appellant afterwards wrote several letters by way of notice to the arbitrator, that he withdrew from him all authority to proceed to an award. The arbitrator, disregarding those notices, made his award in 1820, directing the performance of the agreement by the appellant, and that he should pay the respondent a certain sum of money. The appellant showed cause against the award in the Rolls' Court, and the Master of the Rolls allowed good cause to have been shown, but declined to make any order. The appellant then applied to the Lord Chancellor to set aside the award, but his Lordship refused that application, and made an order confirming the award, and "declaring that the parties, after their submission to make the reference a rule of Court, could not withdraw the authority so given."

The appeal was against that order; and the reasons (signed by Mr. Charles Wetherell and Mr. A. R. Blake) were to the effect that the submission might be revoked at any time up to the moment of making the award, and that in this case the authority was revoked by the appellant before the arbitrator began.

The reasons annexed to the respondent's case (signed by Mr. Denman and Mr. Abraham) were in substance the same as the above reason given by the Lord Chancellor in making the order.

It does not appear whether the objection was made by the respondent or by the House to the competency of the appeal; but the point was argued by counsel on both sides, and the following order was made by the House, June 30, 1825: "And it appearing to this House that the order complained of was not made in any cause on the Equity side of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, no bill being filed in this matter, but that it relates to an award made between parties upon a submission to a reference which was made a rule or order of Court, according to an Act of the Parliament of Ireland passed in the 10th Will. 3, in the judgment of this House an appeal to this House, complaining of the said order, is incompetent, and that this House hath no jurisdiction upon the matter of such appeal: and, therefore, it is ordered, &c., that the said petition and appeal be, and is hereby dismissed this House." (57 Lords' Journ. for 1825, pp. 34, 54, and 1198.)

Chancellor, but an order of the Court of Chancery, which any Judge of that Court had authority to make.]

Can any one say, that under section 71 of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, the Master of the Rolls, or Vice-Chancellor, or even a Lord Keeper, could pronounce any order, that section enacting, that if Parliament shall not otherwise direct on or before the 1st of August, the Lord High Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal shall make such orders as he or they shall see fit for the administration of the charities? It is simply the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Commissioners who are the persons named.

Then the question is, whether the statute 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, gives the power that has been exercised in this case. That Act clearly shows there can be no appeal to this House against an order made under a jurisdiction given by Act of Parliament, unless appeal has been directly given; for that Act recites that, "Whereas it is expedient to provide a more summary remedy in cases of breaches of trusts created for charitable purposes, &c.; be it therefore * enacted, that, &c., in every case of a * 87 breach, &c., of any trust created for charitable purposes, or whenever the direction or order of a Court of Equity shall be deemed necessary, &c., it shall be lawful for any two or more persons to present a petition to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or Lords Commissioners for the custody of the Great Seal, and the Master of the Rolls and the Court of Exchequer, and they are hereby required to hear such petition in a summary way, and upon affidavits, &c., to determine the same, and to make such order therein, &c., as to him or them shall seem just; and such order shall be final and conclusive, unless the party or parties who shall think himself or themselves aggrieved thereby shall within two years, &c., have preferred an appeal from such decision to the House of Lords, to whom it is hereby enacted and declared that an appeal shall lie from such order." This enactment and declaration clearly show that the mere vesting this jurisdiction in the Courts of Chancery or Exchequer would not make their orders the subject of appeal to this House, although the object of the Act was not to create a new jurisdiction, but to give a summary procedure to the existing tribunals. The power existed before in the Court of Chancery and in the Court of Exchequer; this Act only altered the mode in which that power was to be exercised; and yet, if there was not a special declaration in the Act that there should be an appeal, there could be no appeal, because a tribunal constituted by the legislature for a particular purpose is not to be controlled by another tribunal, when the legislature has not expressly directed such control. Although this order is entitled in the matter of the two petitions, one of which refers to the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, it is clear * 88 that it was made exclusively by * virtue of the power given by the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, by which it was made necessary. If the question for decision was therefore to depend on that Act alone, it is evident there could be no authority for this House to exercise a control over the decisions which might have been pronounced, or the regulations which might have been introduced, by the jurisdiction which the legislature has thereby created for the administration of these charities. I submit, therefore, that the order cannot of itself and by the authority of this Act be the subject of review by this House, and that it cannot be made so by reason of its being connected with the Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 101.

Mr. Knight, for the appellants. — This is an order over which your Lordships can exercise jurisdiction. It is an order drawn up — as orders in bankruptcy and in lunacy are not drawn up — by the registrar of the Court of Chancery; it is passed and entered in the registrar's office of that Court, and bears the seal of that office; it is officially indorsed "In Chancery; In re Norwich Charities; Orders for reference to the Master;" and it begins — as all orders in Chancery begin, which are pronounced either by the Lord Chancellor or the Vice-Chancellor — by mentioning at the top the particular Judge who pronounced the order: "Lord Chancellor; Saturday, the 20th day of August," &c. [He read the two first titles or headings already mentioned, and proceeded:] The Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, which forms the third matter of the title to this order, expressly declares that there shall be an appeal to the House of Lords, and yet it is argued that an order, appearing on the face of it to have been made under that statute, shall not come by appeal before this House.

* 89 The question now is not * whether the order ought to have been made under that statute, or whether it is right or wrong, or whether there was power to make any order; that question remains for another hearing. The order is expressed to be an order under the Statute 52 Geo. 3, and your Lordships, by the law of the land, have no power to decline reviewing it.

That is matter the third: matter the fourth is, “and in the matter of an Act of Parliament made and passed in the fifth and sixth years of the reign of his present Majesty.” The Court, therefore, which pronounced this order, has sedulously taken care to state that it is not an order made alone under the last mentioned statute, and in the matter of certain charities, but is an order also made under the Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, by which the jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity over charities has been heretofore exercised, and which is not repealed or grown obsolete, and which makes express provision for an appeal to this House.

What is to make this order not an order of the Court of Chancery? It is pronounced by the Lord Chancellor upon petition; his Lordship stating in the order what Court he is in; he refers it “to the Master of this Court in attendance during the vacation, to appoint proper persons,” &c.; and it is therefore to all intents and purposes an order of the Court of Chancery. How it can be seriously contended that this is an order that cannot be appealed from, or that this House can take away the right of the subject to appeal against an order under the Act of 52 Geo. 3, because it is an order made also under another act, it is difficult to comprehend. It may be wrong as far as it is an order under the Act of 52 Geo. 3, and then there is the right of appeal, which cannot be taken away merely because there are various other titles added * in the order to the title of that Act. The * 90 points that I beg particularly to submit to your Lordships are, first, that the 71st section of the Municipal Corporations Act creates no jurisdiction at all de novo; secondly, that if it does create any new jurisdiction, it is only by way of a grant or addition to an old inherent jurisdiction, not creating a course of proceeding new in the law, but merely an additional head to an ancient and known tribunal, and regulated therefore by the ancient and known course of proceeding; just as if it were enacted that, for a certain matter not heretofore according to the course of the law of the country, a new head of equity relief should be had in the Court of Chancery; a new power added to an existing tribunal, to be exercised according to the laws which regulate that tribunal. But thirdly, if a new jurisdiction were created in the manner that has been contended for, there is nothing in the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4 to exclude the old jurisdiction; if there be in any sense a new jurisdiction given, it is cumulative, and not exclusive.

The consequence of holding that this House is to exercise no jurisdiction, and that the Lord Chancellor, or the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal for the time being, are to exercise absolutely and without control the power given by the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, is so fearful in its extent and character as to induce any man to pause before he admits such a doctrine; for the Act extends to all the charities vested in all the corporations, or individual members of corporations, throughout the kingdom, except London. The tendency of the argument on the other side is to withdraw from the general administration of the law the vast amount of property which is included in those

 * 91 charities; to withdraw all this from * the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and vest an absolute and uncontrolled power over it in a single Judge. That it would be a wholesome or a reasonable interpretation of this Act to hold that that was its object, cannot be admitted. What the Act meant and effected was, that if Parliament did not interfere, the Judge having the ordinary cognizance of charity matters should interfere in the usual way. At the time when the Act passed, the Lord Chancellor was constantly exercising jurisdiction upon petition under the statute of 52 Geo. 3: trusts and charities had long before been subjects of administration in the Court of Chancery. This Act (of 5 & 6 Will. 4) did not give the Lord Chancellor a power over any matter that was new to him; but, giving a particular direction that was to be in force for a certain time, it enacted that after that time the Judge who had jurisdiction over such matter should exercise it. It would be a most inconvenient, if not absurd, interpretation of this Act, to hold that it created a new jurisdiction when there was no necessity for creating one, and to deny that it referred to a jurisdiction already existing, when it may be clearly held so to refer; especially when the former interpretation would have the consequence of excluding an appeal from decisions over property in value amounting to millions, involving questions probably of the greatest difficulty; for every matter relating to those charities must be included under the words "administration, subject to such charitable uses or trusts as aforesaid, of such trust estates."

Blackstone, in speaking of the Court of Chancery, says, "An appeal to Parliament, that is, to the House of Lords, is the dernier ressort of the subject who thinks himself aggrieved

* 92 by an interlocutory order * or final determination in this Court, &c. This jurisdiction is said to have begun in 18 Jac. 1, &c. It was afterwards warmly controverted by the House of Commons in the reign of Chas. 2. But this dispute is now at rest; it being obvious to the reason of all mankind, that when the Courts of Equity became principal tribunals for deciding causes of property, a revision of their decrees, by way of appeal, became equally necessary as a writ of error from the judgment of a Court of Law. And upon the same principle, from decrees of the Chancellor relating to the commissioner for the dissolution of chauntries, &c., under the Statute 37 Hen. 8, c. 4, as well as for charitable uses under the Statute 43 Eliz. c. 4, an appeal to the King in Parliament was always unquestionably allowed." (a) Now in those two statutes there is no mention of any appeal to the House of Lords; but as they gave a jurisdiction to be exercised by an equity Judge, it follows as matter of course that an appeal lies from him to this House. "By Statute 43 Eliz." (which is the one more frequently acted upon, — the other being obsolete in practice), "authority is given," Blackstone says, (b) "to the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, and to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster respectively, to grant commissions under their several seals to inquire into any abuses of charitable donations, and to rectify the same by decree, which may be reviewed in the respective Courts of the several chancellors. But though this is done in the petty-bag office, &c., because the commission is returned there, it is not a proceeding at common law, but treated as an original cause in the Court of Equity, &c. And as it is thus considered as an original cause throughout, an appeal lies, of course, * from the Chancel- * 93 lor's decree to the House of Peers, notwithstanding any loose opinions to the contrary." And for the right of appeal, Blackstone cites Duke on Charitable Uses, pp. 62 & 128; and for the loose opinions to the contrary, 2 Vernon, 118. But there is a direct decision of this House on the point, in Warner v. North. (c)

The appeal from the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer in equity is not founded upon any Act of Parliament, but upon the reason and necessity of the thing. Appeals to this House from the Welsh Courts of Equity were frequent and familiar to your Lordships. They came direct from the Courts in Wales, not through the Court of Chancery; and no doubt was ever suggested as to the jurisdiction, although the Act of Hen. 8, constituting those Courts, gives no appeal in express terms. Suppose, on a mistaken construction of one of the recent Acts of Parliament enlarging the powers of the Court of Chancery in respect of procedure, that Court was to exercise a jurisdiction by petition which did not belong to it, — as, for instance, under one of Sir E. SUGDEN's Acts, to appoint a new trustee by petition in a case not warranted by the Act; or, suppose it took upon itself, under the same Act, to take from a mortgagee or trustee the legal estates, such orders, if not pronounced with the greatest caution, might produce ruin to families; and is it to be said that there can be no appeal to the House of Lords from such orders, because they are pronounced upon petition and not upon bill? The question is, whether the Court of Chancery assumes to do an act which does not come within its jurisdiction; if it does, an appeal lies, though the only ground of appeal may be that the order ought to have been by bill and not by petition,

* 94 * and that the Court was exceeding its jurisdiction. In none of these new Acts of Parliament has it been thought necessary to give expressly an appeal to the House of Lords, because the subject-matter was a matter of equitable cognizance, which Courts of Equity had been dealing with for centuries; and when their powers were intended to be extended, that extension of power was construed as given to them in that character and capacity, and liable to all those considerations and consequences which are incidental to that character and capacity.

The case of Lord Wharton v. Squire, (a) whatever may be said of the dispute between the two Houses of Parliament at that time, stands as a precedent that a general order of a Court of Equity, though not made in any cause, is a proper subject of appeal by a person who is aggrieved by it. The Court of Exchequer had in that case made an order dealing with a particular record; that order was appealed against, and the House of Lords varied the order and asserted its appellate jurisdiction. In Bailey v. Maule, mentioned in a note to O'Neil v. Fitzgerald, (b) the purchaser of an estate, who was no party to the cause, appealed from the order made in that case, and this House received the appeal, and affirmed Lord ELDON's order. Of O'Sullivan v. Hutchins, which is also mentioned in a note to O'Neil v. Fitzgerald, the merits cannot be collected from that note. (c) The case of Wall or Hoare and others v. Attorney-General, depended on different principles. The order in that case was an order made under a special statutory jurisdiction, given to the Court of Exchequer for the purpose of dealing with extents. It was a new jurisdiction created for the * particular purpose. This * 95 House appears to have held that from orders made in that particular form of jurisdiction, they ought not to entertain appeals; and the reasons are suggested in argument by Sir A. Hart, speaking as counsel in the case of O'Neil v. Fitzgerald. In that case the jurisdiction of this House over an order of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, no cause pending, appears to have been exercised, as it had been in Lord Wharton v. Squire, and in Bailey v. Maule. 57 Lords' J. for 1825, p. 737.

The jurisdiction in bankruptcy stands upon peculiar grounds. That jurisdiction is neither legal nor equitable; it is partly both; it was entirely a new jurisdiction unknown to the law of the country; it grew up from the control which the Judge who held the Great Seal had over his own proceedings; as he issued the commissions, he might control the commissioners who resorted to him for advice and assistance. No proceeding in bankruptcy was ever entitled, "In Chancery." The officers of that Court have nothing to do with bankruptcy. The Lord Chancellor has a particular set of officers appropriated to that business.

The jurisdiction in lunacy depends upon another principle. That matter is the King's personal jurisdiction. He appoints a particular deputy to exercise that jurisdiction for him, who may be the Lord Chancellor or anybody else. If the deputy for that particular purpose does an act in the execution of his duty, which the subject complains of, he comes to the King, who is supposed to be in person in the Privy Council hearing any complaint in lunacy which belongs to his own domestic administration of the lunatic's estate. That is the course of appeal prescribed by the law of the country, giving the King as the ultimate resort, instead of the House of Lords; and no order in lunacy is entitled, "In Chancery." Orders * in lunacy are drawn * 96 up in a different branch of the Court, and by a different set of officers. See note A to Sheldon v. Fortescue Aland, 3 P. Wms. 106.

But suppose this Act (5 & 6 Will. 4) has given a new jurisdiction to the Lord Chancellor, is there any clause in it to exclude his ordinary jurisdiction? Where are the words of exclusion? The mere circumstance of giving power, if the power is given, to the Lord Chancellor, as an individual, would not shut out the ancient power of the Court of Chancery. Had not that Court power, before this Act, to interfere for the administration of charitable trusts? If your Lordships yield to the argument on the other side, you must not only hold that the words of the proviso in this Act create a new jurisdiction in the individual named, without an appeal, but also an exclusive jurisdiction, so that no Court of Equity shall deal with a matter of charity, where members of a corporate body are trustees. For if the jurisdiction be not exclusive, then the Court of Chancery has in this matter made an order according to its ancient powers; and if it has not done so according to its ancient powers, it may or may not have exceeded those powers; but that is the matter to be considered in the appeal. If the words of the Act create a new jurisdiction, which it is submitted they do not, but do not create a jurisdiction exclusive, then this order is an order made by the Court of Chancery in the exercise or assumed exercise of an ancient jurisdiction on which your Lordships have a right to interfere.

An argument has been raised on the words used in the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, giving an appeal to this House. The recital in the Act rendered it necessary to mention the House of Lords, because of the limitation of time to give effect to the orders; and the House of Lords being mentioned, the words "to whom

* 97 it is * hereby enacted and declared that an appeal shall lie from such order," are thrown in by way of parenthesis. The words "enacted and declared" are always considered as importing that the legislature was providing for something that was not provided for by the existing law; such as the summary proceeding given for the first time by that Act in administering charities.

But without the words granting an appeal, an appeal would lie; and it may well be contended that if an Act of Parliament were to create a new Court of Equity, without a word about an appeal, as a matter of course an appeal would lie to this House; and unless that were so, your Lordships have been for centuries hearing equity appeals without authority. Where was the right to hear the first equity appeal, if not in the inherent jurisdiction of this House as the Supreme Court of Equity of the country? It heard appeals from the Court of Chancery, and from the Court of Exchequer, because they are equitable jurisdictions. It heard them from the Courts of Great Session in Wales, because it was an equitable jurisdiction. Where is that authority derived from but from this, that it is the common-law of the country that this House, as the Supreme Court of Equity in the kingdom, decides by its inherent powers in the last resort? Suppose the four last lines in the 71st section of the Municipal Corporations Act did not exist at all, would any man entertain a doubt that the Lord Chancellor would have had power to direct references to the Master to appoint new trustees, if a case required it; or, if he had done it without bill or without reference, then that though it might have been complained of, still it would have been the act of the Lord Chancellor in the Court of Chancery, dealing with a matter of * equitable jurisdiction? It is clear * 98 that all that was meant by these words was, to throw the administration of the charities into the same course as it stood before, if Parliament did not interfere before a given day.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. — The argument urged with most confidence for the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the House in this matter is, that the petitions, affidavits, and the order itself, are entitled “in Chancery, and in the matter of the Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 101,” and the order is drawn up by the registrar of the Court of Chancery, and that all the proceedings are treated by the petitioners as if they were proceedings in that Court under its ordinary jurisdiction. Can the error or the consent of the petitioners, in entitling their petitions and affidavits, give an appeal to this House from a new jurisdiction created by Act of Parliament, if the legislature has not conferred it? What can it signify how the petitions and the order are entitled, or in what terms that order speaks, if it was made by the Lord Chancellor under the authority of the statute which makes what he has so ordered conclusive on the parties? The order was made, as it purported to have been made, by virtue of the power conferred on the Lord Chancellor by the 71st section of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76. If it was the intention of the legislature, in annihilating all the interest of the corporation trustees in charities from the 1st of August, 1836, to leave the estates of which they were trustees to be administered by the existing tribunals by their ancient jurisdiction, what was the object of introducing the special proviso, that if Parliament should not otherwise direct on or before that day, the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great * Seal should make * 99 such orders as he or they should see fit for their administration. That proviso would be quite nugatory if it was not intended to confer a new jurisdiction on the persons there named.

The argument for the competency of the appeal has been carried to this extent, — that this House has authority to review, by way of appeal, the orders of every jurisdiction established by Act of Parliament, unless the legislature has expressly excluded the right of appeal. My learned friend and I are at issue on that point: I say no such authority exists in your Lordships' House, unless the Act creating the new jurisdiction, or some other Act, gives it; while Mr. Knight contends that such authority does exist, unless expressly excluded. The jurisdiction in bankruptcy, created and continued by numerous Acts of Parliament, has been exercised by the Lord Chancellor, Lords Commissioners, and other Judges of the Court of Chancery, but no appeal lay to this House from any orders in bankruptcy; and the reason is, that it was a special jurisdiction created by Acts of Parliament, which did not give an appeal to this House.

It does not appear distinctly from the references made in the passages cited from Blackstone's Commentaries, that an appeal ever lay to this House from sentences by the delegates, nor from decrees on the statute for Charitable Uses, 43 Eliz., c. 4; and the reason given in Saul v. Wilson (the case in 2 Vernon, 118) is, "because those matters are grounded upon Acts of Parliament, and the Acts give no appeal." The authority on which Blackstone calls that "a loose opinion," does not appear in Duke's Charitable Uses, to which he refers. (a) The decision of (a) The Almsmen of Eastham v. Lady Kempe, must be the case to which the reference is made by Blackstone: it is mentioned in the report of Windsor v. Hilton, in p. 62 of the old edition of Duke. From the entries in the Lords' Journals for 1643–4 (19 & 20 Car. 1), we collect this state of that case: An order was made on the 2d of December, 1643, to summon witnesses before the House at the hearing of the cause of the poor of Eastham and the Lady Kempe; and on the 9th, counsel were heard on both sides, and the certificate of Sir JOHN BRAMSTON, then late Lord Chief Justice, was read, by which he had certified in August, 1641, that, in pursuance of their Lordships' order of the 5th of June of that year, he had heard the grievances mentioned in the petition of the almsmen of Eastham, in the county of Essex, in the presence of their counsel, and he found the case to be as follows: Giles Breame, by his will, dated 1st of May, 16 Jac. 1, appointed that six houses should be built for six poor men of the parish of Eastham, within a year after his decease; and he devised divers lands in Eastham towards their maintenance forever, and made Sir Giles Allington his executor, and gave him and his heirs the manor of Eastham, that he might have wherewithal to perform his will, &c. That Mr. Breame afterwards made a codicil, by which he entreated Sir G.

* the House in the case of Wall v. The Attorney-General, * 100 before referred to, is conclusive on the question in this * case, and to admit this appeal will, in effect, be to overrule * 101

Allington to purchase 40*l.* a year in socage tenure for the maintenance of the six poor men in the almshouses, and to let that land which he had bequeathed by his will for that intent remain still unto the lordship, as it hath been. That the houses were built by Sir G. Allington, but before any lands of 40*l.* yearly value were purchased, he sold the manor and lands in Eastham to Lady Kempe, and left 660*l.* in her hands for the purchase of the lands of the yearly value of 40*l.*; and it was agreed between him and her that until such lands should be purchased, the said lands in Eastham should stand charged with the charitable use. That no such lands were purchased for many years; but there being a decree made by the Commissioners for Charitable Uses, and exceptions taken thereto before the Lord Keeper COVENTRY, he decreed that 800*l.* should be paid by the Lady Kempe and Sir G. Allington to feoffees, towards the purchase of lands to the use of the almsmen; which 800*l.* had been since laid out in the purchase of lands in Braintree, more than thirty miles from the almshouses: and whether the almsmen might have the lands in Eastham under the will, or accept the lands in Braintree, of less value and more distant, was the question for the judgment and direction of the House.

On the 11th December, 1643, the House ordered that it be referred to all the Judges and King's counsel to consider whether, by the statute of Charitable Uses, a decree made by the Lord Keeper in Chancery is, by virtue of that statute, not reversible in the High Court of Parliament, but by a statute made for that purpose, more than any other decree made in Chancery.

On the 15th April, 1644, the Judges reported to the House that they heard counsel on either side in the said cause, and considered the question on the statute of 43 Eliz. for Charitable Uses; and they certified their opinion to be, "that upon an appeal to the Lord Keeper upon that statute, and a decree made by his Lordship in Chancery, annulling, diminishing, altering, or enlarging a decree made by Commissioners by virtue of a commission upon that statute, if the same decree so made by his Lordship do not stand with equity and good conscience according to the true intent and meaning of the donors and founders, that the same may, notwithstanding any thing contained in that statute, be reversed in Parliament, in such course and manner as any other decree made in the Court of Chancery may be by course of Parliament reversed.

Appellate. Jurisdiction.

A decree made by the Lord Chancellor upon appeal to him from a decree made by Commissioners by virtue of the act 43 Eliz. c. 4, for Charitable Uses, is subject to appeal to the House of Lords.

"Signed, THOS. IRWIN, EDM. REVE, FRA. BACON, RALPH WHITFIELD."

On the 10th of August, 1644, the House heard "the cause, by counsel on both sides, between the poor of Eastham and the Lady Kempe," concerning a reversal of the decree made by the Lord Keeper COVENTRY, in Chancery, touching land of the value of 40*l.* per annum, given by will of Giles Breame to the said poor of Eastham, which land is pretended to be passed away to the Lady Kempe, and other lands settled to a smaller value; and the House, taking this business into consideration, ordered that the said cause shall be dismissed this House."

that decision. For the facts and result of the case of Warner v. North, it would be right to direct a search in the Journals. (a).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, when this case came * 102 before the appeal committee, it was found * to raise a question evidently of so much importance, not only to the parties, but as affecting a great many other cases which might arise under the proceedings of this Act of 1835, that it was thought not proper to dispose of it in that Committee, but to refer the parties to the bar of the House; and in order to save them the expense of preparing their cases and making ready for hearing on the merits, they were permitted to apply by petition, for the purpose of raising at the bar the question that was presented to the Committee of Appeals. The case, as it appears upon the petition now before your Lordships, states the order, which is undoubtedly entitled “In Chancery,” and has been so argued at your Lordships’ bar. It was an order on petitions, one of which was presented by the parties now asking to have the appeal dismissed; and that petition is entitled, not only in the matter of the Act of the 5th and 6th of the King, but it is also entitled in the matter of the Act of

(a) Lee Warner v. William North. There is a short report of this case in Shower, p. 110. It appears from entries in the Lords’ Journals for 1693 (6 W. & M.), that Warner presented a petition of appeal, complaining of a decree made by the Commissioners for Charitable Uses, and of a confirmation thereof by the Court of Chancery in 1692, upon overruling his exceptions with costs to be paid by him to North. That appeal was withdrawn. In 1695, Warner again appealed to the House, complaining of a decree made November, 1693, on behalf of North, and another decree on behalf of Grace Featly and other widows of Bromley College; and praying that a decree made by the Commissioners for Charitable Uses might be confirmed, and that the decrees, orders, and proceedings in Chancery, altering the same, might be reversed. The entry of the judgment on the 3d of March, 1695, is this:—

“Upon hearing counsel this day at the bar, upon the petition and appeal of Lee Warner, gentleman, complaining of a decree made in the Court of Chancery the 24th day of November, 1693, on the behalf of William North, and another decree made on behalf of Grace Featly and the other widows of Bromley College, and praying that a decree made by the Commissioners of Charitable Uses may be confirmed, and that the decrees, orders, and proceedings in Chancery may be reversed; as also upon the several answers of William North, gentleman, and Grace Featly, widow, on behalf of herself and the other widows of Bromley College, in the county of Kent, put in thereunto: after due consideration of what was offered thereupon, it is ordered and adjudged by the Lords, &c., that the said petition and appeal of Lee Warner shall be and is hereby dismissed this House; and that the decrees, orders, and proceedings of the Court of Chancery therein complained of, shall be, and they are hereby affirmed.” (15 Lords’ Journ. for 1695, p. 691.)

52 Geo. 3, Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY's Act. The order is drawn up as an order of the Court of Chancery, and the reference is made to one of the Masters of the Court, and the further directions are reserved to that Court. Upon the face of the order, therefore, it is an order in the recent Act of the 5th and 6th of the King ; it is an order in the matter of the 52d of Geo. 3, and it is, as it would be if it were an order in * the 52d of Geo. 3, * 103 an order of the Court of Chancery ; but it will not be an order of the Court of Chancery if the argument on the part of the parties asking to have this appeal dismissed as incompetent be correct, because that argument supposes that the reference by the 71st clause of the Act, 5 and 6 Will. 4, is not made to the Court of Chancery as a Court of Equity, but to the individual who for the time being may hold the Great Seal. Now your Lordships have not the merits of this case before you to discuss ; your Lordships have simply to consider whether upon this state of things, as it appears upon this petition, and as appears upon the face of the order, your Lordships can say that the parties have a right to come to this House. If what is complained of be a matter done under the authority of the 52d of Geo. 3, they unquestionably have a right to come to this House ; if it be generally the order of the Court of Chancery, they have a right to come to this House. But it is contended that if it is an order made under the authority of the 71st section of the 5th and 6th of the present King, then they have no right to come to this House. If the case were now before us in a stage which would enable us to decide on that latter question, it might be one of considerable difficulty and requiring much consideration ; but the parties who now come to your Lordships' bar ask your Lordships to decide that the respondents here, the appellants in the general appeal, are not to be heard to complain of the order, the order being entitled under Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY's Act, the 52d Geo. 3d, under which Act there is an express power of appeal to this House. What your Lordships have to consider is, whether, in this state of circumstances, you can safely decide that the parties appealing, the order being upon the two petitions, are not entitled to * be heard at your Lordships' bar. We * 104 have not the merits of the case before us now ; but under the circumstances now appearing on this petition, it does not appear to me that we can safely decide. These petitioners are not the parties appellant : it does not appear to me that there is on the face of this petition any reason to show that we can dismiss the appeal on the ground of the House not having jurisdiction.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend that there is not ground whereupon we can dismiss the petition of appeal, and refuse to go into the case. It is quite unnecessary to go further than to state that that is sufficient to dispose of the present application to dismiss the appeal. My opinion clearly is that this appeal from that order of the Court of Chancery is competent. With respect to what is said of the Act of the 52d Geo. 3, it is unnecessary to go into the construction of that Act, or into any inferences which may be drawn from the peculiarity of the saving clause in the first section of that Act; but I certainly incline to the opinion that that saving clause has been introduced in consequence, not merely of the summary jurisdiction, but in consideration of the statutory limitation there given of two years; by which alone I can account for the reservation of the appellate jurisdiction appearing as it does there.

Petition to discharge the appeal as incompetent, refused, without costs, and the appeal sustained.

February 19, 1839.

The appeal stood over until the session of 1839, when it came to be heard in the presence of the Judges.

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Jacob (Mr. Girdlestone was with them), for the appellants.—The Lord Chancellor's * order
* 105 directed a reference to the Master of the Court in attendance during the vacation, to appoint proper persons to be trustees of the charity estates and property late under the administration of the corporation of Norwich or any of its members in that character, which were affected by the 71st section of the Act 5 and 6 Will. 4, c. 76. The first and principal objection to the order is, that the trusts of the charity estates were not vacant when the order was made. The next objection is, that if the trusts were determined by force of the statute, the order should be to refer it to the Master to inquire whether the same persons who were the trustees up to that time were not proper persons to be continued as trustees for the administration of the charity estates and property. If either of these objections can be sustained, the order cannot stand.

The corporate bodies, or some of the persons composing them, were trustees of the charity estates and property, like individuals, before the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act, the object of which was to extend corporate privileges to the inhabitant householders of the several cities and boroughs, and to introduce a new mode of electing members of the governing bodies, in place of the then existing governing bodies who were to go out of office on a fixed day. The 71st section of the Act, on which the House is required to put a construction, purports to provide for the future administration of the estates and funds, of which the corporate bodies, or some of their members in their corporate characters, were trustees for charitable purposes. The words of the section are, "all the estate, right, interest and title, and all the powers of such corporate body, or of such member or members * of such body corporate, in respect * 106 of the said uses and trusts, shall continue in the persons who at the time of the passing of this Act are such trustees as aforesaid, notwithstanding that they may have ceased to hold any office by virtue of which, before the passing of this Act, they were such trustees, until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament shall otherwise direct, and shall thereupon utterly cease and determine." The first word in that part of the section requiring particular consideration is the word "continue," which neither expresses nor implies the appointment of new trustees, but quite the reverse, enjoining, in fact, the continuance of the former trustees. The subsequent words of the section point out a limit to their continuance in the trust, namely, "until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament shall otherwise order." These words must be read together in giving a true construction to them: the 1st of August could not of itself terminate the continuance of the trusts; they were to continue until Parliament passed another Act, and thereupon utterly to cease and determine. The interpretation put on the clause by the Lord Chancellor in making the order was, that the trusts utterly ceased on the 1st of August, whether Parliament interfered or not by any other Act. The appellants submit that that cannot be the true construction of the words. The words "thereupon," &c., must be taken to refer to the last antecedent "until Parliament shall otherwise order," or to both antecedents; and if to both, then the Lord Chancellor's construction referring them to the remote antecedent only, "the 1st day of August," must be wrong. The legislature could not have intended to put an end to these trusts before it made provision for the

 * 107 * administration of the charities. If the trusts were all vacant on the 1st of August, according to the Lord Chancellor's view of the Act, what became of the estates and property from that day until his Lordship made orders for appointing trustees to the hæreditas jacens? What became of the trusts in the mean time? They must have remained wherever the legal estate was, and where that is even now is vexata quæstio. Some persons suppose the legal estate remains in the old trustees; some suppose it is vested in the Lord Chancellor and Masters in Chancery; and some say in the heirs of the donors, from Cumberland to Cornwall. A trustee is a person who has the legal estate or interest. The Lord Chancellor's order did not divest that estate out of the former trustees, or give it to those appointed under his orders. Without the legal estate they cannot be trustees; they are mere scarecrows, having no real authority to protect the estates. Suppose a tenant of any of the charities refuses to pay rent, or resists a notice to quit, where is the power in the trustees to distrain or to eject him? There is, in fact, no person in rerum natura who has the legal estate, or who could sue a tenant of the charity estates as lessor of the plaintiff, if the trusts in the corporations ceased on the 1st of August, 1836. That day was not the termination at which the clause aimed, but that day was named because it was anticipated that Parliament would make other provision before that day, and such other provision by Parliament, whenever it should happen, was the limitation intended; but in the event of no provision being made before that day, the Lord Chancellor's ordinary jurisdiction over charities was to be exercised in the usual way. The trustees were not free from control in case Parliament did not

 * 108 interfere; * for in that event they were subject to the Lord Chancellor's former jurisdiction, whereby he might remove any of them who misconducted himself, or became incapable or unwilling to act. And that it was no new jurisdiction that was to be exercised by the Lord Chancellor was clearly indicated by the words of the first proviso: "That if any vacancy shall be occasioned among the charitable trustees for any borough before the 1st day of August, it shall be lawful for the Lord High Chancellor, &c., upon petition in a summary way" (the exact words of the Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 101), "to appoint another trustee to supply such vacancy," &c. And in like manner the existing jurisdiction was to be put in motion by the second proviso in the clause: "If Parliament shall not otherwise direct on or before the said 1st day of August, 1836, the Lord High Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal shall make such orders as he or they shall see fit for the administration, subject to such charitable uses or trusts as aforesaid, of such trust estates." The Lord Chancellor's general jurisdiction over charities, until Parliament should pass an Act for their regulation, was to be exercised to provide against malversation of the trustees, reduction of them by death or incapacity; so that by that interpretation of this section no mischief could ensue from the continuance of the estates in the former trustees. But great mischief might ensue from the other interpretation, by which the trusts of these estates became vacant, and the whole of this vast property was unprotected from the 1st of August until trustees should be appointed by the slow process of petitions to the Court, orders of reference thereon, and then the tedious squabbles in the Master's office, with consequent applications to the Court.

The legislature could not * have intended so dangerous a * 109 proceeding; and to prevent so much mischief the statute ought to receive a reasonable construction, not inconsistent with the words, though not resting on the letter only; "nam qui hæret in littera hæret in cortice," but relying on the sense guided by equity. Fulmerston v. Steward, and Stradling v. Morgan. (a) In the case of The King v. The Inhabitants of Everdon, Lord ELLENBOROUGH says, (b) "I hope that the apparent justice of the one construction, and the great and manifest inconvenience of the other, do not too much warp my mind in coming to the conclusion which I have done: for it would indeed be a grievous construction if we were to be bound to adopt the literal sense of the words of the statute." And in The King v. Bellamy, (c) Chief Justice ABBOTT says, "The language of the Acts, &c., is not free from obscurity: it is our duty, however, to give effect to the intention of the legislature, if that can be ascertained."

If the word "or," in the clause "until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament shall otherwise direct," were to be read "and," there would be no difficulty at all in reconciling the words to the manifest intention; and there are cases (more on the construction of deeds and wills than of acts of Parliament) where "or" is construed to mean "and," in order to effectuate the intention, and where the sense and reason require such reading to avoid inconvenience. Fairfield v. Morgan, (a) Wright v.

Kemp. (b) The form used in injunctions is similar, viz.,
 * 110 "until answer or further * order," by which the party is prevented from doing what is forbidden until further order. It is not enough "until answer;" the injunction continues after answer until further order of the Court. As in that form the first words, "until answer," so in this clause the words "until the 1st day of August," go for nothing; and the second period of the clause, "until Parliament shall otherwise direct," is to be taken as the termination of the trusts intended by the legislature.

But supposing that these trusts did all become vacant on the 1st of August, 1836, the appellants submit that this was not a proper order of reference. The former trustees, whose conduct and management of the charities were unimpeached, ought to be left at liberty to propose themselves for reappointment. It was not proved nor alleged that they had failed to administer the charity estates and property according to the uses and trusts to which they were subject, or committed any breach of trust, or were unfit to continue trustees. They had the legal estate, which was not divested by the Act. The order of reference for appointing new trustees did not clothe those so appointed with the legal estate, or give them power to effect the objects of the trusts; they were mere phantoms. The legal estate should have been ascertained and declared before they were appointed; the title-deeds of the estates should have been in their possession. Even to this day these trustees are without any power to protect the charity estates and funds.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Pemberton (Mr. Blunt was with them), for the respondents. — By the plain construction of the 71st section of the Municipal Corporations Act, all the estate and interest of the trustees of the charity property were deter-
 * 111 mined on the * 1st of August, 1836. At the time of passing the Act, the danger of leaving the charities to be administered by the same hands that would have the management of the borough fund was clearly foreseen and provided against: first, in case of vacancies happening in the trusts before Parliament made the then intended provision for their future administration, the Lord Chancellor was empowered to fill them up; and, secondly, in case Parliament should not make such provision on or before the 1st of August (the event which happened), the Lord Chancellor was to make orders for their administration. The first proviso, giving power to the Lord Chancellor to fill up vacancies in the trusts, gave no more than the Great Seal possessed before by virtue of office, without any legislative enactments; but it limited the continuance of the persons appointed to the vacancies in the trusts to the 1st of August, 1836, the time when the persons in whose room they might be chosen would have ceased to be trustees. The second proviso, which the appellants would, by their construction, strike out of the section altogether, conferred an enlarged jurisdiction on the Lord Chancellor.

The argument for the continuance of the trustees beyond the 1st of August, 1836, is founded on the words, "or until Parliament shall otherwise direct." These words do not extend the period for the termination of the trusts beyond the 1st of August, but limit the time still stronger, giving the trustees notice that the 1st of August, at all events, would be their last day in office, but that it might cease sooner by the direction of Parliament. The use of the words was most appropriate to apprise the trustees that before the 1st of August another Act might pass for administering the charities. The trustees would have a right to

able privileges and patronage, and they might say that there was a violation of their vested rights, if the time when they were to cease was not limited. The word "continue," it has been contended, is to be taken in an extending sense; certainly it was so meant; that is, to continue until the 1st of August. But whatever interpretation may be given to that word by itself, the words of the last proviso leave no room to doubt that the 1st of August was the final termination of the office of these trustees, if it was not terminated sooner by direction of Parliament. It is also suggested that "or" may be construed "and," by which construction the trusts were not to cease "until Parliament otherwise directed." Such a substitution of the one word for the other would destroy the plain sense of the clause in this case, and it should never be resorted to in any case without the utmost necessity. Price v. Hunt, (a) Duncomb v. Walter, (b) Hall v. Gaun. (c)

The grievance complained of by the appellants is that the Lord Chancellor directed the appointment of new trustees before the former trustees were removed; and they insist that the offices ought to be first declared vacant. But the trustees were removed on the 1st of August, by virtue of the Act of Parliament; it was superfluous to declare the office vacant. The Lord Chancellor's order recites the clause of the 71st section, showing that the trustees were no longer in office. It is implied in the argument for the appellants that the Lord Chancellor might, independently of this Act, remove the trustees. Then it may be asked whether his power is lessened by this section, which gives him new power?

If the Secretary of State were the person appointed to exercise that power, * 113 * instead of the Lord Chancellor, can it be contended that he would not be thereby authorized to appoint new trustees after the 1st of August? Is this clause to be struck out because the Lord Chancellor is the person named; and he had already power by virtue of his office? It is alleged that the new trustees have not the legal estate, and therefore cannot effectually exercise their trusts. It is true they have not the legal estate, but they are nevertheless able to act as trustees. It is given as a reason that Mr. Dunning could not be the author of Junius's letters, because Junius in his dedication used the expression, "They" (the King, Lords, and Commons) "are the trustees, not the owners; the fee-simple is in us;" which certainly, for a lawyer, is not a correct expression. But there are many classes of persons in the character of trustees, and acting with all the power of trustees, without the legal estate. There are the trustees of the British Museum, for instance, who manage, direct, and control that establishment, but have not the legal estate, which remains in the body corporate of that institution.

It may be admitted that all the bodies corporate, and all their members who were trustees of these charities up to the 1st of August, 1836, were immaculate and wholly unimpeachable in their administration of the charity property; but how were they in a situation to discharge their duty after the new composition of the corporations? The whole of the corporation of Norwich, consisting of eighty-five individuals, administered the charities in that city as trustees in their corporate capacity; were the eighty-five individuals to continue in the trusts after they or some of them ceased to be corporators? or was the new corporation, consisting of several thousand persons, to administer the charities? They might * become bankrupts, go reside abroad * 114 or at a distance at home, or perhaps be sent out of the country; acting in their natural capacity, how could they all agree to any act, whether of bringing an ejectment against a tenant, employing a bailiff to distrain, granting a lease, or giving a receipt for the rent? They are no longer corporators doing these matters by their common seal. They would be in the nature of joint tenants, the charities continuing in them in their natural capacity after they ceased to be corporators; and to give validity to any act, they should all join. Any one of them dissenting from the others might give a release to a debtor to the charity. All these circumstances show the great inconvenience that would result from the course which the appellants would follow. What is the inconvenience of the course which has been taken? There was a reference to the Master in the case of every corporation, and the Master devoted his attention to the subject; so that the change was effected in the most convenient manner for all parties, especially for the charities and the objects of them. The corporation trustees being functi officio on the 1st of August, 1836, on which day their interest ceased and the trusts became vacant, the legal estate having been in the old corporation, and the new corporation being a continuation of the old, that estate fell in on that day; the lease, as it were, expiring, the reversioner becomes seised, and from that day the reversion and the legal estate are in the new corporation. It was certainly a mistake not to have given the Lord Chancellor power to vest the legal estate in the new trustees. It was not contemplated at the time that he could not so vest it. The error was seen and corrected in the Irish Municipal Corporations Act, * and it * 115 certainly is an inconvenience which the legislature ought speedily to remedy. But it signifies little, compared with the mischiefs that would result from the construction put on the Act by the appellants. The corporation of Norwich consists of 3000 members, besides the governing body; and the legal estate is in the whole corporation, who certainly could not act together as trustees of these charities. If their Lordships would for a moment consider the enormous evils that would follow from the retransfer of these charities from the new trustees to those who before had the management of them, surely nothing would induce their Lordships to such a step, unless they thought the language of the Act imperatively required it. From the first clause of the Act to the last, it appears that every officer of the corporation was wholly divested of every power which had been vested in him. Were the charity trustees alone to be continued until Parliament passed another Act? The effect of the 71st section, it is submitted, was, that all the estate and interest of the corporation trustees ceased on the 1st of August, 1836; and there being then no trustees by whom the charities could be administered, the defect could only be supplied by means of the authority of the Lord Chancellor, under the last proviso of that section, or of the Court of Chancery or Court of Exchequer, under the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101.

Mr. Knight Bruce, in reply. — Any alleged inconvenience that may result from the retransfer of these trusts should have no weight, as all the new appointments were made after this appeal was known to be lodged. All the acts that have been done since, have been done in the face and defiance of this appeal;

 * 116 * and the appellants did all that was in their power to bring it to a hearing, while the respondents did all they could to prevent the hearing. The House would not, therefore, be influenced by any thing that happened in respect to other charities since this order was made. The reference made to the different form of the Irish Municipal Corporations Act, shows the strength of the appellants' construction of this Act. The words in the Irish Act are not "until," but "unless Parliament shall sooner," &c. The mischiefs which this Act was to provide against were the political abuses, the self-elections of the governing bodies, and not any misgovernment of the charities. The chief object was to regulate the municipal government, not to remodel the charity trusts; that was a mere incident.

An argument was drawn from the number of the former corporation, that they being now in their natural capacity could not act together. But there are now forty-two trustees appointed of these charities, twenty-one of one side, twenty-one of the other; are these forty-two more likely to agree than the eighty-five members of the old corporate body? There is more facility for dissension in the present number, especially in respect to religion; persons of all religious persuasions being now in the corporation, which formerly consisted of one religious class.

Judges ; viz., “ Whether the administration of the charity estates and funds comprised in, and described by, the 71st section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, continued after the 1st day of August, 1836, in the persons described in the said 71st section, no subsequent Act having passed respecting the same before the 1st of * August, 1836, and no vacancy having been occasioned * 117 amongst such persons before that time ? ”

That question was agreed to by the House, and time was given to the Judges to answer it.

June 25.

Lord Chief Justice TINDAL delivered the opinion of the Judges as follows.— In answer to the question proposed by your Lordships to her Majesty’s Judges [read it], I have the honour of stating our opinion to be, that the administration of the charity estates and funds referred to in the question, did not continue after the 1st of August, 1836, in the persons described in the 71st section. It was admitted by the counsel for the appellants in the course of the argument, and very properly admitted, that it is impossible to put any construction on the whole of the clause without meeting much difficulty. But we think ourselves bound to put that interpretation upon it, which, taking the whole of it together, appears to us to do the least violence to the words employed in it, and at the same time to give a consistent meaning to every part of the section. And keeping this object in view, we think the words in the 71st section, that the powers of the former trustees “ shall continue until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament shall otherwise order, and shall immediately thereupon utterly cease and determine,” are to be construed as if the words had been “ until the 1st of August, 1836, or until Parliament shall, in the mean time, or sooner, otherwise order ; ” and that the words “ shall immediately thereupon utterly cease and determine,” intend that if Parliament does not in the mean time otherwise order, the powers shall cease and determine on the * 1st of August ; and if Parliament did, in the mean * 118 time, otherwise order, that then they should cease and determine upon the day which should be appointed and substituted by the legislature instead of the 1st of August. And we feel ourselves warranted in giving this construction to the earlier part of the clause by the consideration that the last proviso in the same section contains an enactment relating to the same subject-matter of legislation, and which is free from all ambiguity whatever, viz., "Provided, also, that if Parliament shall not otherwise direct on or before the 1st day of August, 1836, the Lord Chancellor, &c., shall make such orders as he shall see fit for the administration of such trust estates." And we cannot understand the legislature to have had in its view an alteration by Parliament unlimited in point of time in the former part, but limited in point of time to the 1st of August in the latter part of the same section. The construction contended for on the part of the appellants, is further liable to this objection, that it leaves the time at which the powers of the former trustees are to cease and determine altogether undefined and uncertain. There might happen, according to that construction, an interval of time of unlimited extent before Parliament might think fit to interfere and otherwise order; and in the mean time it is obvious that all would be involved in doubt and uncertainty. And again, there is, as it appears to us, a very strong objection against the reading "and" instead of "or," as contended for on the part of the appellants: that is, against reading the Act thus, "until the 1st day of August, 1836, and until Parliament shall otherwise order;" for this would imply that Parliament could have no power to make such an order until after the 1st of August had

* 119 passed; a construction not only *inconsistent with the general authority of Parliament, but irreconcilable with the proviso above referred to, which expressly refers to an alteration to be made before the 1st of August. Upon the whole, we think that the administration of the charity estates and funds did not continue in the persons described in the 71st section, after the 1st of August, 1836.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — This case, in which your Lordships have just heard the opinion of the learned Judges, having been an appeal from an order made in Chancery; and the opinion of the learned Judges being, that the administration of the charity estates did not continue in the persons described in the 71st section of the Act, after the 1st of August, 1836: I shall move that your Lordships adopt the opinion so expressed; and the only question will be as to the costs. This being an appeal against an order which, in the unanimous opinion of the learned Judges, is considered to be a correct order, and the respondents being trustees of charities, I apprehend your Lordships will think it a case in which the order ought to be affirmed, with costs.

LORD WYNFORD. — I quite agree in the opinion delivered on behalf of the learned Judges: that opinion is the same which I had formed upon the question before I heard the opinion which has now been delivered. But I confess that, considering the difficulty in construing the Act of Parliament, and considering, too, that this is the first time that this question has come under the consideration of the House, and that it was important to the interests of the municipal charities in this country generally that the question should be determined, * I think it would * 120 be hard to visit the appellants with costs. In this case the learned Judges have found their way through all the mazes and perplexities of this Act of Parliament, in my opinion, to a right conclusion: but when it is admitted, even by the counsel, that the Act of Parliament was attended with difficulties, I think that the appellants should not be visited with costs: and I would, therefore, move an amendment upon that part of the motion of my noble and learned friend, that the judgment be affirmed, without costs.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — I was not in the least aware that upon this point there would be any difference of opinion, otherwise I should have proposed that the further consideration of the case should be postponed, inasmuch as it is in the absence of a noble and learned Lord who has been present during the whole of the argument, and with whom I communicated upon this subject before he left the House: but as the noble and learned Lord who has just addressed your Lordships differs in his view of the judgment I proposed to your Lordships to pronounce, I would suggest that the consideration of the case be now postponed.

The Attorney-General. — May I be allowed to say that, on behalf of the respondents, I am instructed to pray that their costs may be allowed? They submit that it would be extremely hard if the costs should fall upon the charity.

August 5.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The only question remaining to be disposed of in this case is as to the costs. * The * 121 order appealed from is an order made in the Court of Chancery. The learned Judges have given their opinion unanimously that the judgment below is correct; and it is matter of course, unless there is some reason to the contrary, that costs should follow the affirmance of the judgment of the Court below, and particularly in this case where the respondents are trustees of a charity.

LORD BROUGHAM. — There can be no doubt whatever upon it. I cannot say that a case might not have arisen in which a contrary practice might be adopted; but in this case there was no reasonable doubt raised upon the construction of the Act. The circumstance of the learned Judges being unanimous raises the presumption that the case was free from doubt.

Ordered, that the appeal be dismissed, and the order complained of be affirmed: and that the appellants pay the respondents the costs incurred in respect of the appeal.

Appellate Jurisdiction. Bailey v. Maule, referred to, supra, pp. 93–95, was an appeal against an order in the cause of Watkins v. Maule (2 Jac. & W. 237; see also Maule v. The Duke of Beaufort, 1 Russ. 349), which was a creditors' suit for the administration of the estate of Benj. Hall, Esq., deceased. Under the decree in that cause, Joseph Bailey, Esq., was reported the purchaser of the Rumney estate and iron works; the report was confirmed by an order dated August 16th, 1824, and the purchase-money paid into court, and Mr. Bailey put into possession. Afterwards, by an order dated the 23d of February, 1825, the former order confirming Bailey as the purchaser, and all the subsequent proceedings, were set aside, on the ground of some dealings between Bailey and Llewellyn, one of the trustees and executors of Hall. Mr. Bailey, though no party to the cause, appealed from that order. The appeal was heard and dismissed, and the order complained of was affirmed. Evidence. Cross-examination. Competency of Question.

On the trial of an issue "whether (during a certain period) there arose from the works of the defenders certain noisome, offensive, noxious, or unwholesome smoke and other vapours, to the nuisance of the pursuer, whereby the produce of his garden was deteriorated," evidence was adduced for the pursuer to show that the smoke and other vapours from defenders' works had injured the produce of other grounds in the neighbourhood; and also for the defenders to show that their works did not injure the produce of any other grounds; and one of the defenders' witnesses having, on his examination in chief, described several gardens in the neighbourhood of the works as in utmost health, was asked in cross-examination by pursuer's counsel, if he knew Glasgow Field (grounds in the neighbourhood); and having answered that he "knew Glasgow Field, and never knew of any damage done there," he was then asked "whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field for alleged damage there occasioned by their works?"

Held, by the House of Lords (overruling the judgment of the Court of Session), that the question was incompetent, as leading to a new collateral inquiry, which, answered either way, could not affect the issue, or test the credit of the witness.¹

THE question in this appeal originated in an action for damages brought by the respondent against the appellants in the Court of Session in Scotland, in the year 1834. The appellants were then, dent's garden, trees, plants, and vegetables, during his *123 occupation, by the smoke and *other vapours emitted from the appellants' works. Issues were prepared for trial by a jury. The first issue, which alone is material to be stated, was as follows: "Whether during the year 1819, and subsequent thereto, up to Martinmas, 1832, or during any part of the said period, there arose from the said works of the defenders (the appellants) certain noisome, offensive, noxious, or unwholesome smoke and other vapours, to the nuisance of the said pursuer (the respondent), whereby the produce of the said garden was deteriorated, and the pursuer incommoded and annoyed in the enjoyment thereof, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer." The issues came on to be tried before Lord JEFFREY, in the Jury Court, held at Glasgow, in October, 1836. "And in the course of the trial" (as stated in the bill of exceptions herein after mentioned), "the counsel for the pursuer did adduce evidence with a view to establish or satisfy the jury that the smoke and other vapours from the said works had occasioned damage and injury to the produce of other grounds in the neighbourhood of the said works; and the counsel for the defenders did adduce evidence to establish or satisfy the jury that the said works did not occasion any damage or injury to the produce of any other grounds in the neighbourhood thereof. And the counsel for the defenders examined —

"David Smith, who said he was land-surveyor in Glasgow for thirty years, and often surveyed lands about St. Rollox, and recently made a plan of the vicinage from his own survey. (Swears the plan is accurate, and explains it). Knows Harvey's garden; nearer the works than pursuer's; is a most beautiful garden, and the finest flowers he ever saw. Was *124 himself bred a gardener, and takes pleasure in it. *Remembers pursuer occupying his garden; it looked well in spring, but no attention was paid to keep it clean; weeds grew over tops of bushes; saw it when pursuer removed; it was then wretched. Lately saw Patrick's garden, in the neighbourhood ; it had twenty fruit trees in it ; none had the least appearance of injury or disease, except one branch of one pear-tree ; shoots of currants from twenty-one to thirty-nine inches, &c. Also examined Edgar's garden, which is most to west, and found all the same, good flowers, &c. Also surveyed Broomhill nursery, 200 to 500 yards from the defenders' works ; every thing there in utmost health at nearest places to the works ; plants of all ages in excellent condition. Surveyed all houses within circle of 700 yards of the works ; there are 748 dwelling-houses, from a rent of 120*l.* to 5*l.*

“ Cross-examined. — Rather less than eight acres occupied by defenders' works. They have increased greatly of late ; in 1824 covered nearly five acres, &c. Knows Glasgow Field ; never knew of any damage done there.”

The counsel for the pursuer having proposed to ask the witness “ whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field, for alleged damage there occasioned by their works,” the counsel for the defenders objected to that question being put, and insisted that it was incompetent. The counsel for the pursuer insisted that on the whole circumstances of the case the question was competent ; but the objection was sustained by Lord JEFFREY, and he refused to allow the question to be put ; whereupon the counsel for the pursuer excepted to his Lordship's opinion, and tendered a bill of exceptions accordingly. After further evidence, the jury found a verdict for the defenders.

* Lord JEFFREY afterwards signed the bill of exceptions, * 125 which being presented to the first division of the Court of Session, their Lordships appointed the question involved in it to be argued on minutes of debate ; and afterwards, upon advising the case with the minutes of debate for the parties, their Lordships pronounced an interlocutor on the 14th of February, 1839, by which they allowed the exception, set aside the verdict, and granted a new trial. LORD GILLIES. — This case has been very ably argued in the papers which are now before us, and we are thus enabled satisfactorily to determine whether this question should have been allowed or disallowed by the presiding Judge

The appeal was against that interlocutor.

* 126 * The Lord Advocate and Mr. Anderson, for the appel-

at the trial. I must own that from the very beginning this case has always appeared to me in the same light, and I have never seen any cause to alter my original opinion : I must, however, say that I most heartily concurred in the opinion of the importance of this question, and as being one which well deserved from us the fullest and most ample consideration. I am extremely happy that the case has been put into that shape that we can now dispose of the point, which is very satisfactory both to ourselves and to the parties. I am also happy to say that I understand we are all agreed in opinion, and to add that that most learned and excellent Judge, of whose able assistance we are at present unfortunately deprived by indisposition (but who was present at the debate on this question), concurs in the opinion which I am now about to state : — [His Lordship, after stating the nature of the action and the terms of the first issue, and the material statements contained in the bill of exceptions down to the examination of the witness, Smith, proceeded thus :] — The object of the defenders was, by his (Smith's) testimony, to show that in other gardens and grounds, situated nearer to the defenders' works than the garden of the pursuer, no injury was sustained by the plants, vegetables, &c., thereof. I need not go over his evidence in detail, but, in short, he goes over all the gardens in the neighbourhood, and states that, so far as he knew, no injury whatever was sustained by them from the works of the defenders. Now it is important to observe, that no objection was taken to this course of inquiry : it is said, indeed, that this was not the best evidence that could be adduced ; and most certainly it was not, for the parties themselves, whose gardens were said to have suffered, might have been called and examined ; so that this is secondary evidence (if I may so term it), and might perhaps have been objected to ; but so it is that it was not objected to ; and all these matters are allowed to be gone into without objection. Then, after being examined by the defenders, he is cross-examined by the pursuer, when he says, " he knows Glasgow Field ; never knew of any damage done there." It was then proposed to ask him, " whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field, the situation of which is pointed out on his plan, for alleged damage there occasioned by their works ? " This question was objected to as incompetent, and the question now is, whether that interrogatory should or should not have been allowed : and certainly, when we consider the general principles of jury trial, and particularly the examination of witnesses, this is a question of very great importance. If it was of importance to ascertain if the works of the defenders did or did not do injury to the adjacent territory, and if it was competent for the defenders to examine Smith for that purpose ; then certainly, after he had stated that, so far as he knew, no injury had been sustained by the grounds in the neighbourhood, it seems to me to have been highly proper on the part of the pursuer to ask him regarding the damage done to Glasgow Field ; and he deponed that " he knows Glasgow Field, and never knew of any damage done there : " and following up the same line of inquiry, the next question put, and that objected to, is, " do you know of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field, for alleged damage occasioned by their

works? ” Now, it appears to me that this question is pertinent to the merits of the case, and I cannot conceive a more proper question for the pursuer to put ; but it was objected to, and on what grounds? viz., that it might elicit an inadmissible or improper answer ; as, for example, that he had heard, or guessed, or suspected that such had been the case : but this is not an objection to the competency of the question at all. If, indeed, a question naturally or necessarily elicits an improper or inadmissible answer, then it may be objected to by the counsel, or by the Court, and it may even be so modified as to prevent such an answer being given to it ; but the question put in this case does not appear to me to be of that description : the question is, whether the witness knew that such a sum of money had been given by the defenders, not whether he had heard of or suspected it : for he may actually have paid, or seen paid, or been chosen for the purpose of paying this very sum of money : but it is absurd to hold the question incompetent because an improper or inadmissible answer may have been returned to it ; and we know that every day in the Justiciary Court a proper and pertinent question is allowed to be put, although the answer to it may not be received. But the real and only point to be ascertained in judging of the competency of such a question is, whether it necessarily or naturally is calculated to elicit such an answer : but when limited, as in this case, to the knowledge of the witness, how can it be calculated necessarily or naturally to produce such an answer? for the witness is bound to speak only of his own knowledge, and to speak of nothing else. It seems to me, therefore, quite proper to put this question : but if there be any objection to the answer, — for truly this seems, on the part of the defenders, to be an objection to the answer, — it would be competent for the defenders, through the aid of their counsel, or for the Judge, to object to the answer, if the witness had stated what he suspected merely, not what he knew. The witness may have been present when the defenders offered compensation to the proprietors of Glasgow Field ; he may have heard the amount of that compensation stated ; he may have been employed to adjust and actually have adjusted the matter himself, well knowing that it was offered and accepted of as compensation : but all that goes to the answer which he is bound to make to the question, and though he said that he did not know of any damage being done there, he might still have known of money having been paid by the defenders for alleged damage. Put the case that A. is assaulted by B., and that he brings an action of damages against him, and calls a witness C., who swears that he saw B. assault A., would it not be competent for B., on cross-examination, to ask C. whether he first of all saw A. assault B., and knew that A. had actually paid a sum of money to B. for alleged damage then done to him? That would be a competent and relevant question. I therefore have no doubt, in the first place, that this was a competent question in itself : and in the second place, I do not consider that because an improper or inadmissible answer may have been returned to it, that was any reason for disallowing it : if such answer was given, it might have been objected to ; as, if he was merely speaking from what he heard or suspected, and not of what he knew. In no case can you always get proper evidence, without the possibility at least of raising many answers which are quite inadmissible.

* 128 was manifestly incompetent ; it did not * bear on any fact arising in the cause under the issues, but merely went to inquire whether the appellants paid money in order to get rid of an alleged claim : a matter quite irrelevant to the point in issue, and evidence in regard to which was inadmissible, because an answer even in the affirmative would be no proof of the fact proposed to be established. The payment of money, if proved, would not be proof that damage was done ; it might be paid to buy peace, and get rid of an alleged claim. But it was argued

I therefore think this question should have been allowed to be put, and that we should sustain the bill of exceptions. As to the plea, that perhaps money might have been paid by the defenders merely for the purpose of buying their peace, I am not quite sure that such a fact was wholly inadmissible, in a question where a third party was desirous of founding on it. But it is not required of me to give an opinion on that point, as it could not be raised until after the question had been allowed and answered.

LORD MACKENZIE. — I concur in the opinion which has just been delivered, and think that, in the circumstances of this case, the question was competent, and ought not to have been rejected.

LORD PRESIDENT. — I am of the same opinion. This is a very important question, and it is fortunate we all concur in opinion. I must confess I had formed more than one opinion on it, but at last I have come to the same opinion with your Lordships. The witness is asked, “ Do you know whether a sum of money was paid by the defenders for alleged damage to Glasgow Field? ” It is the question of knowledge that is referred to him, and he had previously answered that he never knew of any damage being done there ; he uses here the word knew ; he never knew of any damage being done. Now, the word “ knew,” as used there, may be capable of two or three meanings. I may never have known it myself, or I may never have seen it myself ; but it did not follow that there was no damage done. But though it may be very true that he never knew personally of any damage being done, yet the question, “ did you not know that money was paid by the defenders for alleged damage? ” might, in the first place, have refreshed his memory, and he might have said, “ Oh, I forgot : I do remember now that a sum of money was paid by the defenders : ” at all events, the question was competent, whatever becomes of the answer of the party. The examination of the witness at this time related to the damage done to the neighbouring grounds ; and in order to expiscate that matter, questions were allowed to be put in relation to particular grounds ; and the question objected to was, “ did you know that a sum was paid by the defenders for alleged damage? ” and he might have answered, “ I did : I was present at the whole transaction.” Now, though this may have proved a compromise of the claim of damages at the instance of the proprietors of Glasgow Field, and though the answer might have been nugatory, or even hurtful to the party who put it, still that does not render the question in itself incompetent. I need not go over the various grounds which have been stated by your Lordships, in which I concur.

in the Court below, that the proposed question, though incompetent as evidence in the cause, was admissible to test the credit of the witness. The answer is, that that was not the object for which the question was put, and the respondent cannot now be allowed to rest on * a point that was not suggested * 129 at the trial, on which no judgment was asked or given at the trial, and which is not raised in the bill of exceptions. Besides, even the question had been put for the purpose of testing the credit of the witness, still it would have been incompetent, because the answer to it in either way could not have tried the credit of the witness. They cited, in addition to several Scotch cases, Phillips on Evidence, (a) Starkie on Evidence, (b) and Crowley v. Paye. (c)

The Attorney-General and Mr. M'Neil, for the respondent. — The line of examination pursued by both parties at the trial had been to show, on the one side, that damage had been done to other grounds in the neighbourhood of the appellant's works; and, on the other side, that no such damage had been done. The issue being to ascertain whether the smoke and other vapours from the appellants' works were noxious or unwholesome, it was competent and quite relevant to inquire into the effects they produced on the neighbouring grounds. The statements contained in the record and bill of exceptions show that such injury to the neighbouring grounds had been specifically condended on and examined into on both sides; so that there could be no objection to that line of examination on the ground of surprise at the trial. Although some of those statements were denied on the record by the appellants, they were not stated to be irrelevant; and no motion having been made to have them struck out of the record, they had competently been admitted to be proved. The proposed line of * cross-examination had also an * 130 immediate bearing on the question at issue. If it had been competently proved that injury had been or not been done to other grounds, it became then proper and necessary to ascertain the witness's means of knowledge of that fact. The latter inquiry was so necessarily consequent on the former, that the witness might himself have mentioned the fact of payment of money as his cause of knowledge of the damage, if he had been called to testify on behalf of the respondent, and not against him. Would not payment of money for damage under a verdict of a jury, or under an award, have been admissible as evidence of damage having been done? It was a mistake of the appellants to assume that the respondent was attempting to make a payment, made in order to compromise a disputed claim or purchase peace, as they said, evidence of damage. That was premature; the proper time to consider whether a compromise of a claim of damages with the proprietors of Glasgow Field could affect the merits of the case, would be when such compromise was established. The respondent's counsel had inquired merely into the witness's knowledge of the fact of payment, and no question was raised as to whether a compromise between the appellants and a third party might be given in evidence. The appellants alleged that no party complained of the nuisance; the respondent alleged that there were such complaints, and that sums of money were paid for damage; to which the appellants replied that these sums, even if paid, might have been paid under a compromise, which would not be proof of the truth of such complaints. But the question put and objected to was not "Do you know that there was a compromise?" but "Do you know that money was paid for alleged damage?" The fact

* 131 * of payment of money though being collateral, yet being also relevant to the fact of damage having been done, which was the matter in issue, there was nothing to prevent the respondent's counsel from cross-examining the witness in relation to it. Even in examinations in chief collateral but relevant matter may be inquired into, but much more so in cross-examination, and especially where the points to which the evidence was collateral formed the substance of the witness's previous examination. In cross-examinations with a view to sift evidence and try the credit of witnesses, great latitude is allowed in the mode of putting questions. and smoke prejudicial to the property of the pursuer. A witness, David Smith, was called for the defenders, and he was examined as to certain premises in the neighbourhood of the manufactory; but he was not examined by the party producing him with respect to the place called Glasgow Field,—not the place in question in the action, but a place situated near the manufactory. Both parties went into evidence for the purpose of showing what was the effect of this manufactory emitting smoke and vapour upon the lands similarly circumstanced * to those * 132 of the party complaining. Whether that was a legitimate mode of inquiry need not now be considered; for both parties pursued it, and for one purpose it was undoubtedly a legitimate mode of inquiry, viz., for ascertaining what the effect was of the smoke and vapour emitted by this manufactory. This witness was examined as to several lands in the neighbourhood; and then a cross-examination took place, and the witness says in answer, “he knows Glasgow Field; never knew of any damage done there.” That was not the answer which the pursuer, cross-examining the defenders’ witness, wished him to give. He had fixed him with the knowledge of Glasgow Field; he intended to use him to show that Glasgow Field had been injured by the vapour and smoke emitted from the manufactory; but, however, the answer given was not for the benefit of the party cross-examining him. Then the counsel for the pursuer proposed to ask the witness “whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field, for alleged damage there occasioned by the works?” The witness had already said that he knew of no damage done there. If that question had been asked him by the defenders, no doubt a great latitude in cross-examination might have been permitted to the pursuer, for the purpose as well of ascertaining what he meant by “he did not know,” as for the purpose of testing the accuracy of his statement; but it so happens, when he says he knows Glasgow Field, and never knew of any damage done there, it is an answer given by him to a question of the pursuer in cross-examining him. The pursuer is entering into a line of examination for the first time, and having got an answer which did not suit his purpose, he endeavours to get rid of the effect of that answer by * putting a question upon a point short * 133 of what was the witness’s knowledge; viz., “whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field, for alleged damage?” The pursuer meant, if he could get an answer favourable to his view, to make that part of his case ; he meant, not being able to get the witness to say that he knew of any damage, to get him to say that which he conceived would be the next best evidence, but which, in fact, would be no evidence at all. If the witness had answered in the affirmative, that he had known of money being paid for alleged damage, it would be no evidence ; because money paid upon a complaint made, paid merely to purchase peace, is no proof that the demand is well founded ; it is not, therefore, to be given in evidence in support of the fact of damage being sustained.

Upon general principles, the rule of law in this country and in Scotland must be the same : if a pursuer calls a witness, and asks him as to money being paid for alleged damage, his answer in the affirmative is not evidence of actual damage. If the pursuer had made a claim upon the owners of the manufactory for damage done to his field from the smoke and vapour emitted, and the owners had given money to quiet his complaint, that would be no evidence of the damage ; it is money paid to buy peace and to stop complaint ; it is very often a wise thing, however unfounded a complaint may be, for parties to pay a sum of money in order to quiet the party making the complaint. But this does not rest merely upon general principles. The rule of law in this country has been cited by the appellants ; and from the authorities cited by them, it appears there is no distinction between the two countries in this respect.

* 134 * The question clearly could not be put in order to elicit evidence for the party making the complaint ; but it is said it was admissible in order to test the credit of the witness. Now the witness had said nothing in his examination by the party for whom he was called, touching this matter. He had spoken of other properties, but he had said nothing which could lead to this cross-examination, and therefore it was not for the purpose of testing the accuracy or truth of any thing he had said. The question cannot be supported upon that ground, nor was that the ground, as I understood the argument, upon which it was attempted to be supported, but that it might be put as a matter, of inquiry, with a view to test the witness's credit. But if it be not evidence, it is an inquiry perfectly collateral ; an inquiry into a matter which was not relevant to the subject-matter in dispute. It does not relate to the subject-matter ; and it is an acknowledged law of evidence that you cannot go into an irrelevant inquiry for the purpose of raising a collateral issue to discredit a witness produced on the other side.

On these grounds the learned Judge who tried the cause was of opinion that the question was not admissible under the circumstances of this examination; and to that ruling of the learned Judge—unfortunately for all parties, because leading to great and unnecessary expense—a bill of exceptions was tendered, and the Court of Session was of opinion that the question was admissible. The party against whom that decision was made necessarily came here in order to have that judgment considered; because the Court of Session, being of opinion that the ruling of the learned Judge before whom the issue had been tried was erroneous, and that the bill of exceptions was well founded,

* had no alternative but to direct a venire de novo. It * 135 was necessary that the case should be tried again in consequence of the Court of Session coming to that opinion, however unimportant the point might be; so that there was to be a fresh inquiry upon a point which could not affect the question one way or the other, whether the jury had or had not come to a right conclusion upon the evidence produced before them; but assuming that they had,—(if they had not, there would be ground for a motion for a new trial, and in that way, if there had been a failure in the jury trial, the parties might have had an opportunity of trying the case over again;)—but assuming that the jury had come to a right conclusion upon the matter before them, there is to be a new trial upon a point of evidence which, in whatever way the witness answered, could not, in my opinion at least, affect the result.

It is very unfortunate when cases take that turn, and protracted litigation ensues upon points which have not the slightest bearing upon the result of the case. In this country much depends, in reference to tendering bills of exceptions, upon those who have the conduct of the cause; and though it is competent for counsel to tender bills of exceptions, it is, in practice, reserved only for cases of great importance, where the real question between the parties is conceived to turn upon the point, and where it requires the adjudication of the Court to set them right. It is a matter to be regretted that the rule which prevails so beneficially in this country, of reserving that course of proceeding only for cases that really deserve it, is not followed in Scotland. This case is an example of the evil which must flow from the too liberal use by the suitor of the * right of tendering a * 136 bill of exceptions, and calling in question the ruling of a Court of justice.

I have no doubt that this was a question which, under the circumstances, it was not competent for the pursuer to put, and that the learned Judge who tried the cause came to a right conclusion upon the evidence, and the bill of exceptions upon that point ought to be disallowed. Under these circumstances, I move your Lordships to reverse the interlocutor appealed from, which decided that the learned Judge who tried the issue had not properly ruled.

It was accordingly ordered that the interlocutor complained of in the appeal be reversed, and that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session, with directions to disallow the bill of exceptions, to determine all questions of expenses between the parties in the said Court, and to proceed otherwise in the said cause as shall be just, &c.

EDMUND PLOWDEN, Esq., THOMAS MATTINGLEY,	} Appellants.
WILLIAM BUDD, GEORGE BLISS, and CHARLES COWPER
The Rev. HENRY THORPE, Clerk	Respondent.

Tithes. Composition. Principles of Equity. Construction of Statutes.

To a rector's bill against the owner and occupiers of lands for an account of tithes, they, by their answers, set up an agreement made in 1711, between the then rector and the owner of the lands (who was also patron of the living), by which certain lands and a perpetual annuity were given to the rector in exchange for his glebe lands, and for the discharge of the lands occupied by the defendants from tithes. The agreement was, and continued to be, beneficial to the church, having been made with reference to the probable future increase in the value of the tithes ; it was approved by the Ordinary, and established by a decree of the Court of Chancery, and acted on down to the filing of the bill, when the rector refused to accept the annuity, but still retained the lands allotted to him in the exchange, which were much more valuable than the old glebe lands.

Held, that although it was open to the rector to put an end to the agreement, as being void under the disabling statutes, he was not entitled to the aid of equity to enforce his legal title to the tithes while he retained part of the consideration for their discharge, contrary to the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity.

To a bill filed for tithes against occupiers of land, in July, 1833, the owner was made a defendant by amendment in January, 1835.

Quære, whether he was defendant to a suit commenced within the time limited by the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 100, § 3 ; that is, within a year from the 17th of August, 1832?

January 27. February 3, 6.

THE respondent was instituted and inducted into the rectory and parish church of Aston-le-Walls, in the county of Northampton, in December, 1831 ; and on the 16th of July, 1833, he filed his bill in the Court of Exchequer against the appellants Mattingley, Budd, Bliss, and Cowper, for an account and payment of the single value of all tithes arising from the farms and lands occupied by them respectively within the said parish, from the time of his induction. The * bill charged that the * 138 respondent caused notice in writing of his demand of tithes to be served on the said appellants in June, 1833, but that they refuse to comply therewith, on pretence of a subsisting modus or customary payment in lieu of tithes.

The four last named appellants, by their answer, set forth, among other matters of defence, an agreement dated the 1st of March, 1711, and made by and between William Plowden, Esq. (ancestor of the first named appellant), and the Rev. John Wilson, the then incumbent of the said parish, by which agreement,—after reciting that the said W. Plowden was lord of the manor of Aston and patron of the said church of Aston-le-Walls, as appendant to the manor, and was also seised of divers parcels of land lying dispersed in the common fields of Aston ; and that the said J. Wilson was then rector of the said church, and in right thereof was seised of divers other parcels of land lying also dispersed in the said common fields, and also of a parcel of ground lying in a close called Aston Close, in the said parish, being the glebe lands belonging to the said rectory, and that in right of his said church he was entitled to tithes of all sorts arising as well out of the common fields as out of the demesne lands of the said W. Plowden in Aston ; and further reciting that the said lands in the common fields were of little value, lying so dispersed, and that it was apprehended that it would be a great improvement as well to the said church as to W. Plowden's estate in Aston, if the said common fields were enclosed and certain exchanges made, but that W. Plowden was desirous that the rights and profits of the said church might be preserved, and that the said J. Wilson and his successors might have and enjoy, in right of his said church, an advantage by a just proportion of the improvement expected from such

 * 139 * enclosure,—it was agreed that all the several pieces and parcels of the common fields of Aston, therein respectively described, should, together with the churchyard, parsonage house and close, gardens, orchards, &c., and all grounds belonging thereto, for ever thereafter be deemed and taken as the glebe land of and belonging to the church of Aston, and as such should be for ever enjoyed by the said J. Wilson and his successors, rectors of the said church; and also that the sum of 40*l.* per annum, payable half-yearly, should be issuing out of and chargeable on the said W. Plowden's said manor, messuages, and lands in Aston, and be secured for ever for the use and benefit of the said J. Wilson and his successors, rectors of the said church. (Then followed various easements, privileges, and benefits to the rectors.) And the said J. Wilson, by the said articles, in consideration of the premises, agreed to and with the said W. Plowden, his heirs and assigns, that all those pieces and parcels of land formerly reputed and taken as the glebe land belonging to the church of Aston, and lying in the said common fields, and theretofore in the possession of J. Wilson or his tenants, and the said parcel of ground in Aston Close, should from thenceforth be enjoyed by the said W. Plowden and his heirs as his and their own proper estate for ever: and also that all lands, tenements, and hereditaments whereof the said W. Plowden was possessed as owner in Aston should for ever thereafter be discharged from the payment of all manner of tithes, oblations, &c., and all other dues theretofore payable out of his estate in Aston, except as aforesaid, and also except such tithes and dues as were properly personal, and did not purely arise out of W. Plowden's estate.

The answer then stated that shortly after the signing
 * 140 * of the agreement, W. Plowden, with the approbation of J. Wilson, inclosed the whole of the said common fields of the manor of Aston, and duly set out the several parcels of land in the agreement mentioned to be given to J. Wilson and his successors, rectors of the church of Aston; and that J. Wilson entered upon, and he and his successors, incumbents of the said rectory, had ever since been, and that the respondent, as the present incumbent, was then, in the possession and enjoyment of the last mentioned pieces of land; and that the said W. Plowden, pursuant to the agreement, also annexed to his estate the several pieces of land mentioned in the agreement as thereby agreed to be given to him in exchange; and W. Plowden and his heirs and assigns had ever since been, and then were seised and possessed of such last mentioned lands.

The said answer further stated, that in March, 1713, W. Plowden and J. Wilson petitioned the Bishop of Peterborough (within which diocese the parish and manor of Aston lay) for leave to perfect the said agreement; and that the said bishop accordingly appointed commissioners to inquire into the subject-matter of the said agreement, and to report whether the covenants therein contained were reasonable and equal, and no ways detrimental to the church of Aston and the rectors thereof; and the said commissioners examined competent witnesses touching the subject, and it appeared by their testimony that the proposed exchange would be an advantage to the said rectory; that the tithes of the open fields were worth about 38*l.* per annum, and that they and the glebe lands had been let for 80*l.* per annum, but a reduction of 4*l.* was made to the tenant, and the tithes in the enclosed lands were worth about 18*l.* or 20*l.*, making the whole value of the glebe and tithes in Aston 94*l.* * or * 141 96*l.* per annum; and that the annual value of the lands proposed to be given by W. Plowden in exchange (containing 140 acres) was from 120*l.* to 130*l.* per annum; so that the rectory would gain from 60*l.* to 70*l.* per annum by the exchange; and the commissioners accordingly certified that the proposed exchange of lands, and the annual payment of 40*l.* out of W. Plowden's estate, would be greatly to the advantage of the rectory: that the said bishop therefore duly consented to the carrying into effect the said exchange.

The answer then stated, that in 1714, the said W. Plowden filed a bill in the Court of Chancery against the said J. Wilson, and also against the Bishop of Peterborough; and thereby, after stating the said agreement, &c., and that the said W. Plowden and J. Wilson, to show the justice of their design in the said exchange and enclosure, and that the rights of the said church were not prejudiced but meliorated thereby, had joined in a petition to the said bishop to inquire by commission into the nature of the said enclosure and exchange, and that the said bishop had duly certified the same to be for the benefit of the said church, so that the said W. Plowden did hope to enjoy the lands so exchanged; but although the said W. Plowden and J. Wilson were the only persons then interested, and were satisfied as to the equality of the exchange, and were desirous to have the said agreement and enclosure perfected, yet the same could not be of force against the successors of the said J. Wilson in the rectory unless established by decree of the Court, &c.; and the bill prayed that the said agreement, exchange and enclosure might be established by decree of the said Court: that the Bishop of Peterborough answered the said bill, and admitted, that on * the petition of the said W. Plowden and J. Wilson to him, a commission was issued to inquire whether the said inclosure and exchange were for the benefit of the said church, and it was thereupon found to be much for the interest of the church, and not only beneficial to the said J. Wilson, but also to his successors, rectors of said church, and therefore that he (the bishop) was willing the same should be confirmed by decree of the Court: that the said J. Wilson also answered the said bill, and stated that he and the said W. Plowden had taken all precautions that the said exchange and enclosure might be reasonable and just, and that he was ready to ratify the same, and desirous also that the same should be established by the decree of the Court: that the said cause was heard in July, 1715, before the then Master of the Rolls, who ordered and decreed that the said agreement should be performed, and that the said exchange of lands should be confirmed and made perpetual.

And the said four appellants, by their said answer, further stated, that shortly afterwards the said W. Plowden sold the advowson of the said rectory to the president and scholars of St. John's College, Oxford, who purchased the same with full knowledge of the said agreement, and had ever since been the patrons of the said church, and had never questioned or impugned the agreement: that since the time when the said agreement was established by the decree of the Court of Chancery, the whole of the manor of Aston (except the said several pieces of land which by the said agreement were given to the rectory) had been tithe-free, and no payment of any tithe had ever been claimed by the rectors, but they had always held and enjoyed; and the respondent, as such rector, did then hold

* 143 and enjoy, the several pieces of land by * the said agreement annexed to the said rectory of Aston, and the several privileges secured to the rectors by the said agreement; and the said annuity of 40*l.* had always been duly paid by W. Plowden and his heirs to such rectors, and had been duly paid to and received by the respondent as such rector since he became the incumbent of the said rectory up to Michaelmas, 1832; and he had during his incumbency holden and enjoyed the said lands, and received and taken the said annual sum of 40*l.*, with full knowledge of the said agreement, and in lieu and satisfaction of all tithes of the said manor, and had thereby assented to the said agreement, and was bound thereby. The said appellants admitted that they, previously to and since the year 1831, respectively held and occupied the several farms and lands situated within the manor and parish of Aston, and described in their answer, and that they had the several tithable matters therein stated, but for the reasons therein before stated they had not set out or rendered the tithes, or made any satisfaction for them, inasmuch as the respondent had regularly been paid the annuity of 40*l.* up to Michaelmas, 1832,—since which time he had refused to receive it,—in lieu of all such tithes, according to the said agreement; and they said that the respondent had never given them any notice of his demand, and never made any application to them to set out their tithes previously to the month of June then last. They said they believed that the said composition and exchange were very advantageous to the church of Aston, and were entered into with a due regard to the probable future increased value of the tithes of the manor, inasmuch as the value of such tithes at the date of the said agreement was much below the sum of 40*l.* per annum. They submitted * that * 144 the said agreement was entire, and that the composition for tithes and the exchange thereby made was one contract and transaction, and that the said W. Plowden would not have given in exchange the lands which were so given by him to the rectors of the said parish, but for such contract and engagement to accept the said annuity in perpetual satisfaction of the said tithes; and therefore, in case the Court should be of opinion that the composition was no longer subsisting, then the said appellants, by their answer, submitted that the exchange of the glebe lands of the parish of Aston for other parts of the common fields of the said parish comprised in the said agreement was void, and that the respondent as such rector ought to give up and reconvey the several pieces of lands then in his occupation and enjoyment, and which were so exchanged for the old glebe lands under the said agreement; and they also submitted that Edmund Plowden

(the first named appellant), who was then the lord of the manor of Aston, ought to be made a party to the suit.

The respondent amended his bill under an order dated the 15th of January, 1835, and made the said Edmund Plowden a defendant thereto.

Mr. Plowden put in a plea to that amended bill, and pleaded in bar thereto the said agreement, the confirmation of it by the bishop, and the decree establishing it (as before stated in the answer of the other appellants), and also the Act of Parliament 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 100. (a)

(a) An Act for shortening the time required in claims of modus decimandi, or exemption from, or discharge of, tithes (passed the 9th of August, 1832). By the 1st section it is enacted, "that all prescriptions and claims of or for any modus decimandi, or of or to any exemption from or discharge of tithes, by composition real or otherwise, shall, in cases where the render of tithes in kind shall be hereafter demanded by our lord the King, his heirs or successors, or by any Duke of Cornwall, or by any lay person not being a corporation sole, or by any body corporate of many, whether temporal or spiritual, be sustained and be deemed good and valid in law upon evidence showing in cases of claim of a modus decimandi the payment or render of such modus, and in cases of claim to exemption or discharge showing the enjoyment of the land without payment or render of tithes, money, or other matter, in lieu thereof, for the full period of thirty years next before the time of such demand, unless in the case of claim of a modus decimandi, the actual payment or render of tithes in kind or of money, or other thing differing in amount, quality, or quantity from the modus claimed, or in case of claim to exemption or discharge, the render or payment of tithes or of money, or other matter in lieu thereof, shall be shown to have taken place at some time prior to such thirty years, or it shall be proved that such payment or render of modus was made or enjoyment had by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing; and if such proof in support of the claim shall be extended to the full period of sixty years next before the time of such demand, in such cases the claim shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall be proved that such payment or render of modus was made, or enjoyment had, by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing; and where the render of tithes in kind shall be demanded by any archbishop, bishop, dean, prebendary, parson, vicar, master of hospital or other corporation sole, whether spiritual or temporal, then every such prescription or claim shall be valid and indefeasible upon evidence showing such payment or render of modus made or enjoyment had as is hereinbefore mentioned, applicable to the nature of the claim, for and during the whole time that two persons in succession shall have held the office or benefice in respect whereof such render of tithes in kind shall be claimed, and for not less than three years after the appointment and institution or induction of a third person thereto: provided always, that if the whole time of the holding of such two persons shall be less than sixty years, then it shall be necessary to show such payment or render of modus made or enjoyment had (as the case may be), not only during the whole of such time,

* The plea was argued on the 26th of June, 1835, before * 145 the Lord Chief Baron, who, by his order of that * date, * 146 disallowed the plea; and by another order dated the 26th of November, 1835, and made on a rehearing of the plea, confirmed his former judgment, and dismissed the petition of rehearing, without costs.

The appellant, Edmund Plowden, then put in his answer to the bill, and therein set forth the agreement, the several proceedings taken for its confirmation, together with the decree of the Court of Chancery, and the said Act of Parliament, and other matters of defence, which had been stated in his plea; and he also stated, that since the making of the said agreement, and before the filing of the bill, there had been more than three rectors of the said parish, and more than sixty years had elapsed, and he submitted that on that ground also he was entitled to the benefit of the said Act, and he claimed to be allowed the benefit thereof, and he submitted that, if the Court should be of opinion that the said lands were not, under the circumstances, discharged of tithes, and that the respondent was not bound by the said agreement, then, as the agreement was one entire agreement, it ought to be altogether avoided and set aside, and the lands and other privileges given to the rector in exchange as aforesaid, and which were * then held and enjoyed by the * 147 respondent, ought to be restored to this appellant, who in that case would be entitled to all the estate and interest which but also during such further number of years, either before or after such time, or partly before and partly after, as shall with such time be sufficient to make up the full period of sixty years, and also for and during the further period of three years after the appointment and institution or induction of a third person to the same office or benefice, unless it shall be proved that such payment or render of modus was made or enjoyment had by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing.

2d. And be it further enacted, that every composition for tithes which hath been made or confirmed by the decree of any Court of Equity in England, in a suit to which the ordinary, patron, and incumbent were parties, and which hath not since been set aside, abandoned, or departed from, shall be, and the same is hereby confirmed and made valid in law; and that no modus, exemption, or discharge shall be deemed to be within the provisions of this Act, unless such modus, exemption, or discharge shall be proved to have existed and been acted upon at the time of or within one year next before the passing of this Act.

3d. Provided always, that this Act shall not be prejudicial or available to or for any plaintiff or defendant in any suit or action relative to any of the matters before mentioned, now commenced, or which may be hereafter commenced, during the present session of Parliament, or within one year from the end thereof. (The session ended on the 17th of August, 1832.)

the said W. Plowden had therein previously to the exchange; and he insisted that the respondent could not have any decree for tithes against the other appellants in respect of the lands occupied by them in the manor of Aston, until the respondent should have restored to this appellant the lands and other privileges which were then held and enjoyed by the respondent, and had taken back the ancient glebe of the said rectory, which this appellant was willing and submitted to give up in case the said agreement was avoided, upon having the said lands and other privileges then enjoyed by the respondent restored to him.

From the evidence in behalf of the appellants (which proved all the matters of defence set forth in the answers), it appeared that the respondent was the fourth rector of the parish of Aston since the date of the agreement (1711); that the lands and privileges thereby annexed to the rectory, and the annuity of 40*l.*, had been held and received by them successively, without their making any claim of tithes, and were still held and received by the respondent, except that in regard to the annuity he refused to receive payment of it since Michaelmas, 1832, when he set up his claim to the tithes. And it also appeared that the lands and privileges so annexed to the rectory, and the said annuity, formerly exceeded the value of the old glebe lands and tithes given in exchange by 60*l.* or 70*l.* a year, and were at the present time more than equivalent to the tithes of all the appellant's

(Plowden's) lands in Aston, and to the lands given to his
 * 148 ancestor by the rector * under the agreement. All this appellant's lands in Aston contain about seven hundred and forty acres, divided into four farms, occupied by the other appellants.

A witness on behalf of the respondent showed that all the occupiers of land in the parish, except the four appellants, paid him compositions in lieu of tithes for the farms and lands in their respective occupations. And it appeared from a terrier dated July, 1711, that the then glebe was a piece of about eighty-seven acres, lying together in one part of the parish, and about sixteen acres adjoining the parsonage house, and that the tithes were then all payable in kind: and from another terrier, dated 1720, it appeared that the lands then belonging to the rectory in consequence of the new arrangement exceeded one hundred and forty acres: one hundred and forty-two acres was the number which the witnesses for the appellants deposed to.

The cause was heard on the 8th of February, 1837, by Mr. Baron ALDERSON, who, on the 15th of February, pronounced his decree for an account against Mattingley, Budd, Bliss, and Cowper, with costs, dismissing the bill as against the appellant Plowden, without costs. (a)

The appeal was against that degree, and also against the orders overruling the plea. While the appeal was pending, Edmund Plowden and Charles Cowper died; and by an order of the House, dated the 29th of June, 1838, the appeal was revived in the names of their respective executors. By another order of the House, dated the 1st of August, 1839, William Henry Francis Plowden, Esq., who on the death of Edmund Plowden became seised as tenant in tail of the said hereditaments, was made a party appellant by his own desire.

* Mr. Boteler and Mr. Bethell, for the appellants. — The * 149 agreement of the 1st of March, 1711, being a composition for tithes confirmed by the decree of the Court of Chancery in England, in a suit to which the ordinary, patron, and incumbent were parties, and not having been set aside, abandoned, or departed from, at the time of the passing of the Act of the 2d & 3d Will. 4, c. 100, was, by the second section of that Act, confirmed and made valid in law. That Act was passed on the 9th of August, 1832, and it was proved, indeed it was not denied, that the respondent received the half-year's annuity of 40*l.* at Michaelmas, 1832; and, therefore, the exemption from tithes claimed by the appellants "existed and was acted upon at the time of, or within one year next before, the passing of that Act," and must be deemed to be within its provisions. That Act, according to the true construction of its third section, was available for every person entitled to or claiming any benefit or protection under the same, unless a suit were commenced against such person within the session of Parliament during which the Act was passed, or within one year from the end of that session. The Act was therefore available to the late appellant, Edmund Plowden, for supporting the composition and maintaining his plea, he not having been made a party to the respondent's suit till after the period limited by the third section of the Act. The session in which the Act was passed ended on the 17th of August, 1832. The original bill was filed in July, 1833, which was in time as to the defendants to that bill. But Mr. Plowden was not made a defendant until the bill was amended in January, 1835. Under these circumstances, the orders overruling Mr. Plowden's plea were clearly erroneous.

(a) See the case reported, 2 Younge & Collyer, 421, where the agreement of 1711 is more fully set out.

* 150 * Then as to the decree, it is equally clear that no decree for an account of tithes could be made against the appellants, the occupiers of Mr. Plowden's estate in Aston, so long as the composition and agreement are in force, and they cannot be set aside or impeached, except in a suit to which not only Mr. Plowden, the owner of the estate (it appears he was only tenant for life), but also the patron and ordinary of the church of Aston, are parties, whereas the respondent did not think proper to make the patron and ordinary parties to his suit. At the hearing the respondent dismissed the bill against Mr. Plowden, before entering upon his case against the appellants, the occupiers, thereby leaving the composition and agreement in full force.

The respondent claims the tithes while he retains the lands that were annexed to the rectory in consideration of the exemption of the rest of Mr. Plowden's estate in Aston from tithes. But the composition and agreement being one and entire cannot be rescinded and set aside in part; they must be rescinded and set aside entirely, or not at all; inasmuch as the composition was not a mere grant of the annuity of 40*l.* in lieu of the tithes of Mr. Plowden's estate, but a grant of the lands and other privileges and advantages given to the Rev. John Wilson and his successors by the agreement, together with the annuity, in lieu of the lands given up by Mr. Wilson, and the tithes of the rest of Mr. Plowden's estate; and inasmuch as the lands allotted to Wilson and his successors were alone, without the other privileges and advantages given to him and them, and without the annuity of 40*l.*, of much greater value than the lands given up by Wilson and the tithes of Plowden's remaining estate in Aston; and

* 151 the lands and other privileges and advantages * given to Wilson and his successors by the agreement, must have increased in value since equally in proportion with the lands given up by him and the tithes of Plowden's estate, and are now, with the annuity, a full equivalent for the said lands given up by Wilson and the tithes of the estate; so that if the respondent is suffered to recover the tithes of the estate, and at the same time to hold and enjoy the lands and other privileges and advantages allotted to the rectors by the agreement, he will be more than doubly satisfied for the tithes of the estate. Mr. Baron ALDERSON thought, when he pronounced this decree, that he was following the decision of Lord NORTHINGTON in the Attorney-General v. Cholmley. (a) That case is reported differently in several books, and it is not clear that it applies at all to this case. It appears from the record which the appellants have procured, that Dr. Blair, the rector and plaintiff (for it was an information and bill), offered to open the whole agreement. And it appears from the report of Lord NORTHINGTON's judgment, both in Ambler and Eden, from which latter the case is taken by Gwillam, that his Lordship observed particularly that the agreement did not provide for the prospective increase of the value of the tithes; and these two material circumstances distinguish that case from the present. And in that case the Crown, the patron of the living, was a party, but in this case the patron is not a party.

The respondent having been at the time of filing his bill, and being at the present time, in the possession and enjoyment of the lands and other advantages given to Wilson and his successors by the agreement, is not in a situation to recover tithes of Plowden's * estate, and therefore, and by reason of the * 152 respondent not having offered, by his bill or otherwise, to rescind the agreement entirely, his bill ought to be dismissed with costs; or in case he is permitted to retain his decree for tithes, it ought to be upon condition of the agreement being rescinded entirely, and the respondent giving up to Mr. Plowden the lands, and relinquishing the other privileges and advantages allotted to the rectors by the agreement, as well as giving up the annuity of 40*l.*, and taking back the lands given up by Wilson to William Plowden; and all proper orders and directions ought to be given by this House, or the Court of Exchequer, for ascertaining the lands to be given up by both parties, mutually and respectively, and for effectuating a complete re-exchange of the premises exchanged under the agreement, and restoring the parties respectively to the situations in which those under whom they claim were, previously to the enclosure of the common fields of Aston, and to the making of the agreement. There may now be much difficulty in ascertaining the parcels of land, but still, without restoring the two parties to the situations in which they would be if no composition had taken place, complete justice cannot be done.

The decree has given the respondent the tithes of the land in question, as against the appellants, Mattingley, Budd, Bliss, and Cowper, from the time of the presentation of the respondent to the rectory of Aston, although it was clear that he had accepted the annuity of 40*l.* up to Michaelmas, 1832, whereby, even upon the principle upon which the decree was founded, he was satisfied for so much of the tithes as had arisen up to the last mentioned period. The decree having dismissed the bill * 153 as against Mr. Plowden, * and having thereby admitted that the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4 confirmed the agreement ab initio ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed against all the appellants.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. G. Richards, for the respondent. — The defendants to the original bill insisted, in their answer to it, that Mr. Plowden, the landlord of their farms, ought to be a party to the suit; and on their suggestion the respondent made him a party defendant to the suit, but no relief was prayed against him. The foundation of the decree against the occupiers of the land is, that the respondent, being the parson of the parish, has a legal right to the tithes, and that the agreement under which exemption is claimed by them is a nullity under the Act 13th Eliz. c. 10, § 3. The recent Act, therefore, which was pleaded by Mr. Plowden, cannot confirm the agreement, because there was no valid agreement in existence at the time. The alleged agreement was null and void on the authority of the case of the Attorney-General v. Cholmley, in which this House, on appeal, (a) affirmed the judgment of Lord NORTHINGTON.

This House will not allow an equitable claim to be set up as a defence to a legal right, if the legal right is clearly made out. The equity set up by the appellants is, that the respondent's predecessors in the rectory took benefits from the agreement, which if the respondent abandons, he ought to restore the equivalent which they say he holds. The short answer to that is, that it is no defence to this suit; the appellants might have filed a bill against the respondent to establish their equity.

* 154 [THE LORD * CHANCELLOR.—Up to 1833 the respondent was in possession of all the benefits and privileges granted to and taken by his predecessors in lieu of tithes, by the agreement: nothing was due to him up to that period.]

The respondent says the agreement was void. He received the stipend up to Michaelmas, 1832, in ignorance of his rights; and although he continued in possession of the lands given to the church by the exchange, it was competent for him at the same time to claim his legal right. If it is possible to restore the appellants to the position in which they would stand if no agreement had been entered into, let them be so restored by a bill in a Court of Equity; but if it is now impossible so to restore them, let not the fault be imputed to the respondent, or his legal right be embarrassed by any alleged equity of the appellants.

The frame of the suit in the Attorney-General v. Cholmley was the most favourable to the appellants. It went to rescind the agreement, and then for consequential damages. The frame of the bill in the present case is different, and the agreement cannot be set aside on it. In Cartwright v. Colton, (a) the course adopted in this case was pursued. The case of the Attorney-General v. Cholmley has never been questioned, but referred to with approbation by Sir THOMAS PLUMER in the Attorney-General v. Warren, (b) and by Lord ELDON in O'Connor v. Cook. (c)

Supposing this agreement was not absolutely void before the passing of the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 100, the respondent submits that it was not protected by that Act, inasmuch as the agreement was abandoned by the notice of demand of tithes, and the suit was instituted within the time limited by the 3d section, * which excluded the operation of the Act from suits com- * 155 menced at the time of its passing, or within one year from the end of that session; that is, from the 17th of August, 1832. The construction put on the 2d and 3d sections in a case at law is, that parties shall not be entitled to raise the question of the validity of a tithe composition when confirmed in the manner mentioned in the 2d section, unless they commence their action or suit within the time limited by the 3d section. (d) The bill against the occupiers having been filed within the year, and the original and amended bill forming but one record and one suit, the whole suit was commenced within the year.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — Suppose Mr. Plowden was an occupier, or suppose that, in consequence of a composition, he was entitled to tithes himself, would the suit as against him (who in the supposed case would be a necessary party) be within the time limited by the third section?]

The suit against the occupiers having been commenced in time, the lands occupied by them are not exempt by force of the Act, and the Act therefore presents no obstacle to the respondent's suit to obtain the benefit of his legal right, and the plea of that statute was properly overruled.

There are other objections to the appeal; more, however, in point of form than of merits. The bill having been dismissed by the decree at the hearing as against Mr. Plowden, and dismissed without costs, he ought not to be joined in the appeal against that decree; nor was it material for him to appeal against the order overruling his plea; nor does it make any difference to him whether these orders are affirmed or reversed, inasmuch as, after the dismissal of the bill against him, it was of no consequence

 * 156 to * him what became of the plea, having obtained by the decree the full benefit of his plea. The plea having been put in by Mr. Plowden alone, the order overruling it did not in any way affect the other appellants; they ought not, therefore, to be joined in an appeal against any order disposing of the plea. The respondent never desired to make Mr. Plowden a party to the suit, and nothing was thereby prayed against him. The other defendants, by their answer, alleging that he had an interest, insisted on his being made a party; and therefore the irregularity of joining him in the appeal against the decree cannot be justified by his being made a joint defendant. There was a precedent in the case of Hughes v. Davies (a) for making him a defendant. Under these circumstances the Court below, if appealed to, would not revive the cause against Mr. Plowden's executors, although the appeal has been revived in their name by order of this House.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The decree leaves the respondent in possession of the lands annexed to the rectory by the composition, while it decrees him an account and satisfaction of the tithes. Is not Mr. Plowden the owner of the lands affected by the decree?]

The respondent has always treated the composition as a nullity, as an invalid modus, and proceeded on his legal rights.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—However invalid it may be as a modus, the rector surely cannot, while he acts on it by retaining the equivalent for the tithes, claim the tithes also.]

As to future tithes, the agreement cannot avail. The account is to be taken only from the last payment of the composition; the decree leaves it to the Master to consider from what time the account is to be taken.

* Mr. Boteler, in reply. — The appellants (the occupiers) * 157 properly insisted that their landlord should be made a party; and not only the landlord, but the present patrons of the rectory (St. John's College), to whom W. Plowden sold the advowson, ought also to be parties to the suit. As the respondent joined all the appellants as defendants, why should they not be joined as appellants, and thereby save the expense of two appeals, one by Mr. Plowden against the orders overruling the plea, and the other against the decree? The decree gives an account for tithes for a time during which the rector was receiving the equivalent. The rector was not entitled to any account until he first gave back the lands and other advantages received by the rector from the composition. It would be contrary to all principles of equity to allow him to hold the equivalent for the value of the tithes, and to give him an account of the tithes in kind at the same time. Cartwright v. Colton had no application to this case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — If the decree was conditional on restoring the benefits derived from the agreement of 1711, you would not object to pay the tithes?

Mr. Boteler and Mr. Swanston said they would agree to take a decree in the terms proposed by his Lordship, but they feared the difficulty of now identifying the lands given in the exchange in 1711 would be insuperable.

The Lord Chancellor said he would give them a few days to consider that matter, and he would, in the mean time, look into the case.

February 8.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — I shall abstain, in the absence of the noble and learned Lord (Lord BROUGHAM), who was present during the argument of this case, * from asking * 158 your Lordships to come to any final decision upon it; but, the parties being in attendance, it may be as well that I should state the views which I take of the case, on a consideration of the arguments.

The question arose upon a decision of the Court of Exchequer, by which a decree was made, directing an account of tithes, generally, against certain persons who were occupiers of lands within the parish of Aston-le-Walls. Mr. Plowden, who was tenant for life and landlord of the lands in question, had been made a party to the suit; but he having pleaded, and his plea being overruled, he answered, and at the hearing the bill was dismissed against him. The decree, therefore, according to the proceedings as they stand, was an ordinary decree for tithes against the occupiers of the lands.

The bill was filed on the 16th of July, 1833, and to the bill as originally filed there were no parties defendants except the occupiers of lands. On the 12th of December, 1833, those occupiers put in their answer, and stated (what was afterwards proved, and which constitutes the question in the cause) that in the year 1711 an arrangement had been entered into between a Mr. Plowden, who was then the owner of the fee in these lands, with the then rector of the parish, by which certain lands, the property of Mr. Plowden, were conveyed for the benefit of the church, and certain glebe lands belonging to the church were assigned to Mr. Plowden, and other lands belonging to him in the parish were to be held for the future tithe-free. It appears that this arrangement was submitted to the bishop of the diocese, and that after an investigation as to the terms of that arrangement, it was sanctioned by the bishop; and it appears also that it afterwards

* 159 became the subject of a suit in the * Court of Chancery, to which the patron, ordinary, proprietor, and rector were parties, and that the suit ended in a decree establishing the arrangement.

My Lords, it appears (and I now state what was proved on the investigation which took place before the commissioners appointed by the bishop) that the glebe lands taken by Mr. Plowden were of the value of 40*l.* a year, and that the tithes were of the value of 56*l.* a year; that the lands given by Mr. Plowden to the church were of the value of 130*l.* a year, and that there was, in addition to those lands so given to the church, a rent-charge of 40*l.* a year upon the other property belonging to Mr. Plowden in the parish. It appears that from that time down to the time when this bill was filed, or, at all events, until very shortly preceding the time when it was filed, all parties acted upon the faith of that agreement. It appears also that the present incumbent, the respondent, was instituted to this living in the year 1831, and that he received the rent-charge of 40*l.* a year, including the payment to Michaelmas, 1832. It was proved by two witnesses that he had at all times remained in possession of the lands, and that at the time the depositions were taken he was in actual possession of those lands, which had by Mr. Plowden been devoted to the church, in exchange for the advantages he derived under the agreement in respect of his estate. Now, on looking to the agreement, which, it is very material, should be accurately examined and compared with the evidence before the commissioners appointed by the bishop, it appears that inasmuch as the value of the tithes released exceeded the 40*l.* per annum rent-charge, and the value of the lands given by Mr. Plowden exceeded the value of the glebe lands taken, by a sum equal or very * nearly equal to 90*l.* a year, — if the 40*l.* a year had been * 160 in lieu of the tithes it would have been an inadequate compensation for them, even according to their then existing value, the tithes being nearly 60*l.* a year and the rent-charge only 40*l.*, — if the lands were to be changed for the glebe lands, it would appear that that would not be the contract, inasmuch as the glebe lands were of the value of 76*l.* a year, and the lands granted to the rector by Mr. Plowden were of the value of 130*l.* a year. It is quite clear, therefore, that some part of the lands granted by Mr. Plowden to the rector, were in consideration of the discharge of his other lands from tithe. It is most important to keep that fact in view, when your Lordships come to consider how far the authority, which has been the guide of the Court below upon this subject, can be considered as applicable to this case.

We find that the present rector, succeeding to the rectory, found this agreement in operation, — not binding, as contended and truly contended, because the statute (a) prevented parties, notwithstanding all the solemnities which had accompanied such a contract, from giving effect to a discharge from tithes by an agreement which had been thus entered into, — but it is perfectly certain that even if there had been an ordinary composition, the party succeeding to a rectory, acting on a composition made during the time of his predecessor, although he may have had the power to get rid of it, must be considered as so far becoming a party to that arrangement that he cannot, as a matter of course and at once, treat those with whom the contract was subsisting as if no such agreement had been made; but, at all events, he cannot do this, — he cannot * claim a compensation for * 161 the discharge of tithes, and come into a Court of Equity to ask for payment of those tithes. Now, it appears that the rector received the 40*l.* till Michaelmas, 1832, and that he still holds the lands; that he gave no notice of any kind till June, 1833, and that in the month of July following he filed his bill. In the case of Hewitt v. Adams, (a) this House dismissed a bill for want of proper notice to determine a composition, although the defendants disputed the rector's right to end the composition, and that case Lord THURLOW considered as a binding authority in a case in which the defendants had set up a modus, which was the case of Bishop v. Chichester. (b) In this case there is no question about determining a composition, which, though voidable against successors, may be adopted and become binding upon them till avoided, because the rector in this case is still in possession of the lands given in lieu of the tithes. It is said that the Master, in taking the account, has not gone beyond Michaelmas, 1832, when the last payment of the rent-charge was received. But why is the receipt of the rent-charge to stop the account, if the possession of the lands is not to defeat the plaintiff's title to it? While the plaintiff retains the substitute for the tithes, he cannot claim the tithes; therefore there was nothing due when the bill was filed.

There is, however, a distinct ground of defence growing out of this state of things; the plaintiff holds the lands given in exchange for the tithes by the conveyance of 1711, and this decree gives to the plaintiff the tithes out of the lands agreed to be discharged, but leaves him in possession of the lands
 * 162 given to him * as the consideration of the discharge.

Equity thus gives its assistance to work the great injustice of restoring to the plaintiff the thing sold, without requiring repayment of the consideration. This is contrary to one of the first principles of equity, "that he who seeks equity must do equity."¹ It was said, indeed, that in suits for tithes a Court of Equity only gives effect to a legal title, and that this principle therefore does not apply to this case. It is quite immaterial what is the nature of the demand; it is the exercise of its jurisdiction which the Court withholds, unless the party seeking its exercise will do what the Court thinks just. I had occasion, lately, in the case of Sturgis v. Champneys, (c) in the Court of Chancery, to review the authorities upon this subject, and this was the principle upon which I acted. I think it impossible, therefore, to give to the plaintiff any assistance in equity, without seeing justice done to the other parties to the agreement of 1711. If that were possible in this suit, and if there were no other fatal objections to it, the question would be, what such justice required? The agreement was, to give up the land in fee, and discharge for ever Mr. Plowden's other lands from tithes. The late defendant, Mr. Plowden, was only tenant for life; but if the lands given to the rector are to be restored to Mr. Plowden's estate, and the ancient glebe taken out of that estate and restored to the rectory, it is obvious that the owner of the inheritance must be a party to that proceeding, but there was no such person before the Court at the hearing. Although the tenant in tail has, in what right does not very well appear, raised this appeal, we must, however, look at the * case as it existed at the * 163 hearing; this could not be cured by adding him as a party, because the bill makes no case, and asks no relief for the purpose of raising any such equity.

It has been supposed, however, that there is authority to support this decree, however opposed it may be to those well-known principles of equity to which I have adverted; and that authority is the case of the Attorney-General v. Cholmley. From the report of that case in 2 Eden, 304, it appears that the owner of the land, as well as the patron and ordinary, were parties, and Lord NORTHINGTON proceeded upon this, that by the agreement the land given to the rector was an exchange for the glebe, and the money payment was in lieu of the tithes; and that the contracts, though contained in one agreement, were distinct. That decree, therefore, did not, as this does, give the rector the tithes, and leave him in possession of what had been given to the rectory for the purchase of them. It is clear that if this had been so, and he had not had the power of restoring the parties to the situation in which they would have stood if no such agreement had been entered into, he would not have made the decree for the payment of the tithes. The observation he makes at the close of his judgment is well worthy of remark; he says, "If the parties had made an allowance for the future improved value of the tithes, they would have stood on a different footing, and I should not have been inclined to relieve; they then would have been purchasers for a valuable consideration, by allowing for the future improvements. The equity of this Court would have been suspended, by setting up equity against equity, and I

This does not appear to me to be inconsistent with the opinion he had before expressed, that the agreement was void; he only means that equity would have interfered, and he obviously alludes to the maxim used by the defendant's counsel in that case, "ecclesia meliorari, non deteriorari, potest," (b) and which he had before answered, by stating that the agreement in question was unequal and injurious to the church, in not providing for the improved value of the tithes. In this case that is provided for; the land given to the church greatly exceeding the value of the glebe land and of the tithes given up by it. To rescind the agreement altogether, if practicable, would be highly injurious to the church; to decree payment of the tithes without doing so, would be most unjust to the other parties to it.

The view I have taken upon this part of the case makes it unnecessary to observe on the construction put on the 2d & 3d Will. 4, c. 100. Had it been necessary to decide that question, I should have found much difficulty in concurring in an opinion (c) that a defendant, against whom no proceedings were instituted until January, 1835, could not claim the benefit of the third section, because the suit to which he was made a defendant by amendment had been commenced against others within the prescribed time.

These opinions I have formed on considering the printed papers and attending to the argument at the bar; and after I shall have communicated with the noble and learned Lord who was present during the discussion, I shall move the judgment of the House on this case. If that noble and learned Lord concurs in

* 165 the opinions I have now expressed, the motion I * shall submit to the House will be to vary the decree by dismissing the bill, with costs.

February 6.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — Since I hinted to your Lordships the opinion I had formed on this case, I have had an opportunity of communicating with the noble and learned Lord who also attended the hearing, and I have from him authority for stating that he entirely concurs in the opinions I expressed. The course which I propose to your Lordships to take will not entirely exhaust the case, inasmuch as the appeal embraces not only the final decree, but also the order made by the Court of Exchequer upon the plea put in by Mr. Plowden. But I apprehend, if your Lordships agree in the opinion which I have suggested, namely, that the bill should be dismissed, you will not be called upon to give any opinion upon that plea, inasmuch as the object of the party appellant will be obtained as to all the substantial parts of the case. The utmost possible question which can be involved in the plea is a question of costs of the smallest amount; for whatever opinion you might form on the plea, which involves considerable difficulty on the construction of the Act of Parliament, your Lordships will doubtless think, in differing from the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, that that plea, if allowed, ought to be allowed without costs.

Ordered and adjudged, that so much of the said decree as directs that it be referred to the Master to take an account of what was due to the respondent from the appellants (the occupiers) for the single value of tithes, &c., and to tax the respondent's costs as against the said appellants, be reversed; and that it be directed that the respondent's bill be dismissed against the said appellants, with costs; and that so much of the said decree as directed the respondent's bill to be dismissed against the appellant E. Plowden, without costs, be varied by directing that said bill be dismissed against him, with costs. 72 Lords' Journ. for 1840, p. 37.

Competency of Appeal. Construction of Statutes. Delict; Non-Participation. Indemnity. Costs.

Partners in a licensed distillery, convicted of a breach of the revenue laws, consented to a mitigated penalty; after payment of which, one of them brought an action against the others for indemnity, on the ground that he was innocent of their illicit acts. The defenders pleaded in defence that, as all were involved in the delict, no one could claim indemnity or contribution from the others. The Court gave no judgment on that defence, but sent the cause to trial by a jury; the Judge's opinion was not taken on it at the trial, nor were exceptions tendered. The jury found a verdict that the defenders were indebted to the pursuer for the sum paid by him towards the penalty. The Court being afterwards moved, upon notice "for a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted," refused "a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside," and subsequently made orders applying the verdict, and decreeing against the defenders for payment by them jointly and severally, to the pursuer, of "the sum found by the verdict, with interest, as libelled." Held, that the order refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial was not, but that the orders applying the verdict were, subject to appeal to the House of Lords. (Vide infra, p. 178.)

Semble, that the partner who was not a participator in the delict was legally entitled to indemnity from those who were, although he consented to the penalty.¹ (Infra, p. 182.) But held, that the appellant, by having omitted all opportunities of taking a decision on the legal question in the Court below, and being unable to appeal against the verdict, was precluded from having a decision on that question from this House. (Infra, p. 184.)

The summons in the action having claimed a certain sum from the defenders, jointly and severally; and the verdict having found them simply indebted in a different sum "as libelled:" Held, that there is no inconsistency between that verdict and the judgment decreeing against the defenders, jointly and severally, for payment of the sum so found, "as libelled." (p. 186.)

Where an appellant has succeeded in dismissing a petition against the competency of his appeal, and the appeal is afterwards dismissed with costs, on the hearing on the merits, those costs do not include the costs of discussing the question of competency, unless the consideration of them has been reserved.

May 1, 2, 1837. June 3, 1839. February 11, 13, 1840.

THIS was an appeal against interlocutors of the Court * 167 of Session in Scotland, pronounced in an * action raised there by the respondent against the appellant and other persons of the names of M'Andrew and Hunter. All the parties except Hunter were partners in a licensed distillery at Easdale, in Argyleshire, from the beginning of the year 1820 to the end of 1822, when the partnership was dissolved. Hunter had been their operative distiller. The partnership concern was in six shares, of which the appellant had two, the respondent two, and the two M'Andrews one each. The respondent resided about forty miles from the distillery, and left that business to be managed by the other partners, the chief management devolving on the appellant, who resided on the spot. These partners and their operatives, in the course of carrying on the business, committed a breach of the revenue laws by purchasing quantities of illicit whiskey, which they mixed with the spirits produced at the distillery. The result was that, on information given to the excise office by Hunter, who quarrelled with his employers, proceedings were taken in the Exchequer in Scotland against the whole company, for penalties amounting to 10,500*l.* The course of proceeding there is the same as in the Exchequer in England. All the partners joined in defence, put in a plea of not guilty, and tendered evidence at the trial, which took place in December, 1823, and ended in a verdict of conviction against them all for the full amount of the penalties. They afterwards memorialized the officers of the Crown, and succeeded in getting the penalties mitigated to 3000*l.* To this latter proceeding the appellant and respondent were the active parties. Writs of extent were issued, and the sum of 3000*l.* was levied, partly out of the proceeds of the partnership property, partly from the *property * 168 of the M'Andrews, and the residue from the respondent.

In April, 1827, the respondent instituted the action in which this appeal has been taken, against the defendants before mentioned, averring his own ignorance and their knowledge of the illicit practices carried on at the distillery, and concluding for a total indemnity at their hands in respect of the said mitigated penalty, and for payment to him of what he had been obliged to pay to the Crown, namely, the balance of the penalty after deducting what was recovered under the levies on the distillery effects and from the other partners. The balance so claimed to be due to the respondent from the defenders conjointly and severally amounted to 1171*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, with interest from March, 1827.

Defences were given in by the several defenders, and a record was made up on revised condescendence and answers, with relative notes of pleas for each party. The appellant's defence and pleas were that the action was in itself unfounded, "first, because it arises out of an illegal transaction, and therefore the pursuer is not entitled to maintain an action for payment of the penalty awarded against him, with his own consent, by the Court of Exchequer; more especially as he was aware of the illegal proceedings on behalf of the servant of the company, before any seizure of the company's effects was made by the Crown: secondly, even if the pursuer can maintain the action at all, the defender denies that he is conjunctly or severally liable in the sum pursued for, or that the pursuer paid the whole amount of penalty and expenses as alleged in his summons."

The pleas entered for the survivor of the M'Andrews were in substance the same as the appellant's. Hunter's * defence was that he was a servant acting under orders of his employers, and that he had received part of the penalty from the officers of the Crown.

Although the defences raised the question of relevancy of the action, none of the parties applied to the Court to dispose of that question previously to the trial of the following issues, which were approved by the Lord Ordinary:—

"It being admitted that the pursuer, and the defenders, Alexander Campbell and Donald M'Andrew, and the late John M'Andrew, were partners of a company for the purpose of distilling spirits at Easdale, and that the defender, Robert Hunter, was brewer or distiller to the said company; and that on the 17th day of December, 1823, the said company were found liable in a penalty of 3000*l.*, as being guilty of contravening the revenue laws:—

"Whether the defenders, or any of them, were guilty of the said contravention of the said laws, whereby the said company were subjected in the said penalty, and obliged to pay certain expenses? And whether the defenders, or any of them, are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of 1171*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the balance of the said penalty and expenses? Or whether the said contravention of the said laws was with the knowledge of the pursuer?"

These issues were tried at Edinburgh in March, 1834, before the Lord President (BOYLE) of the second division of the Court of Session, and the jury found for the respondent on all of them, "and that the defenders are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of 1059*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, with interest as libelled."

* 170 The appellant afterwards moved the second division * of the Court upon this notice, "for a rule to show cause why the verdict in this case should not be set aside, and a new trial granted." The Court refused the motion by an interlocutor, dated the 1st of July, in these terms: "The Lords refuse to grant a rule to show cause why the verdict in this case should not be set aside." And on the 4th of July, on the respondent's motion to enter up judgment on the verdict, the following interlocutor was pronounced: "In respect of the verdict found by the jury on the issues in this cause, the Lords decern against the defenders conjunctly and severally, for payment to the pursuer of the sum of 1059*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, with interest as libelled; find them liable to him in expenses of the action," &c. And by another interlocutor of the 11th of July, "The Lords allow the said decree for principal and interest to be extracted ad interim."

The present appeal was presented on the 31st of July, 1835, against the interlocutors of the 4th and 11th of July, 1834. (a) The respondent presented a *petition on the * 171 26th of August against the competency of the appeal, and praying that the same be dismissed with costs. That petition was referred to the appeal committee, who advised the question of competency to be argued at the bar by one counsel on a side.

Dr. Lushington, for the respondent on that question. — The appellant, by his preliminary pleas to the action, raised the question of its relevancy, and he should, as he certainly might, have followed up that defence by moving the Court to dispose of the question of law before sending the case to the jury. That course of proceeding was distinctly pointed out by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, by the 33d section of which it is declared that, "if either of the parties shall, without the concurrence of the

(a) A former petition of appeal, presented on the 4th of August, 1834, complained also of the interlocutor of the 1st of July. The respondent presented a petition on the 9th of August, praying that that appeal be dismissed as incompetent, and the House ordered that the question of competency be argued at the bar by one counsel on a side. That question was accordingly argued, and the petition against the appeal was dismissed. The appeal, however, dropped or was dismissed in consequence of the appellant's omitting to lodge his case in due time. In February, 1835, the appellant petitioned the House to restore the appeal, and that he might then have leave to lodge his case. The respondent presented a petition praying that the appeal be not restored, or that, previously to its restoration, its competency might be again discussed by counsel at the bar, "in respect to the terms of the notice of motion of the 1st of July, 1834, as to which the House was not on the previous occasion correctly informed." (The House had sustained the appeal on the understanding that it did not include the interlocutor of the 1st of July.) Both these petitions were referred to the appeal committee, who reported on the 23d of July, 1835, that the appellant's petition ought not be complied with. The appellant then presented his present appeal as above stated, omitting the order of the 1st of July.

other, insist that there is a point of law or relevancy which ought previously to trial to be determined, it shall be competent for such party to move for an order to have the cause remitted to the Court of Session." "And on such motion, it shall be determined whether the question raised ought to be decided previous to trial, or left for discussion at the trial, or for decision after verdict; and if such question shall arise before one of the chief Judges of the Jury Court, he shall have it in his power either to determine the question, or to report it for decision by the whole Judges of the Jury Court, or a quorum thereof. And the decision of the said Judge of the Jury Court in the said matter shall be final and conclusive, if not brought under review of the whole Jury Court, by motion to that effect, &c. And the decision of the Jury Court, either pronounced on the review of the said Judge's interlocutor, or on the cause being by him taken to report, shall be final on that question." The provision of the Judicature Act was not affected by the Act 1 Will. 4, c. 69, *172 which abolished * all distinction between the Jury Court as a separate tribunal, and the Court of Session, and declared that the jurisdiction for trial by jury in civil causes, shall be united with and form part of the ordinary administration of justice in the Court of Session. That Court is frequently called on to dispose of questions of relevancy, the disposal of which precludes all further proceedings. Aikin v. Finlay, (a) M'Leod v. Buchanan. (b) Had the appellant called on the Court to dispose of the question of relevancy before trial (which he might have done without disadvantage, as in Scotland a defender is entitled to demur to the relevancy of an action, without being held to admit the facts set forth in the summons), the judgment of the Court on the question would be open to appeal to this House by either party. Instead of availing himself of that form of disposing of the question of law, the appellant agreed in adjusting the terms of the issue, which was a general issue.

Another course was open to the appellant, namely, by leaving the question of law, as well as questions of fact, to be determined at the trial of the cause (as he did in fact), there to take the direction of the presiding Judge on the matter of law, and to bring that direction, if he considered it erroneous, under review of the Court by bill of exceptions. That second course, which was open to the appellant under the 7th section of the Act 55 Geo. 3, c. 42, he omitted to follow, as well as the first ; and then the only other course which he could take was, in case of an erroneous verdict in point of law, either in consequence of misdirection by the presiding Judge, or of the jury finding in opposition to the Judge's direction, to move the Court to set the verdict aside, and for a new trial. It is enacted by the 6th section of the Jury Act (55 * Geo. 3, c. 42), and the enactment *173 is not affected by subsequent statutes, " That in all cases in which an issue or issues shall have been directed to be tried by a jury, it shall be lawful and competent for the party who is dissatisfied with the verdict to apply to the division of the Court of Session which directed the issue, for a new trial, on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence ; on the ground of misdirection of the Judge ; on the ground of the undue admission or rejection of evidence ; on the ground of excess of damages, or of "res noviter veniens ad notitiam ;" or for such other cause as is essential to the justice of the case : provided also that such interlocutor, granting or refusing a new trial, shall not be subject to review by reclaiming petition, or by appeal to the House of Lords." The two remedies provided by that Act are the only modes of redress against erroneous verdicts ; and by the 8th section it is enacted, as to both these modes, " That if a new trial shall not be applied for or shall be refused (as was the case here), or if the exception to the opinion of the Judge shall be disallowed, the verdict shall be final and conclusive as to the facts found by the jury, and shall be so considered by the Court of Session in pronouncing their judgment, and shall not be liable to be questioned anywhere." This appellant adopted the mode of redress of applying for a new trial ; the terms of his notice of motion were, " for a rule to show cause why the verdict in this case should not be set aside and a new trial granted." That motion was refused by the interlocutor of the 1st of July, and that was a final and conclusive judgment according to the terms of the statute. It is true that that interlocutor is not included in the present petition of appeal ; but the interlocutors which are appealed from were founded on that interlocutor, and were necessarily consequential on it ; they did no more * than *174 apply the judgment of the Court to a general verdict, which the Court had refused to set aside ; they are not decisions on points of law, and they are not subject to appeal. The point of law having never been raised in the Court below, cannot be raised in this House, for the first time, on appeal.

(b) Id. 1113.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Campbell), for the appellant, submitted that the appeal was competent; that no argument was urged against it now that was not urged with equal force in 1834, on the petition of dismissal against the former appeal, which, notwithstanding, the House sustained; but that appeal expired by time. The present appeal is against the interlocutors applying the verdict, and decreeing against the defenders conjointly and severally, for payment. The appellant was not to blame if the question of relevancy was not disposed of before the trial; he often raised that question on several motions before the Lord Ordinary, who, without regarding such applications, directed the issues. Neither could the appellant pursue the second course pointed out, inasmuch as the Judge who presided at the trial told the jury that it was a case for them, and he left it to them upon the evidence. No bill of exceptions was competent against such a charge. Neither was it possible for the appellant to raise, at the trial, in the form of a bill of exceptions, the subject of his preliminary defences, which did not apply to any direction required, or given at the trial, but went to exclude the action altogether on preliminary grounds. The presiding Judge held that he was bound to try the issues sent to him. The appellant never could, by bill of exceptions, get at the subject-matter of his preliminary defences, since a discussion by bill of exceptions must have assumed that the action was a competent and relevant action, and that * the issues were calculated to try the case between the parties. No bill of exceptions could go beyond the direction given at the trial. In that situation the appellant gave notice of two separate motions: first, to set aside the verdict; and, secondly, in the event of its being set aside, for a new trial. The last of these motions was not, nor meant to be, insisted on. It was added to the motion to set aside the verdict, in compliance with the form prescribed by the Court. There is no judgment of the Court of Session, either granting or refusing a new trial. The appellant could not desire a new trial, for he was always opposed to a trial by jury, believing that the action was not maintainable. The only motion made was to set aside the verdict, and that motion was quite consistent with the preliminary defences. It is true, that by the 1st, 4th, and 6th sections of the 55 Geo. 3, c. 42, no appeal lies from an order refusing a new trial; but it is equally true that this appeal, which is not against such an order, is saved by the 9th section of that Act, which enacts, that judgments applying verdicts shall be subject to appeal. He next referred to several sections of the Acts 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, as being in support of the right to appeal; and to the cases, Merryweather v. Nixon, (a) Colburn v. Patmore, (b) and Spiers v. Dunlop, (c) as showing that no action could lie by one wrongdoer against his companions; and submitted that the petition against the competency of the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

* THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — This case was heard at your * 176 Lordships' bar some time ago, and had escaped my recollection. The suit was for recovery of a contribution from several partners, towards the payment of the amount of a verdict that had been found at the suit of the Crown against all the parties, for a breach of the excise laws. The jury having found in favour of the pursuer, an application was made to the Court of Session to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, which was refused. Upon a subsequent application by the pursuer, the judgment of the Court proceeded in these terms: "In respect of the verdict found by the jury on the issues in this cause, the Lords decree against the defenders, conjointly and severally, for payment to the pursuer of the sum of 1059*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, with interest, as libelled." An appeal was presented to your Lordships' House, in 1834, against that decree, and against the order refusing a new trial. (d) That was met by a petition for dismissal, upon the ground of incompetency: and to the extent of the order of the Court of Session refusing a new trial, there can be no doubt that the appeal was incompetent, inasmuch as the Act (e) prohibits parties from coming to this House upon orders of the Court below, upon applications for new trials. The present petition of appeal was then presented, which left out the order refusing a new trial, but appealed against the decree I have just read and another order of subsequent date consequential upon it.

The question now is, whether this appeal can be dealt with as an incompetent appeal, being against the final interlocutor of the Court of Session. There * is nothing, undoubtedly, * 177 in the Act which prohibits such an appeal. Your Lordships, however, will not fail to observe under what difficult circumstances the appellant comes here. His real and substantial defence to the action is this: that the penalties under the excise laws being, by the verdict of a jury on behalf of the Crown, found against all the partners, one partner cannot recover, in a civil action against the others, a contribution for that which is a liability incurred by a wrong. There was a plea which set forth, to a certain extent, what was sufficient to raise that defence; but upon that plea no judgment of the Court was asked before the case was sent to a jury, and the interlocutor, referring the matter to a jury, refers it in these words: "It being admitted" [his Lordship read the terms of the issues and the verdict of the jury, as before stated, p. 169]. Now that finding of the jury involves a question of law, as well as a question of fact; because if there was illegality in the original transaction, which prevented one partner from recovering a contribution against the others, the defenders could not be "indebted and resting owing to the pursuer." It was a point of law, therefore, arising at the trial, which must either have been assumed or decided before the jury could come to their conclusion.

Now, it is said that the learned Judge who presided at the trial did not explain to the jury what the law was. If he had been applied to at the trial to do so, he would undoubtedly have given an opinion to the jury as to whether the pursuer could recover with reference to that question. But it does not appear that any such application was made; so that neither in the first instance upon the interlocutor directing the issue, nor in * 178 the second instance, when the issue * was at trial, did the defenders take the course which was clearly open to them, of asking the opinion of the Court, or the opinion of the Judge, as to the illegality of the transaction being an answer to the demand against them.¹

Under these circumstances, the finding of the jury is one that cannot now be disturbed, inasmuch as an application was made to the Court of Session for a new trial, which that Court refused, and against that interlocutor refusing a new trial no appeal can be presented to your Lordships' House. This appeal is against the interlocutor giving effect to the verdict of the jury; the jury having found that the defenders are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in a certain sum, the interlocutor decreed that payment should be made. It is for the appellant to consider how far, in prosecuting this appeal, he is likely to succeed. But that is not now the question before your Lordships for decision; the question now is, whether this appeal be incompetent? I find that it is an appeal against a final order of the Court of Session for payment; and I do not find any thing in the statute which raises any doubt as to its being competent to a party to come here for the purpose of asking your Lordships whether that interlocutor can be supported or not. The ground of the appeal is, that the verdict does not exhaust the whole merits of the question. Whether it does or does not is a matter about which your Lordships may be able to form your opinion in looking at the pleadings, but it is not a matter before your Lordships now for decision. The question is as to whether the appellant shall be sent away from your Lordships' bar upon the ground of having brought an appeal which it is incompetent to him to bring. It appears to me that there is no incompetency; and *I * 179 think that the petition praying that the appeal may be dismissed as incompetent, must be refused.

Competency of appeal sustained.

February 11, 13, 1840.

The appeal came now to be heard on the merits.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Anderson, for the appellant. — The action brought by the respondent, and in which he got a verdict for indemnity, was incompetent, and ought to have been dismissed upon the preliminary pleas. He and his partners having been all found guilty of the offences charged against them by the exchequer process, and condemned in the statutory penalties, no action lay by one against the other wrong-doers for relief or indemnity against the penalties: no one of the copartners could be permitted to recover against the others in an action founded on the Exchequer verdict and judgment, at the same time asserting his own innocence of the charge, of which by that verdict and judgment he stood legally convicted. To the justice of that conviction the respondent assented by his active negotiation to mitigate the penalties, in which negotiation he succeeded. All these parties being involved in pari delicto, it was not competent to any of them to claim relief against the others; the maxim of law, which in this respect is the same in England and Scotland, being, that among wrong-doers there is no contribution nor right of equitable adjustment, far less of total indemnity. Merryweather v. Nixon, (a) Colburn v. Patmore. (b) In the latter case Colburn was proprietor of "The Court Journal," a weekly newspaper, and Patmore, who was employed by him as the

* 180 editor, inserted a gross libel on a person,* who for that libel filed a criminal information against Colburn, who was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.*; he paid the fine, and then brought an action against Patmore to be reimbursed by him for the fine and costs. The jury gave a verdict for Colburn; but on a motion in the Court of Exchequer to arrest the judgment or set aside the verdict, Lord LYNTHURST, C. B., after observing on the pleadings, observes: "The question upon the merits, which we are not called upon to decide in this case, is one of very great importance. I know of no case in which a person who has committed an act declared by the law to be criminal, has been permitted to recover compensation against a person who has acted jointly with him in the commission of the crime. It is not necessary to give any opinion upon this point; but I may say, that I entertain little doubt that a person who is declared by the law to be guilty of a crime, cannot be allowed to recover damages against another who has participated in its commission." The same principle is established in the law of Scotland, and must obviously form part of every matured system of law. Mr. Bell lays down the law as to illegal contracts, and as to any attempts to enforce the obligations arising out of them; and it is evident that the same legal rule must apply to all obligations, whether founded on actual contracts or originating in transactions. "No person," he observes, (c) "who is participant in the act of smuggling, or by whom delivery of the goods, in breach of our revenue law, is made in this country, can effectually claim under the contract." "No claim is good, either for the delivery of contraband goods purchased as such, or for the price of

* 181 them. 1. Where the buyer of the contraband * goods knows them to be contraband, he has no claim for the delivery of them, or for damages for breach of contract; the maxim being, that in all demands upon illegal contracts, “potior est conditio possidentis et defendentis,” &c.

The Lord Advocate (Mr. Rutherford) and Mr. Graham Bell were heard on behalf of the respondent; but the following speech of the Lord Chancellor, moving the judgment of the House, states so fully all the points made by their arguments, that it is unnecessary to repeat them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The facts of this case are very short and simple. It appears that the appellant and respondent and others were engaged in a distillery; and that in the course of certain illegal transactions which took place in the conduct of this distillery by Alexander Campbell and others, who had managed the business, they were guilty of an infraction of the revenue laws, by which the whole company, including the pursuer as a partner, though absent and ignorant, became liable to penalties. It appears that a prosecution having been commenced by the law officers of the Crown against the company, to recover the penalties, Alexander Campbell agreed that it would be expedient to make an arrangement with them, and to consent to a verdict for 3000*l.* in order to stop the prosecution, finding that the company would be subject to a much larger sum if it proceeded. Thus arose a communication between the pursuer and A. Campbell, who thereupon was in terms distinctly a party to that arrangement. It was with his concurrence and consent that it was done, and it was a verdict by consent. The respondent states that * he became subject to pay a proportion of the sum *182 of 3000*l.*, and he seeks to recover from the other persons, who are those who really were guilty of the offence, an indemnity against the consequences of that verdict to which he was a party consenting. It would be very strange indeed, if by the law of Scotland or the law of any other country, after such a transaction as that, a party paying the money was to be left to bear the whole burden; because the argument would equally apply to his paying the whole 3000*l.* and asking contribution against the others. If this objection could prevail, that because these parties were all guilty of a common offence, therefore, out of such a transaction no contribution could arise, it would be an answer to him if he had paid the whole, and demanded contribution only against the other parties.¹

But all this is entirely concluded by what has taken place in the cause ; because in the progress of the cause this objection was raised by the defenders, that no liability could arise out of this transaction. Various opportunities occurred in the earlier stages of the cause in which the judgment of the Court might have been obtained upon this defence. Those opportunities were not taken advantage of, but ultimately issues were directed which embraced the whole question in the cause ; one issue being “ whether the defenders, or any of them, are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of 1171*l.* or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the balance of the said penalty and expenses.” Upon that issue the jury could not find in favour of the pursuer, without at the same time finding against the defenders upon this question. They could not find that the defenders were owing any sums of money to the pursuer in respect of this transaction, without finding that the trans-

* 183 action was such as to * give rise to their liability. It was, therefore, perfectly competent to the defenders to raise the question before the jury, through the intervention of the Judge, it being a point of law, whether the transaction was such as would preclude the pursuer from any title to ask against the defenders any contribution in respect of the sums he had paid. That could have been done by taking the opinion of the Judge ; and if the Judge gave an opinion contrary to what the defenders conceived to be the proper state of the law, they would have an opportunity of bringing that judgment before the Court by a bill of exceptions. It appears that no such course was taken, and the jury found a verdict in favour of the pursuer on both issues ; establishing the fact that the pursuer was ignorant of the transaction, and establishing the fact that the defenders were indebted to him on account of the transaction in a certain sum. Then the appellant, one of those defenders, takes this course : he applies for a new trial ; a new trial is refused ; then comes an application to the Court of Session to apply the verdict, that is, to give judgment conformably to the verdict which the jury had found. Then, at all events, according to the argument at the bar, it was com-

But this rule is confined to those cases where the person claiming contribution, knew or must be presumed to have known, that the act for which he has been mulcted in damages was unlawful. See Chitty Contr. (10th Am. ed.) 672 ; Jacobs v. Pollard, 10 Cush. 289 ; 1 Lindley Partn. (3d Eng. ed.), 791 ; Betts v. Gibbins, 2 Ad. & El. 57.

petent to the appellant to show that, notwithstanding the verdict, there were objections to the Court proceeding to give judgment to enforce the liability of the defenders to the indemnity of the pursuer. But what the appellant himself states that he did in consequence of this notice was, that he again unsuccessfully endeavoured to convince the Court that the verdict should not be applied, upon the ground that it was not sustainable in law. But that had already been decided upon the motion for a new trial; and if he ever had a case for questioning that decision in point of law, he had not taken the * opportunity * 184 to do so, because he had not called upon the Judge to state any opinion upon that point. Of course, that met with the same result which the motion for a new trial had met with. The Court pronounced judgment in favour of the pursuer.

Now, again at your Lordships' bar—all the opportunities of raising the question, if the question was at all sustainable, having been omitted at the proper period in the course of proceedings in the Court of Session—the same argument is again raised. I do not say that the parties would be absolutely precluded yet, if the record came here in a state which would allow the question to be raised. But your Lordships are now called upon to deal with a record of which the verdict of a jury forms part, taken under circumstances which preclude the defenders from questioning it. The question, therefore, is not whether there is before this House any ground upon which the Court of Session ought to have refused to give effect to that verdict, but whether that verdict is now to be set aside altogether, the whole matter having come before the jury, the jury having found a verdict, and the appellant having been in a situation in which he cannot question the finding of that verdict. It is, therefore, quite unnecessary to consider whether there be a distinction in the law of Scotland as compared with the law of England upon that subject, because after that which has taken place no question can arise. The case here is not that the parties having been jointly guilty of the offence, a joint liability is endeavoured to be raised out of those transactions; but it is that, the partnership having agreed among themselves to pay a certain sum to relieve themselves from that liability, upon that contract between themselves, one party seeks for contribution and indemnity against the others. It is unnecessary * to go into that question, because I consider * 185 it to have been entirely precluded by the course adopted below.

That exhausts the whole of the appellant's case, as it appears in the printed papers. But then it is said that although that might be so, yet there is an inconsistency between the judgment which the Court pronounced and the verdict which the jury returned, inasmuch as the jury found that the defenders are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in a certain sum with interest thereon as libelled, whereas the judgment was that they were jointly and severally liable. I do not make any observations upon that which is not before your Lordships, namely, upon a case which might possibly have occurred, in which the judgment might have appeared to be inconsistent with the verdict. There is no inconsistency, in the way in which I construe the language, between this judgment and the verdict; and I think your Lordships will not be very astute in construing the terms of the verdict to find out expressions and to give effect to expressions out of their natural meaning, for the purpose of defeating the obvious justice of the case. The summons claimed against these defenders jointly and severally that they owed a certain sum with interest. The jury find that the defenders are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of 1059*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* with interest as libelled. Now, if the words "as libelled" applied to the whole of the finding, there can be no inconsistency between the verdict and the judgment, because "as libelled" it was a joint and several liability, and instead of repeating those words in the terms of the finding, the verdict of the jury had reference to the terms of the libel in which the joint and several liability is claimed. But it is not necessary entirely to rest the case upon that, because

* 186 when * the jury find that the defenders are liable, is it inconsistent to say they are jointly and severally liable? Are they less liable because they are severally liable? The verdict is, that they are liable; it remained for the Court to adjudicate upon the extent of the liability as ascertained by the verdict. Supposing the words "as libelled" not to apply to the whole sentence, still it would find them liable, but would not discriminate whether they were liable jointly and severally. When the case comes before the Court, the Court has this fact found by the jury, namely, that there is a liability. The Court then looks at the case as made in the pleadings, and awards judgment in the terms of the libel, namely, that they are severally as well as jointly liable. Now, who is it that objects to it? Alexander Campbell, himself the author of the mischief, because he was the very party who agreed that the verdict should be given to the Crown for the sum of 3000*l.*; yet he is the party now heard to object that he ought not to be individually liable to repay to the respondent that which the jury found the respondent entitled to receive. There is nothing in the facts of the case that would call upon the Court to confine the liability of Alexander Campbell to a joint liability with the others; I see nothing in the terms of the verdict inconsistent with that which the Court have done, and what they have done is entirely consistent with the terms in which the relief was asked by the summons. I apprehend, therefore, there is nothing in this latter objection, and that upon the facts of the case it is beyond all doubt that this is an appeal which ought never to have been brought to your Lordships' bar. I therefore propose to your Lordships to dismiss this appeal, and to dismiss it with costs.

* Mr. Anderson submitted that the costs ought not to * 187 include the costs of the two petitions by the respondent against the competency of the appeal, which had been dismissed.

The Lord Advocate, for the respondent, referred to the case of Gray v. Forbes, (a) in which the House had allowed costs of unsuccessfully resisting as incompetent an appeal which was afterwards dismissed on the merits; but added that in that case there had been a reservation of the question of costs in discussing the competency, which had been overlooked in this case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Unless there be a reservation of the question of costs, the House never allows costs.

Ordered, that the appeal be dismissed, and the interlocutors be affirmed; the appellant to pay the respondent the costs incurred in respect of the appeal.

WILLIAM DE MONTMORENCY Appellant.
 HARVEY DEVEREUX Respondent.

Principal and Agent. Residuary Legatee and Executor. Cestui que Trust and Trustee. Accounts. Voidable Deed. Confirmation.

A trustee and executor, who had been land agent and receiver to his testator without settling accounts for several years, upon his death obtained from the cestui que trust and residuary legatee an agreement to continue him in the agency, and, in case of removal without just cause, to allow him the same salary; and also a deed granting to him part of the trust estates. The agreement and the deed were prepared by the agent, who was an attorney, and executed by the principal and cestui que trust without legal advice; and the deed recited, untruly, that it was granted "by last request of the testator, in consideration of the agent's services," and also in full discharge of all accounts between them. The new agency terminated in a year and a half by mutual desire of the parties; and after a settlement of accounts to the satisfaction of the principal's legal advisers, he executed a deed approved by them confirming the former deed, and wrote letters subsequently to the agent, claiming the benefit of the latter deed, and expressing his satisfaction at having given the estate.

Held (affirming the decree of the Court below dismissing a bill filed to set aside both deeds, and to take the executorship and other accounts), that although the deed of gift was voidable in its origin, and could not be sustained if it stood by itself and had been impeached in reasonable time, yet that the subsequent deliberate acts of the party impeaching it, assisted by his legal advisers, made it valid and binding on him.¹

¹ If a party with full information freely confirms a contract, which he was at liberty to rescind, he will be bound by it, and no new consideration is requisite to give validity to the confirmation. Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. 146, 149, 152, 158, 159; Roche v. O'Brien, 1 Ball & B. 355; Cole v. Gibbons, 3 P. Wms. 290; Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 355; Sandeman v. Mackenzie, 1 J. & H. 613; Negley v. Lindsay, 67 Penn. St. 217; 1 Dart., V. & P. (4th Eng. ed.) 43, 95. But to give validity to a confirmation of a voidable transaction, the party confirming must not be ignorant of his right, nor of course must his right be concealed from him by the person to whom the confirmation is made. Cann v. Cann, 1 P. Wms. 723; Savery v. King, 5 H. L. Cas. 627; Athenæum Life Society v. Pooley, 3 De G. & J. 299; Wall v. Cockerell, 10 H. L. Cas. 229; Potts v. Surr, 34 Beav. 543; *Cockell v. It is to be assumed that legal advisers, in discharge of their duty to their client, investigate suspicious transactions, and satisfy themselves before they approve them that it is for the client's benefit to confirm them.²

Costs.

Where a transaction of a suspicious nature in its commencement can only be sustained by subsequent acts of confirmation, the party so sustaining it must pay his own costs of the investigation into the circumstances.

Sir W. de Montmorency died on the 14th of April, 1829, having by his will, dated the 13th, devised all his estates in the county of Kilkenny, together with his said estate of Cooldrina, in the county of Dublin, to the respondent, in trust to permit the appellant (his illegitimate son), his heirs and assigns, to have and enjoy the same for ever, subject to the testators's debts and funeral expenses, and to a life-annuity of 50*l.* to one Jordan; and the testator gave all his personal estate to the appellant, and appointed him his residuary legatee, and appointed the respondent sole executor of his said will; which was proved by the respondent in the month of June then next ensuing.

On the 18th of April, 1829 (the day after Sir William was buried), the following letter and a deed afterwards stated, were brought by the respondent's brother-in-law to the appellant's house ready for execution, and he duly signed them both:—

“Upperwood, April 18, 1829.

“My dear Sir,—It was the anxious wish of my poor
* 190 father that you * should continue during your life to manage my affairs as agent, in the same way you did for so many years for him, at the same salary. His confidence and esteem for you was evinced by his appointing you trustee to his will, and desiring I should give you Cooldrina property. I have now to hope and request you will continue my agent and manager of my affairs, and I now appoint you to that situation during your life, at the former salary of 200*l.* a year, on the following conditions: that you shall faithfully and attentively discharge the duties of such office, and pay over and account to me, at least once in every year, all rents or other moneys of mine that may get into your hands; and as an inducement to you to accept such, I promise not to remove you, and if I shall do so without just cause at any future time, I bind myself to allow and pay you that salary.

“I am, &c.,

WM. DE MONTMORENCY.

“To Harvey Devereux, Esq., Kilkenny.”

By the deed, also dated the 18th of April, 1829, and made between the appellant and respondent,—after reciting the said will, and that, immediately after the execution thereof, the testator directed and requested the appellant to grant and convey the said estate of Cooldrina unto the respondent in consideration of his many years' faithful services rendered to the testator, and in full discharge of all accounts, claims, or debts between the testator and the respondent, — it was witnessed that the appellant, in consideration of the said direction and request, and of 10s. paid to him by the respondent, granted and assigned to the respondent, his heirs and assigns, the said estate of Cooldrina, and the reversion and reversions, &c.

The respondent continued to act for the appellant * as * 191 agent and receiver of rents, as he had before acted for his father; and as executor also, he had possession of some of the title-deeds, and possessed himself of part of the personal estate. In the month of June, 1829, the respondent, after proving the will in Dublin, accompanied the appellant to Freshford, a town in the centre of some of the estates devised by the will, for the purpose of introducing him to the tenants, who assembled together with a large number of other persons to receive them, and made a bonfire and other demonstrations of rejoicing on the occasion. The respondent, from the appellant's carriage, addressed the assembled crowd in a speech, and, referring to a report that had got abroad that Lord Crofton (heir-at-law of the said testator) was about claiming the devised estates, he exhorted the appellant and tenants not to have any apprehension, for that his lordship would never succeed; the secret was locked up in his own bosom, and there it would remain, and he never failed in any of his undertakings; or words to that effect. (a)

In October, 1830, the appellant and respondent were mutually disposed, the former to withdraw the agency, and the latter to relinquish it; and with that view the respondent's accounts of receipts and disbursements, both as agent and executor, with the vouchers, &c., were referred for examination and adjustment to Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, solicitors in Dublin (who had been for many years solicitors to Sir W. de Montmorency), on behalf of the appellant, and to Mr. Maher, the partner of the respondent, on his behalf. On the agency accounts, since the death of the testator, a balance of 2700*l.* appeared due to the respondent, and also 500*l.* on the executorship accounts.

* Upon the proposal of Messrs. Aiken and Montgomery, it * 192 was agreed, in order to settle all accounts of every kind between the appellant and respondent, that respondent should strike off the 500*l.*, and accept bonds for the sum of 2700*l.*, and that all accounts and dealings between them should be closed; and with that view a deed was prepared, and after being perused by Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, was executed by both parties.

By this deed, which bore date the 18th of December, 1830, it was witnessed, that all accounts of whatever kind theretofore or then depending between the appellant and respondent, in relation to any dealings whatsoever, had been and were then finally settled; as well those relating to the dealings between the respondent and the late Sir W. de Montmorency, as those between the respondent and the appellant; and that the appellant had agreed to secure to the respondent the sum of 2700*l.* in full, for the balance due on such accounts, by two bonds, one payable in three years, with interest at 5*l.* per cent; the other in five years, with interest at 6*l.* per cent; and that the respondent agreed to accept the said sum, it being, however, understood and declared that he was to pay two bills of exchange for 456*l.* and 400*l.* drawn by the respondent and accepted by appellant, and then overdue, and all costs of proceedings taken by the holders of them against the appellant, and to save the appellant harmless against all debts and demands, which were set forth in the respondent's accounts as theretofore paid by him on account of Sir W. de Montmorency or of the appellant; and that thereby the respondent undertook, by deed or otherwise, as counsel should advise, to assign to the appellant all the estates and properties devised and
 * 193 bequeathed by the * will of the said testator unto the respondent as trustee, save and except the lands of Cool-drina, which the appellant had theretofore conveyed to the respondent, and the conveyance whereof he by this deed fully confirmed.

The two bonds were executed at the same time. Subsequent transactions between the parties are herein after stated.

In April, 1835, the appellant filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, for the purpose of setting aside the said two deeds and the bonds, as having been obtained from him by fraud and undue influence. The bill, as afterwards amended, in addition to the matters before stated, and which were not disputed, further stated and charged, among other things, that the estates devised to the appellant were at the date of such devise subject to judgment debts to the amount of 10,000*l.* to Mr. John Smithwick, father-in-law of the respondent, by virtue of several judgments obtained by Smithwick against the testator; and for better securing the same, the appellant was obliged to execute a mortgage to Smithwick of the said estates, in December, 1830:

that the respondent had not settled any account of the rents of the estates with the testator for many years previous to his death, nor with the appellant since: that immediately after the testator's death a report was circulated, at the instance of the respondent, that Lord Crofton intended to set up a claim to the estates, as heir-at-law of the testator, and to impeach the will: that on the day after the interment of the testator, the respondent sent Edmond Smithwick, his brother-in-law, to inform appellant that Lord Crofton was in the neighbourhood inquiring for the respondent, but that respondent kept out of the way; and he * (Smithwick) in the most earnest * 194 manner advised appellant to make a friend of the respondent: that on that occasion Smithwick produced, ready prepared, a power of attorney to appoint respondent agent to collect the rents of the estates, and a deed, purporting to give 200*l.* to respondent, in case of being discontinued as such agent; and also a conveyance, bearing date the same day (18th April), whereby the appellant purported to convey to the respondent the estate of Cooldrina; and that in consequence of the impression made upon appellant's mind by the said E. Smithwick that the respondent could take the estates from him or leave them with him, he executed the said power of attorney and deeds so produced to him, without receiving any consideration whatever for the same: that he was grossly deceived and imposed on in these transactions, and prevailed upon by unfair means and practices used on behalf of the respondent to execute the said deed and conveyance of Cooldrina, the respondent refusing to put him in possession of the devised estates, or of the deeds and writings relating thereto, unless appellant executed the said instruments, for the preparing of which he never gave any instructions or directions to any person, nor was any of them prepared by any person employed by him, but were all prepared by and under the direction and instructions of the respondent, and produced to appellant, ready for his execution thereof, by the said Ed. Smithwick, who, after they were executed, declared that appellant had thereby made a friend of the respondent, and the respondent, immediately after the instruments were executed, gave appellant possession of the said estates, except Cooldrina.

The bill further stated, that a speech which the respondent addressed to the tenantry (in June, 1829), * stating * 195 that rumours had gone abroad as to the appellant's want of title to the estates, but that appellant might rest secure, inasmuch as the secret by which he could be disturbed rested solely with the respondent, was made for the purpose of intimidating the appellant and bringing him into such terms as the respondent deemed best calculated for his future objects: that the settlement of accounts which took place after the agency was terminated (in October, 1830), and by which the appellant appeared indebted to the respondent in the sum of 2700*l.*, was confined to the accounts between the appellant and respondent as agent only, and since the execution of the power of attorney before mentioned, but did not include the account of the personal estate and effects of the said testator: that, accordingly, Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, at whose office the deed and bonds executed by appellant in December, 1830, were drawn up, perceiving the defective settlement of the accounts, declined to witness the execution of said deed: that although that deed purported to confirm the deed of April, 1829, the appellant submitted that it had not that effect, and did not operate to release the respondent as executor, inasmuch as no account was furnished by him of the dealings between him and the testator in his lifetime, nor on foot of the personal estate of the testator, and inasmuch as the appellant executed that deed under the impression that the respondent had the power to invalidate his title to the estates, and threatened to take legal proceedings for the said sum of 2700*l.*, and refused to give up the agency until the same was paid; and the appellant was then in very embarrassed circumstances, and the respondent had retained possession of title-deeds relating to the estates, and his father-in-law, John Smithwick, being a creditor

* 196 * to a large amount on the said judgments, compelled him to execute to him a mortgage of the said estates on the same day on which the deed purporting to confirm the deed of April, 1829, was executed: that appellant had lately paid off the said mortgage debt, with a view to file this bill to impeach the said deeds, which, under the circumstances before stated, he could not sooner do: and so well aware was the respondent of the impeachable nature of the deed and other transactions of the 18th of April, 1829, that he made no claim for payment of the said annuity of 200*l.* since he was discharged from the agency.

The bill further charged, that although no costs were due to the respondent in the character of attorney and solicitor to the said testator, and notwithstanding the respondent's agreement in the said deed of December, 1830, yet in 1833, J. Maher, respondent's partner as attorney, brought an action against appellant for costs, amounting to 576*l.*, for business alleged to have been done for the said testator in his lifetime; and in discharge thereof the appellant paid the said Maher the sum of 135*l.*; and the said action had been brought with the privity and for the benefit of the respondent; and the appellant charged that if any costs were ever due to the respondent from the said testator, the same formed no part of the consideration of the said deed of the 18th of April, 1829.

The bill prayed, among other things, that it might be referred to the Master to take an account of the personal estate and effects of the said Sir W. de Montmorency, possessed or received by the respondent or to his use, or which, but for his wilful default or neglect, might have been possessed or received by him; and that an account might be taken of all sums received by or for the use of the respondent, belonging * to the * 197 said Sir William or his estate, during his lifetime, as his agent, and what was due to the said testator at the time of his death by the respondent, on such agency account; and that it might be declared that the said deed of conveyance of the lands of Cooldrina, of the 18th of April, 1829, and said annuity deed, were fraudulent and void; and that the respondent might be decreed to reconvey to appellant said lands, and to come to an account of the rents and profits thereof received by the respondent or for his use, from the execution of such deed, and that he might release said annuity; and that said deed of 18th of December, 1830, might likewise be declared fraudulent and void, so far as the same purported to confirm the said conveyance of 18th April, 1829, or to release the respondent on foot of the accounts sought by the bill.

The respondent, by his answer, admitted that he had not settled any account of the rents of the said estates, or of his other dealings with the said testator, since the 14th of November, 1821, but he had furnished five accounts to the testator from that day to November, 1825, all which he believed were examined by the testator, but not signed by him. And he stated that on the day of the death of the testator, Mr. W. Baily, who was entitled in remainder to the said Kilcreene estate, expectant on the death of the testator, came to testator's house on the day of his death, and insisted on getting the title-deeds to that estate; but upon search, the title-deeds relating thereto appearing very numerous and mixed up with other deeds, Mr. Baily and the appellant agreed that all the deeds should be given to respondent, to select and hand over to each party the deeds belonging to each ; that all the deeds were accordingly brought to respondent's * 198 house, and it was * in that way the said deeds came into his possession, and he had since given up to appellant, or to his agent, all the deeds and documents belonging to him.

The respondent admitted, that immediately after the death of the said testator a report was circulated, according to what respondent believed to be the fact, that Lord Crofton intended to claim the devised estates and to impeach the said will, but he utterly denied that the report originated with him ; that Lord Crofton's solicitors came to him and talked with him on the subject of the will, and respondent assured them of its validity. He also admitted that he did, at the appellant's request, address his tenantry on the occasion in the bill mentioned : he could not, at that distance of time, recollect what he particularly said on that occasion, but his object in referring to the appellant's title being disputed, if he did refer thereto, was to convince the tenantry that Lord Crofton's claim was groundless, and that the respondent had it in his power to prove it such, and to prevent the tenants from giving up possession or affording any aid to Lord Crofton and his agents, who were then seeking to get possession of the said estates. And the respondent denied that such speech was made by him with a view to his own interest, or to any future object of his own, or for the purpose of intimidating the appellant.

The respondent, in his said answer, further said, it was wholly untrue, that on the day after the interment of the said testator, or at any other time, he sent by the said Edmond Smithwick or any other person, to the respondent, any such instruments as in the bill mentioned in that behalf ; but he said, that on the 17th of April, 1829, and without any previous solicitation * 199 on his (respondent's) part, the appellant * informed him, through Dr. Cullinan, the medical attendant of the late Sir William, and also a friend of appellant, that it was the appellant's intention to give respondent the estate of Cooldrina, as a testimony of his own and his late father's esteem for the respondent ; and that the appellant was likewise anxious to continue the respondent as his agent, at the same salary which the respondent had received from Sir William : that the respondent, in reply, expressed his obligations for the appellant's intention with respect to the lands of Cooldrina, and said that he (the respondent)

would in consequence relinquish his claim against Sir William's estate for costs, but declared his indifference about the agency, as he considered the appellant to be an uncertain person, who at any moment might remove him from his situation: that upon the appellant, on the same day, personally repeating his offer of the agency, and at the same time offering to bind himself to continue the respondent's salary in case he should dismiss him without cause, the respondent accepted the offer, and the appellant thereupon directed him to have the necessary deeds and documents prepared for carrying into effect the appellant's intentions with respect to the agency and the Cooldrina estate, which the respondent accordingly did, and the deed was executed by the appellant and respondent in the presence of and attested by William Mannin, an attorney, the said Edmond Smithwick, and another person; and the appellant and his wife read it over before he executed it, and both expressed their pleasure at it, and declared that the appellant, in making this gift to the respondent, was carrying into effect the wishes of Sir W. de Montmorency.

And the answer stated, that the respondent continued * to act as the appellant's agent for about a year and a half, * 200 but having, during that period, made advances to the appellant considerably exceeding the rents of his estates, the respondent became desirous to relinquish the agency, and in October, 1830, he intimated to the appellant such his intention, and thereupon furnished to him the accounts of his receipts and disbursements as his agent, and also of his receipts and disbursements as executor of Sir W. de Montmorency, which last mentioned receipts consisted of arrears of rent due to the said testator at his death, and afterwards got in by the respondent: that these accounts, and the vouchers in support thereof, were fully examined by Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, the appellant's solicitors, and Mr. John Robert Malone, who succeeded respondent in the agency; and it appeared thereby, as the fact was, that a sum of about 2700*l.* was due to the respondent on the balance of his agency account, and a sum of above 500*l.* on the balance of his executorship account; and after a full discussion of the affairs between the appellant and respondent, during which the respondent, at the request of Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, consented to give up all claim on account of transactions between him and Sir W. de Montmorency, it was agreed that the respondent, in order to settle all accounts of every kind between himself and the appellant, should accept the appellant's bonds for the sum of 2700*l.* in discharge of the moneys due to the respondent, and that all accounts and dealings between them should be finally closed, and that such a deed as before stated should be executed: that a deed was thereupon prepared, and was perused by Messrs.

Aiken & Montgomery, as the solicitors of the appellant,
* 201 and, after certain alterations had been * made by them, was approved by them, and a written indorsement of approval was put upon the draft of the deed by Mr. Montgomery: that Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, and Mr. Malone, attended on behalf of the appellant at the execution of this deed, and Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, or one of them, perused aloud the engrossment thereof in the presence of the appellant, before it was executed by him and the respondent: that if they refused to attest the said deed, it was because they were personally interested in its provisions, the costs due to them from Sir W. de Montmorency being thereby secured to them. The respondent answered as to his law costs against Sir W. de Montmorency, thus given up in the settlement, that he always considered he was entitled to those costs, as they were perfectly distinct from his salary as agent and receiver; but he had every reason to expect, and did in fact believe, from his relationship to the said testator, and from the kind disposition always manifested by the testator towards him, that he would, during his life, or upon his death, have made some adequate remuneration for his professional services; and that for that reason, and no other, he did not bring his said costs into account with the testator, with whom he continued on the most confidential terms up to his death.

The respondent, in his answer, further said, he had not made any claim against the appellant in respect of the annuity of 200*l.*, not from any conviction of the impeachable nature of the transaction of the 18th of April, 1829, as in the bill alleged, but because, having voluntarily resigned the agency, and not being removed therefrom, he could not make claim to the annuity, which was provided for the latter contingency only: that

* 202 upon the said settlement of * accounts, respondent gave up to the appellant or his agents all the vouchers for his accounts, and then, or shortly afterwards, he also gave up all such deeds and papers as remained in his possession belonging to the appellant; and the appellant acquiesced for several years in the said arrangement, without ever expressing any intention to disturb it; on the contrary, that he wrote two letters to respondent, to which (they are set out in the evidence) the respondent referred as evidence of acquiescence.

The respondent admitted that his partner, John Maher, furnished a bill of costs to the appellant, amounting to the sum of 524*l.* 15*s.* 10½*d.*, and that he commenced an action for the recovery thereof: that the said costs were for business done, both for the testator in his lifetime, and for the appellant after testator's decease; but that, although Maher was the respondent's partner, there had been since the commencement of their partnership, several branches of the profession in the emoluments of which, by the express terms of their partnership, the respondent had no share: that a considerable portion of the business charged for by Maher was of this description; and that the said bill of costs contained a charge against the appellant himself, for business done by Maher, of the sum of 272*l.*: that the respondent had heard and believed that the main ground of the appellant's defence to Maher's demand of 524*l.* 15*s.* 10½*d.* was that, by reason of the execution of the said deeds of the 18th of April, 1829, and 18th of December, 1830, the appellant was not liable to the payment of the portion of the said costs incurred in the lifetime of his father; thereby, as the respondent submitted, distinctly availing himself of the provisions of the said deeds, which he by his said bill sought to * impeach: that the respondent * 203 had heard and believed that Maher, in order to avoid litigation, agreed to accept, as a compromise from the appellant, a sum of 135*l.* in full discharge of such part of the said bill of costs as the said Maher was entitled to claim against the appellant himself; and that upon the settlement between the appellant and Maher, all the costs for business done in the lifetime of the said testator were by consent struck out in the first instance, and the sum of 135*l.* was accepted on the foot of the balance of 272*l.*, which sum of 135*l.* was not, as the respondent believed, near the amount of the description of the said costs which Maher was entitled to as his own, and no part of it was for the benefit of the respondent.

The answer then submitted that the appellant was barred from obtaining the accounts sought by the bill, by the said deed of the 18th of December, 1830, as well as by the Statute of Limitation (more than six years having elapsed between the testator's death and the filing of the bill); and, without waiving these objections, concluded by referring to the schedules annexed thereto, as containing certain of the accounts sought by the bill, so far as the respondent was able to set forth the same.

Witnesses were examined on both sides in the cause.

The appellant's evidence was to the following effect :

Mr. W. Mannin, of Freshford, an attorney, witnessed the execution of the deed of the 18th of April, 1829 ; was not engaged in the preparation of it ; believed it was prepared by the respondent ; it was not submitted for witness's approval, nor did he in any manner approve of it on behalf of the appellant, further * 204 than * than by becoming a subscribing witness through the means of the respondent's brother-in-law, Ed. Smithwick, who had the carriage of it previous to its execution, previous to which witness had no conversation with the appellant about it ; but the appellant often afterwards expressed his regret at being induced to convey the said lands.

This witness said he was present when the respondent made the speech (before mentioned). There were about 500 persons present on the occasion, composed chiefly of the tenantry, to whom the respondent said in his speech, that " with him and him only lay the secret that could disturb the appellant in the possession of his estates, and with him it should remain ; and if the parties claiming the estates went to law, he would take care and defeat them, as he was always successful in all cases in which he was concerned ; " or words to that effect. The appellant and respondent were at that time together in appellant's carriage. Lord Crofton was then setting up a claim to the estates, and witness believed it was for the purpose of making a friend of the respondent and securing his interest, that appellant was induced to execute the deed, being a man of weak mind, very timid, and quite incapable of managing his affairs, or of judging what was best to be done in the settlement of them.

William Fitzpatrick said he was present when the said speech was made. It was on the occasion of the appellant coming to the country after the death of his father that the tenantry met him in the town of Freshford. The respondent, from the appellant's carriage, stated " that reports were in circulation that Lord Crofton had intended to proceed at law against Mr. de Montmorency, for recovery of his property ; that he (respondent) defied them all, for that no person knew what would * 205 injure him (the appellant) respecting the * estates and the title, or knew the secret that would do so, but he (the respondent), and that he would keep it to himself;" or words to that effect.

Mr. Andrew Thomas Montgomery, of Dublin, solicitor, said he had been employed with the late Samuel Aiken, his partner, as solicitor for Sir W. de Montmorency, and conducted all his law business for twenty years up to his death, during which time Sir William had no other law agent, although on one occasion the respondent had brought an ejectment at the suit of Sir William, who, however, on being told of it by witness, said he was entirely ignorant of it, and would inquire into the matter, which he subsequently did, and stated to witness that respondent informed him there had not been time to write to Dublin on the subject; and Sir William declared the like matter should not occur again, as he had intrusted his law agency to witness and partner.

This witness had frequent conversations with the respondent respecting the devise of the estates to the appellant; never recollected any thing prejudicial to his title said by the respondent, but he distinctly stated that he knew of circumstances connected with the estates that would ruin the appellant's prospects of which no other person than himself was aware; and he added that appellant was not using him well, but that at the same time he never would injure him. Witness was employed on the part of appellant on the occasion of the execution of the deed dated the 18th of December, 1830, and gave this account of what passed:—"The respondent furnished accounts to the appellant on that occasion, and we were proceeding to investigation of them, when I perceived they would occupy a considerable time. I proposed to the defendant to strike off a certain sum of money off his demand, and thereby * settle all matters * 206 between them; whereupon the defendant agreed, and a considerable sum was struck off, amounting, as I best recollect, to above 500*l.*, and no further investigation or examination of said accounts was had, although we had previously examined various vouchers in respect thereto, and I looked upon them to have been finally settled between them, although neither party appeared pleased. After that arrangement, the balance of said account was the sum mentioned and ascertained as the consideration of said deed. As I best recollect and believe, I made objections to the draft of said deed of December, 1830, because it contained a recognition of a previous conveyance of the lands of Cooldrina, which I conceived had nothing to say to the transaction then pending; and I also insisted that the claim which my partner and myself had for costs against the late Sir W. de Montmorency should be recognized in said deed, as defendant was his sole executor. The defendant refused to listen to my objection respecting the conveyance of the lands of Cooldrina, but he acquiesced in that part respecting his liability to us as executor of Sir William, in respect to said costs. I reluctantly acquiesced in the execution of that deed, recognizing the conveyance of Cooldrina, in consequence of the necessitous state of the plaintiff's affairs at the time. Richard Smithwick, son to John Smithwick, in the pleadings named, was present upon the occasion of the aforesaid arrangement of said accounts; and, as I best recollect, at the execution of said deed he attended on behalf of said John Smithwick, who had claims to a considerable amount against the estate of the late Sir W. de Montmorency, and he urged in the strongest manner the arrangement of defendant's accounts and the execution of said deed, * 207 for the purpose of getting a mortgage executed to secure the claims which his father had made upon said lands. I refused to become an attesting witness to said deed, first, because my own claims were recognized in it; and, secondly, that my doing so might operate to bind the plaintiff thereto at a future time, as he declared that he was not satisfied with the arrangements so made."

The respondent's evidence was to the effect following:—

Mr. William Baily, tenant in remainder of the Kilcreene estate expectant on the death of Sir W. de Montmorency, said he went to his house the day after his death and required the title-deeds of that estate. The appellant and respondent were present. Both agreed that all the deeds and documents in the house should be sent on to Kilkenny, to the house of the respondent, to select and separate the deeds belonging to witness and appellant, and they were sent on accordingly. Witness added, that there was a strong report prevalent in the county at the time of Sir W. de Montmorency's death that Lord Crofton intended to claim his estates at Upperwood, as heir-at-law, and to dispute the appellant's title; and Lord Crofton told witness of such his intention.

Mr. James Cullinan, a medical man, practising in Freshford, said he attended Sir W. de Montmorency professionally since 1814 down to his death, and was constant in his attendance on him during the whole of his last illness. The appellant was in constant attendance. Witness then went on to state to this effect:—On the day of the interment of Sir William, while the appellant and this witness, and two or three others, were at dinner at Upperwood, immediately after dinner * appel- * 208 lant told witness that he had determined on giving Cool-drina to the respondent, and to employ him as his agent and receiver at the same salary that his father paid him; and appellant desired witness to inform respondent of his said intention, at the same time placing his hands on witness's shoulder and addressing the conversation to him particularly. To the best of witness's recollection, Mr. W. Mannin was one of the persons then present, and it was on the 16th of April, 1829. On the 17th, witness met the respondent as he was going to Upperwood, and communicated to him the said declaration and message, in the same or nearly the same words used by the appellant, and with his authority, as witness conceived. The respondent's reply was, that he would have nothing to do with Cooldrina or the agency until he had first put the appellant in possession of his property under the will, for which purpose he had then come from Kilkenny; adding, that he was afraid to have any thing to do with the appellant, as he was a man not to be depended on, and that he was apprehensive of offending his own friends by connecting himself with the appellant. Witness did not give the respondent any directions as to the manner of carrying the said proposal into execution. He told the appellant in ten minutes afterwards that he had delivered the message to the respondent; and in the course of the same day, after the respondent had given formal possession to the appellant of the property left him by the will, by delivery of a sod and twig, the appellant told witness that he had arranged matters with the respondent, and would give him his agency. They had a great deal of conversation together during the day, but witness did not hear much of it. Witness further said, that there was a report, before and after the death of Sir William, * that Lord Crofton, as his * 209 heir-at-law, would dispute his will and the appellant's title.

Mr. Edmond Smithwick, brother-in-law of the respondent, said he was a subscribing witness to the deed of the 18th of April, 1829. He said Mr. Mannin was another subscribing witness; and the deed was first carefully read by the appellant in presence of his wife and of Mr. Mannin, who, as witness believes, also perused it, and the subject-matter was talked over before the deed was executed. Witness held out no threat or inducement to the appellant to execute that deed. When witness produced the deed to the appellant, he requested him to consult his wife, and for both seriously to consider the matter before executing the deed; and they both in the presence of witness and of Mr. Mannin, expressed their great delight in having it in their power to make the said deed; and the appellant added that it was the wish of his late father that he should pay the respondent a compliment for his many and long services.

Mr. J. Maher, an attorney and partner of the respondent, said he was employed by him in October, 1830, to arrange accounts between him and the appellant, consisting, on the credit side, of various sums of money paid by the respondent on account of Sir W. de Montmorency, after his death, and on account of the appellant from that time down to November, 1830; and consisting, on the debit side, of moneys received by the respondent, as well on account of the assets of Sir William as of the rents and profits of the appellant's estates, over which the respondent acted as agent and receiver. There was a final settlement, and not a speedy and immediate settlement, of the said accounts in December, 1830, at the house of Mr. Aiken, one of the appellant's solicitors, in Dublin, in the presence of appellant *and respondent. The investigation began on the 8th October, 1830, and did not terminate till the end of December. Some of the items in the account were checked off by the appellant or by his solicitors, Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, and by his agent, Mr. Malone, who all attended the investigation as appellant's professional advisers. The original accounts and vouchers were handed over to the appellant; several deeds and papers, including the probate of the will of Sir W. de Montmorency, were handed over by appellant's direction to his agent Malone, immediately after closing the settlement of the accounts. The terms of the settlement were that respondent agreed, with a view to put an end to all disputes, to accept bonds for 2700*l.* in satisfaction of a considerable balance which was found to be due to him on foot of the said accounts, and the appellant agreed to give such bonds, and the parties were to execute mutual releases. No one present made any objection to that arrangement, but all seemed greatly pleased with it. Witness accordingly prepared a deed, which (the draft thereof having been perused and altered and then approved by Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery on behalf of the appellant) was executed by him and the respondent, after a covenant had been added for securing the right of Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery to seek from the respondent costs due to them from Sir W. de Montmorency. [This was the deed of the 18th of December, 1830, before stated.]

Among the papers proved as exhibits on either side, besides the deeds and writings already stated, were the following: A letter from Mr. Aiken (partner of Mr. Montgomery), to the respondent, dated Dublin, April 28, 1829, in which the writer says, "I forward you a schedule of such of the title papers of the late Sir W. de Montmorency as are in our hands. I find * Mr. Geale, solicitor for Lord Crofton, has taken out * 211 a copy of the late recovery and deed leading the uses thereof. This I mention to put you on your guard." [This letter was intended to prove that Lord Crofton was then about disputing appellant's title to the estates.]

A letter from the same to the same, dated the 13th of October, 1830, contains this passage: "Bring up, when you come, the conveyance to you of Cooldrina, in which it is said is embodied a general release as between you and Mr. de Montmorency. I pray of you by no means to omit bringing up this deed, and, in a word, all such other deeds, papers, &c., as relate to the accounts, which, I think, may be yet amicably settled." [The object in proving this exhibit was to show that pending the settlement of the accounts, and before the execution of the deed of the 18th December, 1830, the attention of Messrs. Aiken & Montgomery, appellant's solicitors, had been directed to the deed of the 18th of April, 1829.]

A letter from Mr. Aiken to Mr. Maher, dated November 12, 1830, was in these terms: "I am authorized to say that as Mr. Devereux has agreed not to bring forward or make any other charge against Mr. de Montmorency, for any money transactions or dealings which were had or took place between Mr. Devereux and the late Sir William, and that the same shall be for ever done away with, — that Mr. de Montmorency will accede to the arrangement proposed this evening. I therefore submit to you that an entire new account should be prepared on the part of Mr. Devereux, and be confined to such money transactions and dealings as took place between Mr. Devereux and Mr. de Montmorency since Sir William's death, which account, I should hope, may be made out, * produced, gone into, vouched, and * 212 finally settled on the meeting appointed for to-morrow."

The draft of the deed of December, 1830, with this indorsement, "I approve of this draft on behalf of W. de Montmorency, Esq. — A. T. MONTGOMERY," was also proved as an exhibit, as well as the deed itself; and also the two following letters, which were referred to in respondent's answer as showing the appellant's acquiescence in the settlement, and other matters referred to in the last mentioned deed.

By the deed executed between you and me, you undertook the payment of all debts due of my late father, except certain debts in and on the back of the said deed excepted, and Mrs. Darby was not amongst those excepted; you will, therefore, please to let her know that I am not her debtor, if, upon investigation, any thing be really due to her.

"My dear Harvey, — I understand that some evil minded person has told you lately that I repented giving you Cooldrina. I can assure you I never did say so, nor neither did I ever repent giving it to you; and whoever told you so, told you a great falsehood. I should feel sorry that you should think for a moment that I should say so; I only wish that Cooldrina was better for your sake, and I wish it was able to produce you ten times as much as it is.

* 213 * Several schedules of accounts, referred to in the pleadings, were proved as exhibits, including a schedule annexed to the deed of December, 1830, by which it appeared that there were debts to the amount of 11,690*l.* against the estates left to appellant by Sir W. de Montmorency, and not charged in the accounts of the respondent, who, by the provisions of the said deed, undertook to discharge all the other debts against Sir William and the estates.

The cause was heard in January, 1837, by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who decreed that the bill should be dismissed, without costs. (a)

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Pemberton, for the appellant, against that decree. — The deed dated the 18th of April, 1829, conveying away a valuable estate from the appellant to his own trustee and agent, was executed under such circumstances as clearly entitled the appellant to call on a Court of Equity to set it aside, or give him other effectual relief against it. That was not only a transaction between principal and agent, cestui que trust and trustee, which relations would of themselves be sufficient to avoid it, but it was also a transaction effected by fraud and undue influence on the part of the agent. The deed recited that Sir W. de Montmorency, immediately after the execution of his will, directed and requested the appellant to give the respondent the estate; a recital so wholly false, that it was not even attempted to be proved. The deed was prepared by the agent and trustee, and sent with * that false recital to the appellant to be * 214 executed by him, the day after his father's funeral, with a communication at the same time amounting to a threat that unless he executed it, he should not have the assistance of his trustee in protecting himself against the pretended claim of the heir-at-law to the estates. Lord Crofton made no attempt to enforce the claim, and the respondent well knew that there was no ground for such a claim, but he availed himself of the report (which probably originated with himself, though that is not proved) to alarm the appellant. The deed of gift granted under such circumstances of pressure, and without legal advice, could not be maintained if it stood by itself. Then could it be said that subsequent transactions set it up and confirmed it? In the circumstances and relative situation of the parties, no act of the appellant could give confirmation to the deed so as to preclude him from relief. The deed of December, 1830, which is relied on as a confirmation, was itself voidable so far as it purported to confirm the former deed, and could not be set up as a bar to the accounts sought by the appellant's bill. The accounts sought by him are, first, the agency accounts prior to the death of Sir W. de Montmorency; secondly, the executor's accounts; and thirdly, the accounts of the subsequent receipts of the rents of the appellant's estates. The prayer of the bill and the statements in it mix up the executor's accounts with the subsequent agency accounts; but although the pleadings are not correct in point of form, they show enough generally to entitle the appellant to relief on the three heads of account. The appellant asks, in addition to these accounts, to have a reconveyance of Cooldrina decreed to him. The respondent having abandoned the claim of the annuity of 200*l.*, no relief is asked as to that,

(a) The case is reported by Messrs. Drury & Walsh, p. 119.

 * 215 *except that the letter be given up, so that there may be no room for making any claim on it hereafter.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The bill has allegations enough of fraud for setting aside the deed of April, 1829, but no allegations of error in the accounts].

Clearly the appellant is not entitled to set aside the settled accounts without showing error and falsifying, and that is not attempted. But there was no settlement of accounts after 1821, nor any accounts at all rendered from 1825 to the time of the testator's death. The deed of gift purports to be in full discharge of all accounts, claims or debts between Sir W. de Montmorency and the respondent; and the pretended settlement in 1830 commenced with the accounts as well of the agency as of the executorship from Sir William's death; but the appellant, as residuary legatee, was equally entitled to have the accounts of the rents received before the testator's death. There is a complete blank in these accounts from 1825 to April, 1829, yet the deed of December, 1830, witnesses that all accounts, of whatever nature or kind, heretofore or now depending between the parties in relation to any dealings whatsoever, have been and are now finally settled, as well those relating to such dealings or transactions as took place between the respondent and Sir W. de Montmorency, as those between the respondent and the appellant. That was a false statement, and cannot be held to bind the appellant. He was forced to assent to it by the same pressure of circumstances which urged him to the execution of the deed of 1829. The report of Lord Crofton's designs on the devised estates; the secret of which the respondent pretended to be in possession, and by which the appellant's title to the estates might be disturbed, and the expediency of keeping
 * 216 on terms with him, were as powerful motives *for executing the deed of 1830 as they were in obtaining the deed of gift. Besides, it is quite evident, from the depositions of

Maher, respondent's witness and partner, that it was only on settlement of the accounts that the agency and appellant's title-deeds were to be given up, so that he was completely in the respondent's power. The mortgage debt of 10,500*l.* to the respondent's father-in-law, a debt of 700*l.* to his brother-in-law, and other debts to other persons, making altogether near 12,000*l.*, paralyzed the appellant, a man of weak mind, as the witness Mannin said, and rendered it impossible for him either to resist the deed of 1830, or to take proper steps for rescinding that deed or the deed of gift, until he was able, out of the rents, to free himself from some of his debts. The same influence may sufficiently account for the writing of the two letters of November, 1831, and October, 1832, which have been also relied on as confirming the deed of December, 1830, and as a bar to the opening of the accounts which that deed purported to close. The respondent artfully deprived the appellant of the power of giving any explanation of those letters; for although the answer referred to them, they were not produced to the appellant nor sufficiently called to his attention until the hearing of the cause. In fact, it would appear, from the whole conduct of the appellant, that he was not only under undue influence and pressure, but was also ignorant of his right to the accounts between the respondent and Sir W. de Montmorency.

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. F. H. Goldsmid, for the respondent. — The accounts sought by the bill of the rents received by the respondent, as agent of Sir W. de Montmorency, were partly settled in his life-time, * and settled accounts are * 217 not to be opened except on proof of fraud or error. Chambers v. Goldwin, (a) Horlock v. Smith. (b) There is no fraud nor error shown, or alleged even, in these accounts. But it is said that the accounts for the last four years of the life of Sir W. de Montmorency were not furnished to him, nor examined prior to the settlement of them in 1830; and that the executorship accounts were not sufficiently vouched. That was not the fault of the respondent, but the wish of the appellant and of those who advised him. The whole of the respondent's accounts, as agent and executor of Sir William, and as agent of the appellant, were submitted to him and Messrs. Montgomery & Aiken, his solicitors, and Mr. Malone, his agent, also a solicitor; and, after some investigation, were finally settled and closed, and all demands in respect of them were released by the deed of December, 1830. That deed was deliberately executed under advice of the appellant's solicitors, after the arrangement carried into effect by it had been most carefully considered by them. It is not proved, nor is it true, that the appellant was forced to execute that deed by his embarrassments: he was not in embarrassment, and if he were, that would not be sufficient reason for setting aside the deed, unless upon proof that advantage was taken of it. That there was no pressure is evident from the respondent's taking bonds for the balances due to him, at three and five years. The respondent gave up a claim of 500*l.* for peace and to avoid litigation; and he also gave up all his vouchers, which remain in the hands of the appellant or his agent; so that, if these accounts are to be opened, the appellant is wholly without the means of proving items in them,

(a) 9 Ves. 251.

* 218 unless * his oath may be substituted for vouchers; an indulgence which was given to a party under similar circumstances in Morgan v. Lewes. (a) In the case of Horlock v. Smith, before referred to, the Lord Chancellor observes, "If the petitioners obtained the papers from Messrs. Goode upon the supposition that the bill (of costs) was finally settled, intending, however, to apply afterwards for taxation, upon the ground of Messrs. Goode's possession of the papers, but concealing that intention from Messrs. Goode, I think they ought not very easily to be allowed to take advantage of that circumstance at a future time. It was competent for them, if the papers were necessary to enable them to tax the bill, to inform Messrs. Goode of that necessity, &c. The petitioners, however, obtain possession of the papers from Messrs. Goode without any notice, leaving them under the idea that they had finally settled the account of their clients; and then, after Messrs. Goode have parted with the papers, which they were entitled to retain until the bill should have been taxed, the petitioners come here and apply for a taxation." (b) So in the present case, the appellant, after having obtained all the vouchers from the respondent, then complains that there was no settlement of accounts. Another difficulty which the respondent would have to contend with, in case those accounts were reopened, arises from the Statute of Limitations preventing him from making claims against the respondent in respect of the 1600*l.* costs against Sir W. de Montmorency, which he gave up on obtaining the conveyance of Cooldrina, and 500*l.* which he gave up on the proposal of Messrs. Montgomery & Aiken, on the settlement in December, 1830. That settlement was not only deliberately concluded by the *exe- * 219 cution of the deed of that date, but was subsequently and repeatedly confirmed by the appellant, particularly by the letter of November, 1831, by which he claims the benefit of the settlement and deed which he now seeks to set aside.

(a) 4 Dow, 29; see also Morgan v. Evans, 3 Cl. & Fin. 159.

(b) 2 My. & Cr. 511.

The conveyance of Cooldrina by the deed of April, 1829, was the deliberate, unsolicited, and voluntary act of the appellant. Mannin's evidence clearly supported the case made by the respondent as to that conveyance, and the only ground of suspicion against it is that the deed was prepared by the respondent and sent by his brother-in-law for execution. That was not sufficient to impeach the transaction. The evidence showed that no improper influence was used; that the appellant and his wife deliberated on the act and well understood what he was doing, and that he was carrying into effect the intention of his late father and benefactor. No weight ought to be given in this matter to the speech attributed to the respondent, when he was introducing the appellant to his tenants. The rumour alluded to, of Lord Crofton's intention, existed, and did not originate with the respondent. If he said he possessed any secret, or if he possessed any, he never made any use of it to the prejudice of the appellant. But if this conveyance was liable to be impeached in 1829, in consideration of the relation then existing between the parties, it was expressly confirmed by the deed of December, 1830, although it was then brought to the attention of the appellant and his solicitors, who on that occasion objected to the clause of confirmation, but finding that the respondent insisted on it, consented to the appellant's execution of that deed. The gift being the voluntary act of the appellant, and the result of his own sense of right, duty, and bounty, he ought not now to be heard to impeach it.

* Mr. Tinney, in reply, said the case of Horlock v. Smith * 220 had no application to the present. He would not object to such a direction as was stated on the other side to have been given in the case of Morgan v. Lewes, although it was not necessary, inasmuch as the transactions and accounts in this case were so recent, and there was no allegation of lost vouchers.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — This case has occupied so much time in the discussion, and has been discussed at such intervals (during three days), that I have had opportunities, since it was first opened, of carefully examining the whole of the proceedings and the evidence on each side. As the noble and learned Lord present (Lord WYNFORD) concurs with me as to the course your Lordships ought to adopt, there is no advantage in taking any further time to consider the case.

It is very important, considering the order that we shall * 221 have to propose to the House to make, and for * the benefit of those who may not be conversant with the pleadings in Courts of Equity, — as the bar of Ireland are represented as not being, (a) I believe without any foundation, for I see no ground to suppose that the rules of Courts of Equity are not attended to there with great fidelity; I believe that the decisions of this House and the rules of Courts of Equity regulate their proceedings; but it is very important that all parties should have their attention called to the various parts of the case, that there may be no misunderstanding as to the grounds upon which this House proceeds in affirming the judgment of the Court below.

The transactions of 1829 are transactions which I cannot hesitate for a moment to say were highly suspicious, at least, and such as, without much more explanation of them than has been afforded by the evidence in this case, could not possibly be supported by a Court of Equity, if complaint had been made before any acts of confirmation had taken place. We find that on the 14th of April, 1829, the original proprietor of this property died, and we find that so early as the 16th it is stated that a conversation took place in which the plaintiff (the appellant) stated that he had determined to part with the estate in the way in which he afterwards did. But as early as the 18th, four days only after the death of the testator, we find a deed executed by which an estate, part of the property left to the plaintiff, is conveyed over to Mr. Devereux, who had been the agent, and who represented that he had also been the confidential law adviser of the testator. We find that that deed conveyed

(a) In this and other appeals from Ireland, argued about the same time, observations were made at the bar on the alleged want of precision in equity pleadings there.

* this estate in discharge of all accounts which had been * 222 pending between the testator and himself. Now the objections to that transaction are very obvious: in the first place, the great haste with which it was done and the relative situation of the parties, the one the manager of the property, perfectly conversant therefore with all circumstances connected with it, and who procures this conveyance to himself, which professes to be a settlement of all accounts, although it was perfectly impossible, from the nature of the case and from the circumstances that took place, that there could have been any examination of those accounts. Then there is another fact, not brought out very distinctly in the evidence, but, as far as the evidence applies to it, giving rise to a strong suspicion of influence of a very improper nature exercised by Devereux over the plaintiff at that time; namely, the supposed possession of a secret by which, according to the representations of the witnesses, he thought he had the power of depriving the plaintiff of all his estates; some secret with regard to the title which, if revealed, would show that the plaintiff had no title. Now if that secret really existed, and was used for the purpose of obtaining the conveyance of the estate, it would be as gross a fraud and as violent a breach of duty on the part of the agent, Devereux, as any thing that can possibly be stated.

The case upon this point stands in a very singular position, and the evidence is of a very extraordinary character. There is no evidence of such a representation having been held out to the plaintiff. The evidence is of a speech having been made by this agent at a meeting of the tenants and inhabitants of the estates, upon the plaintiff's taking possession after the death of the testator. The agent is represented as * having there * 223 stated publicly that he was in possession of a secret, that the heir-at-law would not succeed,—who evidently had been making some inquiries, probably with a view of making some claim,—the agent is represented as having stated publicly that he was in possession of a secret by which the plaintiff's title might be defeated, but that that secret he would keep to himself; and that, as he was so fortunate as to succeed in all contests in which he was engaged, no danger could arise to the plaintiff. Two witnesses speak to having heard the speech delivered, and another witness speaks to similar expressions having been used at different times. I do not see what possible motive there could be,—none has been suggested at the bar, and I am unable to suggest to myself any possible motive for that declaration. If, indeed, there was no foundation for it, of course, in addition to the objection of its being a falsehood, it was a gratuitous slur upon the title of the agent's employer; because, if there was no objection known to him to the plaintiff's title, one cannot conceive any thing more absurd, or more injurious to the plaintiff's interest, than his agent proclaiming that there was an objection, although nobody was likely to find it out. On the other hand, if he was possessed of the secret and nobody else knew it, one cannot conceive any folly greater than to say at a meeting of five hundred persons that there was an objection to the title, leaving all those persons to find it out; an objection which might probably become known to those who might be affected, one way or another, by the failure of the plaintiff's title. However there is no distinct evidence of this having been used as a means of obtaining the deed, though there are strong suspicions that it might have been.

* 224 * Now all these circumstances, although not amounting to positive proof of fraud, yet are so full of suspicion, that, considering the situation in which the parties stood towards each other, considering the haste with which the deed was prepared and executed, and considering what was stated to have passed, I think, if the transactions had been complained of within a reasonable time, no Court of Equity could have hesitated in setting aside these transactions, unless a very different explanation had been given of them than that which has been afforded in this suit. But, however, it must be observed that there is no positive evidence of fraud, no distinct evidence of misrepresentation or of influence used by the possession of the secret, although there is very strong suspicion that each of these acts might have been brought to bear as means of obtaining the deed in question. All those facts, however, were of course known or might have been known to the plaintiff himself, and that which appears extremely suspicious upon the face of the transactions, as they stand, might have been capable of explanation, or there might have been a knowledge of circumstances which would lead those who were acquainted with all the facts to a different conclusion from that to which they might have been led by the mere circumstances of suspicion to which I have alluded. For instance, the plaintiff must have known whether the supposed secret as to his title was or was not used as a means by which the deed of 1829 was obtained. He knew or had the means of knowing, or those whom he employed had the means of knowing, what was the state of the account between the father and Mr. Devereux; and if they did not think proper to use those means in their power, those that suffer by their negligence ought not to be heard to complain.

* The subsequent transactions are of a character which * 225 seem to me to render it perfectly impossible for a Court of Equity to open the transaction of 1829, if there be such a doctrine in a Court of Equity as that confirmation will make that valid which in its origin was voidable, though not void, upon grounds for equitable interference. This deed, executed in 1829, operates beyond all doubt, as long as it stands, as a conclusive settlement of accounts. Whether those accounts were investigated or not, is not material for the purpose, because the deed, so long as it stands, is a conclusion of all question of account anterior to the death of the father. Such are the terms of it. It appears that so early as the month of October, 1830, — whether upon the application of the plaintiff, or whether by desire of the defendant, is matter of some doubt upon the evidence, — there was a negotiation going on between the defendant and the then solicitors of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was then represented by Messrs. Montgomery & Aiken; Mr. Maher, being the partner of the defendant, was the party negotiating on his part, and Montgomery & Aiken were the parties negotiating on the part of the plaintiff. It appears that this was not done in haste. There was ample opportunity afforded of making inquiry into all the circumstances that were material to be inquired into as to the transaction of 1829. It appears that the negotiation commenced on the 5th of October, 1830, and the first object was an investigation of the accounts between the defendant and the plaintiff. In the first instance it does not appear that the inquiry was confined to accounts subsequent to the death of the father. There was a general inquiry how matters stood between the plaintiff and the defendant; and it is also to be observed that inasmuch

* 226 * as the plaintiff was residuary legatee of the testator, any item of account as between the defendant and the testator would be immaterial in a final settlement of accounts between the defendant and the plaintiff, because whatever the defendant owed to the estate of the testator would, under the circumstances that have taken place, — namely, the plaintiff being residuary legatee of the testator, — be an item of account between the plaintiff and the defendant.

Now, Mr. Maher tells us that in the month of October, 1830, he, on behalf of the defendant, and Messrs. Montgomery & Aiken, on the part of the plaintiff, came to this investigation of the accounts; and the letters, which are extremely important, of the 13th of October and the 12th of November, 1830, which have been relied upon in the argument on behalf of the appellant, appear to me to be extremely important evidence on behalf of the respondent. Before these is a letter of the 11th of October, signed Samuel Aiken, one of the parties acting for the plaintiff. He says that Mr. Maher, the person acting on behalf of the defendant, “had not been able to come to any conclusion with respect to the accounts.” These, no doubt, are the accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant. That leaves it ambiguous, except that the accounts had been the subject of discussion between Aiken and Maher. Then on the 13th of October, the same person writes to the defendant himself a letter, in which, after alluding to another matter with regard to a mortgage, he says, “Bring up with you the conveyance of the Cooldrina estate, in which it is said is embodied a general release as between you and the present Mr. de Montmorency. I pray of you by no means to omit bringing up this deed, and, in a word, * 227 all such other deeds, papers, and documents as relate * to the accounts, which I think (as I heretofore mentioned) may be yet amicably and happily settled, on which occasion my honourable, honest, and kind offers shall not be wanting.” Now that, of course, must have been done. There is no evidence of its being done, but he asks for information, and we must assume that the deeds relating to the Cooldrina estate were produced, which it had become material in the investigation of the accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant should be brought up, in order that Mr. Aiken, acting on behalf of the plaintiff, might see how far it was material in that settlement of accounts which he was making on behalf of the plaintiff, and which settlement of accounts necessarily depended upon the state of the accounts between the defendant and the estate of the plaintiff's father. This, therefore, proves that the attention of the legal advisers of the plaintiff was distinctly called to that deed, which deed is material for the present purpose, as it operates as a settlement of accounts up to the death of the father.

It appears, from the evidence of Mr. Montgomery, that the accounts subsequently investigated were confined to the transactions after the death of the father. It naturally would be so, unless those who were then advising the plaintiff thought that there was a case for setting aside the transaction of 1829, because, from the fact of the transaction of 1829 barring all inquiry as to the antecedent accounts, if they had thought there was a case in which it was the interest of their client to open the accounts antecedent to 1829, then was the time when it was their bounden duty to inquire into the transaction of 1829; and if they thought there was any case which justified them in advising the plaintiff to question those transactions, that was the period when proceedings ought to have * been * 228 instituted for carrying that object into effect. Instead of which, being furnished with a deed that closed the transactions up to the death of the plaintiff's father, his legal advisers, with full knowledge of that deed, proceed to investigate the accounts subsequent to the death of the father, making no inquiry, as far as appears, as to the antecedent accounts as between the plaintiff and the defendant. It cannot be supposed that they were so negligent of their duty, or so inattentive to the interests of their client, that they did not inform themselves what was the history of that transaction, and what was the nature of those accounts. It was their bounden duty to do so, and we must presume that they did so. It is due to professional men to suppose that they did attend to the interests of their client, and that they satisfied themselves that what they were doing for their client was what it was for his interest to do.

In the subsequent history of these transactions, Mr. Montgomery, acting for the plaintiff, goes on, and a laborious investigation of the subsequent accounts takes place. He then tells us that finding this extremely troublesome, and that it would occupy a considerable time, he said, "If you strike off 500*l.* from the account, that will leave 2700*l.* due from the plaintiff to Mr. Devereux; that shall be taken as the final balance." That is accepted, and I assume, as there is nothing else to which it could refer, that that is the proposal referred to in a letter written by Mr. Aiken, in which he says, "I am authorized to say that as Mr. Devereux has agreed not to bring forward or make any charge against Mr. de Montmorency for any money transactions or dealings which were had or took place between Mr. Devereux and the late Sir William, and that same shall be for ever done

* 229 away * with, that he, Mr. de Montmorency, will accede to the arrangement proposed this morning." Whether this refers to that proposition of Mr. Montgomery or any other is not material. The subsequent account, it is admitted, on all hands, is not matter of contest in this suit, but a certain sum was agreed upon as the final balance due from the plaintiff to Mr. Devereux, upon the assumption that the deed of 1829 operated as a final conclusion between the parties as to all transactions anterior to the death of the father. Accordingly, a deed was prepared, and we have the draft; and the draft of the deed, in conformity with that which had been settled, states "that all accounts of whatsoever nature or kind, heretofore or now pending between them, in relation to any dealings whatsoever, have been and are now finally settled, as well those relating to such dealings or transactions as took place between the said Harvey Devereux and Sir William de Montmorency, baronet; and that, for peace sake, as well as to avoid litigation and expense, the said William de Montmorency has agreed to secure to the said Harvey Devereux the principal sum of 2700*l.* in full, for the balance due on said accounts, by two bonds."

This was in October, 1830, when there had been ample time to review the transactions of the preceding year, when there was no haste in the conclusion of the transaction, when the plaintiff had the advice of the professional persons whose names I have mentioned, when their attention had been drawn to the transaction of 1829; and assuming they were not parties to any conspiracy against their client, which is not suggested, but that they were doing their duty towards the person on whose behalf they were acting, they had deliberately come to a ratification of that which had taken place in the preceding year, and

* 230 Mr. Montgomery * approves of that draft on behalf of his client. He therefore tells his client, by that approval, "I have done my duty towards you, I have investigated all the transactions which concern the accounts between yourself and Mr. Devereux,"—which necessarily included the transactions of the period anterior to the death of the father, as well as those subsequent. "I approve of this draft on your behalf, and I, as your legal adviser, sanction your executing that deed,"—which upon the face of it recites a settlement of all accounts, as well those anterior to the death of the father as subsequent.

My Lords, is the transaction actually void in itself? If so, there can be no confirmation of a transaction void in itself.¹ But a transaction voidable only from circumstances of suspicion, however strong, may undoubtedly be confirmed by a subsequent deliberate act of the party, who might originally probably have succeeded in having it declared void. It was subsequently investigated by the party's professional advisers, and with their assistance, and with all due deliberation, he came to the conclusion that it ought to be confirmed, and he does confirm it by deed. That deed contains a confirmation, in terms, of the conveyance of Cooldrina. At the same time, it must be observed that it is introduced into this deed as an exception from the undertaking to convey other estates. The defendant being trustee of the estates, upon this final settlement with the cestui que trust, having claimed security for what he conceived to be due to him, he undertakes to denude himself of the trust, and to put into possession of the legal title that cestui que trust, for whom he held the legal estate; and he therefore covenants to convey the estates, excepting that estate of Cooldrina, and he agrees to give up the * deeds, except the deed of Cooldrina. It is not, * 231 therefore, foisted into this deed, merely for the purpose of confirmation, but it is a necessary exception out of that covenant which the defendant was called upon to execute when he came to the final settlement between himself and the plaintiff. But there is not only a settlement of the accounts anterior to the father's death, but the conveyance of the estate is now proved to be brought under the attention of the plaintiff's legal advisers, and with their concurrence and with their advice he confirms it.

My Lords, it would be extremely difficult under these circumstances, if nothing more had taken place, unless he had said, "You, Messrs. Montgomery & Aiken, have conspired with the defendant, and you have imposed upon me, and induced me to execute this deed in confirmation of a prior transaction,"—if that had been the case he had attempted to make, one could have understood it; but how with the concurrence of Messrs. Montgomery & Aiken, how coming forward with them, and employing them as his legal advisers, he can repudiate this deed of 1830 has appeared to me, from the first, to be a matter which involved the plaintiff in a difficulty that was perfectly insurmountable. But there is another circumstance which proves that this was not done behind the back of the plaintiff or without his knowledge and concurrence, but that he was perfectly privy to what was going on, under the immediate direction, no doubt, of his legal advisers, but at the same time communicated to him, and his concurrence asked; and that is the tenor of the subsequent letters. It is not that any letters subsequently written can add to the validity of a transaction formally entered into, as in that deed of 1830, but the value of these subsequent letters is to show

* 232 * that the plaintiff clearly understood what he had done, and that for a considerable time after that period he never questioned the propriety of the transactions into which he had entered. On the 10th of November, 1831, he is called upon,—it being part of the transaction of 1830 that Mr. Devereux had brought certain debts to account in his transactions with the testator,—he was called upon to show that such investigation of those transactions had taken place as exonerated him from being liable to the payment of those debts. There were certain debts excepted, which he had not taken credit for, and other debts he had taken credit for, and was bound to see to the payment of them. There is another letter of the 16th of November, 1831, written by himself to the defendant, in terms not of hostility but the contrary, and so far consistent with the case made by the appellant; and in this letter, which he addresses “Dear Harvey,” he states that he has been called upon to pay a debt, and he states, “By the deed executed between you and me you undertook the payment of all debts due of my late father, except certain debts in and on the back of the said deed excepted.” Therefore he tells him that he, Devereux, was to be looked to, and not the plaintiff, for the payment of that debt. Now, after this, can it be said that he did not know what he had done, or that, knowing what he had done, he had no intention of confirming it? The next letter is also undoubtedly open to the observation which has been made upon it; it may have arisen from the continued pressure of Mr. Devereux upon the plaintiff, but there is no such thing proved at that time. That letter in terms recognizes the transactions, but it also proves this,—indeed it is apparent merely in consideration of the balance supposed to be due at the time of the father's death, but that it was partly on account of the settlement of the accounts, and partly stated to be in consideration of a wish which the plaintiff's father had expressed that he would convey to Devereux the estate in question. He says, "Some evil-minded persons have told you that I repented giving you Cooldrina. I can assure you I never did say so, nor neither did I ever repent giving it you, and whoever told you so told a great falsehood."

My Lords, that brings the history of the case down to October, 1832. Then there is a transaction which has been adverted to, and which is in evidence, of a later date, namely, the transaction of April, 1833; because here we find the plaintiff and the defendant in opposition to each other. Mr. Maher, the partner of Mr. Devereux, brings an action for a bill of costs. That is not a very friendly proceeding, and it was not likely therefore that under those circumstances there should be any very kindly feeling between the parties. Nor was it very likely that the plaintiff should be then acting in what he did under any influence of fear as to what the defendant might do with regard to the title of the estate. It might have been a very improper proceeding, and certainly was a very improper proceeding on the part of the plaintiffs in the action, because they were then claiming costs due to them from the plaintiff's father, which had been the subject of arrangement long before, and their title to which they had deliberately relinquished. But who is it that sets up the benefit of the settlement of 1829? The plaintiff himself. He says, "You are calling upon me to pay costs, which costs, by the transaction of 1829, you have waived all title to." * He is the party * 234 who in 1833 was claiming the benefit of this arrangement.

Whatever ambiguity there may be in the language of Mr. Maher's deposition, the result, as I understand it, is, that the plaintiff, then defendant, set up this defence and got the benefit of this defence, and he was accordingly protected from all costs incurred in the lifetime of his father, and due from the father to Mr. Devereux and Mr. Maher.

Whatever costs there might be due to Mr. Maher individually is not the subject of the claim of Mr. Devereux, but so far as regarded the costs due to the partnership of Devereux and Maher, the plaintiff got the benefit of that defence. Having set up the arrangement of 1829, which he now impeaches, he got the benefit of it, and was relieved from the costs incurred in the lifetime of his father. That took place in 1832, and nothing more is heard of this complaint of the transaction of 1829 until a bill is filed in 1835.

My Lords, having gone through the history of this transaction, and shortly called your attention to the periods at which the circumstances of the case must have been matter of investigation by the plaintiff, and the mode in which upon those occasions he has dealt with those facts, showing that from 1829, in every subsequent transaction, he has recognized what had then taken place, that he has confirmed and acted upon it in the years 1831, 1832, and 1833, and never complained of it till 1835; it appears to me, that although the transaction was questionable in its origin and suspicious in its commencement, it is not now capable of being complained of, and that therefore it will be the duty of your Lordships to confirm the decision of the Court below.

The Court below dismissed the bill without costs, and I think it did so rightly; because, however transactions
* 235 * may be confirmed, if they have their origin in circumstances so suspicious, as between a client and a solicitor, as these transactions were in their origin, I think that if the solicitor or agent ultimately escapes, by confirmation on the part of his client, in preventing these transactions from being entirely set aside, he never can complain of being put to the cost of having them investigated. The same ground, therefore, which induces me to think that the Court below did rightly in dismissing the bill without costs, induces me to submit to your Lordships that this decree should be affirmed, but that it should be affirmed without costs.

There is one other part of the case to which I wish to call the attention of the counsel for the appellant, which is to that letter undertaking to pay a salary of 200*l.* a year. It does not appear that that now is of any value to the parties. Whatever, therefore, your Lordships may think right to do with reference to that letter, would not make any difference as to the costs. At the same time, it is a contract which, under these circumstances, undoubtedly ought never to have been taken. It appears to have been left in the hands of Mr. Devereux; and if the plaintiff therefore requires it, I will submit to your Lordships that the decree should direct the document to be delivered up. It can make no difference as to the costs below, or as to the costs here.

LORD WYNFORD. — My noble and learned friend has gone so fully into this case, that it is scarcely necessary for me to say more than that I concur with him. I will, however, trouble your Lordships with one or two observations. There is no dispute here as to any question of law; there is no doubt that the transaction did not render the deed altogether void, but merely * voidable, and being voidable, it may certainly be * 236 confirmed by what took place afterwards. If the deed of 1829 was executed (which probably there may be some reason to suspect) under the supposition that the defendant was in possession of some secret which he might use for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's title to the estate, a fear of that sort arising from a threat on the part of the defendant would invalidate any transaction that took place under the influence of that fear. I would state, however, that there is no evidence of any threat on the part of the defendant to make use of any knowledge which he might possess for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff. On the contrary, it is admitted on all sides that, although it is said by some of the witnesses that he boasted that he was in possession of this secret, he uniformly said that he would keep it within his own breast, and that he would never use it to injure the plaintiff.

My noble and learned friend has stated that upon another occasion, besides what took place at the bonfire meeting, he alluded to this secret. What he said at the bonfire meeting is, as it is represented on the part of the plaintiff, very extraordinary, and it is scarcely possible to believe that it can be true. It is material to observe that the defendant gives a very different account of what he said at the bonfire meeting. On the part of the plaintiff it is stated that the defendant said he could at any time, by disclosing the secret, defeat the plaintiff's title. What could possibly have induced him to say any such thing one cannot conceive; but according to his own account, what he did say is very different from what he is represented to have said by the evidence given on the part of the plaintiff; for he states in his answer, that what he did say was, that it would be useless for my Lord Crofton * to bring forward his claim as heir- * 237 at-law, as he was in a condition to disprove that claim. Now, if he said that, certainly it was sufficient to produce the effect which he says he intended to produce, to prevail upon the tenants of this estate not to be frightened at any claim set up by Lord Crofton. But notwithstanding this, unquestionably what my noble and learned friend has said is very true,—that on the very day of the funeral of Sir William de Montmorency, something, at least very indelicate, was said on the part of the plaintiff, if not exciting very great suspicion in this affair, of his endeavouring to get possession of this estate conveyed to him, and also as himself being the attorney who was to prepare the deed himself, and writing that very extraordinary letter by which 200*l.* a year was to be secured to himself: and I quite agree with my noble and learned friend, that if proceedings had been instituted to set aside this deed,—the deed which followed upon that letter,—it seems to me impossible that that deed, or that that letter securing the 200*l.* a year, could possibly have stood; therefore, I say, if the transaction had ended with the deed executed in 1829, it appears to me it could have been set aside.

But the question is, has that deed, which was only voidable, been confirmed by that which has subsequently occurred? Now the deed of 1830 is certainly a direct confirmation of it, as strong a confirmation as it is possible to be. In that deed it is stipulated that all securities belonging to Sir William's property should be delivered up, except the deeds relating to the estate of Cooldrina. Why were they not delivered up? Because the estate of Cooldrina, by the deed of 1829, had been conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant. It would, therefore, have been improper

* 238 to deliver up * those deeds, because those deeds were the muniments of the property which had by the previous transaction, so confirmed by this, become the property of the plaintiff. But this is not all: then follow two letters in 1831 and 1832, and the subsequent transaction in 1833. By the first of those letters he claims to take advantage of this very deed which he now attempts to set aside; and then in the second letter, in 1832, he says he never, since the execution of the deed of 1829, had said one word to the effect that that deed had been improperly obtained,—quite the contrary; he never thought of it; and that that man must have spoken falsely who had ever conveyed to the mind of the defendant the idea that he ever thought that deed void. Now, it strikes me that, supposing an undue impression to be created in a man's mind, it is often difficult to prove the precise time when that improper impression was got rid of. But a circumstance had taken place before the writing of either of these letters, which clearly showed that impression must have been got rid of before that time. Both these parties were desirous of putting an end to the connection with regard to the agency of the estates. Now, if that impression had continued in the mind of the plaintiff, that the defendant was in a condition to take that estate from him, or to enable any one to take that estate from him, whenever he thought proper, would he not upon any terms whatever have kept this person still in his employment? But it appears that the one was desirous of quitting the employment, and that the employer was desirous of getting rid of him. Now, this clearly shows that all fear on the part of the plaintiff must have been got rid of at that time; yet after this he writes the two letters which your Lordships have heard. Therefore, whatever suspicion there may be * with respect to that * 239 which took place in 1830, as to the continuance of this fear as to the title to the estate, it is clear that that impression must have been got rid of before the writing of either of the letters in 1831 or 1832; for before either of those letters were written, all connection whatever had been terminated between the plaintiff and the defendant.

But I must say, with respect to the deed of 1830, it seems to me that if that deed were to be set aside, as was very properly said by one of the counsel at the bar, I do not know what deed is to stand. There is no particular error pointed out; matters were investigated before this deed was executed. There was no want of legal assistance; it seems to me, on the contrary, that if there was any thing to complain of, there were rather too many present. There was a great number of attorneys present; some concerned for one party, and some concerned for another; and it is positively sworn, that all parts of the transaction were minutely and thoroughly investigated before the deed was executed. It appears to me that if this were to be set aside, no transactions which take place between man and man could be considered as final, but parties must be for ever exposed to have transactions ripped up in a Court of Equity, if these accounts are not to be considered as closed under this agreement, which took place in 1829. I therefore agree with my noble and learned friend that the decree of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in every part, ought to be affirmed. It is undoubtedly the practice, that when an appeal is made against a decree, and the judgment of the Court below is affirmed, that appeal ought to be dismissed with costs. But I think, with my noble and learned friend, that this case forms an exception to that general rule; that there is so much to blame in * the conduct of the defendant in the beginning * 240 and up to the year 1830, that the plaintiff was lawfully justified in appealing to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and even in coming to this House to have the matter thoroughly investigated. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that it would be hard and unjust to visit such a plaintiff, who is acting under such circumstances, with costs. I therefore concur in thinking that this appeal should be dismissed, without costs.

With respect to that instrument to which reference has been made, undoubtedly it ought to be given up, though it was distinctly stated, as I understood, on both sides at the bar, that that instrument — wretched instrument as it is — was not intended to be carried into execution. I am glad that the party had so much modesty and moderation as never to attempt to carry it into execution. It never has been executed. Nothing has been attempted to be obtained upon it, but the party is afraid that there may be bounds to that moderation, and that the period may come when he may be in danger of being called upon for the payment of that sum of 200*l.* per annum ; and it is certainly extremely proper that he should have full security against any danger of that sort.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The decree will be varied by directing the letter of April, 1829, to be delivered up to the appellant, and that in all other respects the decree be affirmed, without costs.

Ordered accordingly.

ADAM GIBSON, late Teacher of Latin and other Languages in the Royal Academy of Tain .	} Appellant.
HUGH ROSS, Esq., Preses , and Others, the Man- agers and Directors of the said Academy .
	} Respondents.

Corporation School.

The rules of law applicable to the managers of a public establishment do not apply to one formed and maintained from private funds, though it may be formed and maintained under a royal charter of incorporation.

The appointment to an office in a private establishment is not, therefore, necessarily an appointment ad vitam aut culpam, but depends in each instance on the particular circumstances under which it was made.

THE respondents were the managers or directors of the academy of Tain, in Ross-shire, an institution established and supported by private contribution; and the question at issue regarded the right or power of the respondents, as directors, to remove one of the teachers of the name of Gibson (the appellant).

The want of any preparatory institution for purposes of education, had formerly occasioned much inconvenience in the north of Scotland. Hence, the plan of an academy at Tain was projected, and at once met with the highest encouragement. A leading part, in originating and carrying through the measure, was taken by Lord Seaforth and Lord Reay; and these noblemen were cordially supported by the most opulent and influential classes of the community. Subscriptions, to a considerable amount, were speedily obtained; a large plot of ground was gratuitously presented to the promoters of the scheme;

ing the managers or directors into a corporation, with a right of perpetuity and succession, and all the customary legal privileges incident to a society so constituted.

Throughout the district of country which was expected to be benefited by this institution, there were regular parochial schools, and in the towns, burghal schools, or, as they are called, grammar-schools; being all public institutions of ancient standing, subject to special rules, and governed, in their whole economy, by the statute and common law of the land.

The charter declares the object and purposes of the society to be the foundation and endowment of an academy for the instruction of youth within the burgh of Tain; and it proceeds to constitute and incorporate certain individuals and heads of public bodies, to the number of twenty-one, with thirteen persons to be elected, besides every subscriber to the amount of 50*l.*, and the heir-male of subscribers to the amount of 100*l.*, into one body, politic or corporate, by the name and title of the "Managers and Directors of the Tain Academy," who are empowered to conduct the whole business and affairs of the institution.

By this name and title, those persons are empowered to buy, take, hold, and enjoy lands, tenements and hereditaments, goods, chattels, donations, and legacies, to sue, plead, and defend, and to be sued, impleaded, and defended in any Courts of Justice; and farther, "to appoint treasurers, stewards, factors, cashiers, and other necessary officers, for them to act, and to have and use a common seal, and the same to change from time to time, as shall seem expedient to the said incorporation; and otherwise, and in all other things, to act and do as is permitted by law, and

 * 243 as is * usual in the case of persons incorporated, and with all the privileges incident to such incorporations."

There is a power of making by-laws, given by a clause which confers on the subscribers, being members of the corporation, and their successors, "full power to make such other and so many by-laws, regulations, rules and orders, as they, or the majority of them present at such meetings, shall judge proper and think necessary for the better government and direction of the said academy. And the said regulations herein above recited, as well as the by-laws, regulations, rules and orders to be made in future, or any of them, to alter and annul, as they the members of the said incorporation so assembled, or the major part of them present, shall deem proper and requisite: provided always, that when any new by-law, or any alteration in any of the then existing by-laws, shall be intended to be made at any such annual meeting as aforesaid, notice of such intention shall be inserted in one or more of the London evening newspapers, and in one or more of the Edinburgh newspapers, one month at the least previous to the day of such meeting. And we will and direct that all by-laws, regulations, rules and orders, made as aforesaid, shall, until altered, be duly observed and kept, provided that the same are noways contrary to the laws of the realm, and the general purport and meaning of our said charter and letters-patent."

The charter bears date in 1809, and the first advertisement for teachers was published in the newspapers in August, 1812. The advertisement set forth, generally, the nature of the new establishment, as having been erected by private contributions. "A royal charter (it was stated) was obtained, constituting the

Various persons came forward and offered themselves as candidates for the different situations of teachers in the academy. But, in the mean time, some alterations were judged necessary by the directors to be made upon the rules introduced by the charter, and some additional provisions as to the hours of attendance, school fees, and periodical examinations, and other such matters not referred to in the charter. Accordingly, a draft of these by-laws and regulations was produced to a meeting of the directors, held on the 13th of October, 1812, and considered by them. The directors approved of them as they stood, and adopted them as interim regulations, but referred the question as to their final adoption to a general meeting to be held in April.

The first of these proposed by-laws declared that "in the election of teachers, the directors are to be guided by a regard to the character and abilities of the candidates, as certified by the testimonials of competent and respectable judges; and for this purpose, the directors shall, if they think it necessary, request some of the professors of any of the Scottish Universities to examine the candidates, and report their judgment of their respective qualifications."

In conducting the election, the directors determined, in the first place, merely to designate by ballot such persons as should be approved of, but to make their election dependent on the result of an examination or trial to be undergone by them, in presence of Principal Baird and two professors of the University of Edinburgh, and also on their express agreement to be bound by the charter and by-laws.

Accordingly, the teachers being balloted for at the general meeting of the directors, which was held on * the 16th * 245 December, 1812, the appellant was, on that occasion, chosen among others. The same meeting took into consideration the proposed by-laws which had been previously adopted ad interim, and in which certain alterations were then made; but with these alterations they were declared to be the fixed rules and regulations for the government and management of the institution, and it was expressly provided that the different teachers should be subject to them. Accordingly, the minutes, after setting forth the election of the different teachers, and among others, that of the appellant, proceed as follows: "The meeting request of their secretary to inform the different gentlemen above mentioned, of their election by this meeting, and to direct them to proceed forthwith to Edinburgh, for the purpose of their undergoing an examination of their knowledge and abilities by the professors of the College there; and also to inform them that, if found qualified, they are severally to enter on the duties of their office, against the 15th day of February next; in which event they are hereby found entitled to all the fees and emoluments of their different situations respectively, as the same are fixed by the directors and herein after inserted ; but subject always to the rules and regulations adopted by the directors for the government and management of the institution, as well as the by-laws which the directors have laid down for the internal regulation of the institution."

The following stood as the second of these rules : " In case it shall be found necessary to discontinue any of the teachers, which can only be done by a special meeting of the directors regularly called for the purpose by their preses for the time being, it is understood and declared that such teacher shall receive
 * 246 three * months' previous notice of such intention, before his services are declared at an end ; and in the event of any of the teachers wishing to leave the institution of his own accord, such teacher shall be obliged to give three months' previous notice to the preses of the directors."

In like manner, by the seventh regulation, it was provided, " That if any of the teachers shall be found, after due inquiry by the directors, to be unsuccessful, or, in other respects, unworthy of the trust reposed in him, it shall be always competent to the directors to deprive such a teacher of his office, and of all the emoluments connected with it."

The academy was formally opened on the 15th February, 1813, at a general meeting of the directors, attended by a number of the subscribers, and at which all the persons elected teachers, and among the rest the appellant, were present, having successfully gone through the trial at Edinburgh. The preses of the meeting then stated to them the different by-laws and regulations, " which the managers and directors had, in the mean time, thought it necessary to make for their regulation and government. That if they thought it proper, the clerk would furnish them with copies of what they might require, which they might consider at leisure, until the general meeting upon the 30th day of April next ; and if they thought any thing could be altered or added, for the better government of the academy, the meeting of that day would consider of it, and would do in the matter as they saw cause."

Copies of the proposed by-laws, including the articles above quoted, were then, at their special request, furnished to the teachers, and were fully and maturely considered by them. The result of their deliberations was communicated to the directors in a long * letter, in which they commented * 247 upon several of the laws, but passed over article 2d, in regard to the dismissal of teachers, without any observation or notice whatever.

The final meeting of subscribers was held on the 30th of April, 1813, when "the letter of the teachers was considered, and the subscribers, in general meeting assembled, having carefully gone over the same, with the rector and masters' remarks, they have unanimously adopted the following regulations, which they direct and appoint to be the standing regulations of the Tain Royal Academy, until cause shall be shown to any future general meeting for any alteration."

Among these regulations, the rule above quoted as article 2d was sanctioned and universally agreed to, without the alteration of a word.

The appellant did not appear to have been successful in his teaching; and in 1834 a number of heads of families and leading people in Tain and its vicinity united together, and invited a young man, qualified to teach Latin and French, to settle with that view in Tain, engaging, besides the school fees, to contribute such a sum among themselves as, upon the whole, would ensure him a respectable income.

The appellant's school suffered severely from this circumstance. The committee who examined the school in July, 1834, after mentioning the appearance of the scholars under examination, made the following statement: "The committee cannot, however, close their report without expressing their deep regret at finding no more than four scholars in the Latin department." This number was afterwards withdrawn, and for several sessions past the appellant had not been attended by one single scholar.

The directors met again on the 20th November, * 1834, * 248 and their minutes of that date contain the following entry:

"The directors find, with much regret, that the classical department, under charge of Mr. Gibson, is entirely deserted; not a single pupil has been this session intrusted to him, in any one of the various languages which it belongs to him to teach. As the guardians of the institution, they cannot permit this state of matters to continue longer. The directors conclude that the desertion of his classes is in consequence of Mr. Gibson having lost the confidence of the public; for in the immediate neighbourhood of his class-room, Mr. Mackenzie, of Inverness, has recently opened a school for Latin and the other learned languages ; and with nothing but his character, talents, and industry to recommend him, is very numerously attended. To prevent the destruction of the class, by continuing an individual whose very incumbency prevents the attendance of even a single pupil, the directors consider it their duty to recommend to their preses to call a meeting, in terms of the charter and by-laws, to consider whether Mr. Gibson's services shall be dispensed with ; and do so accordingly."

Accordingly, that meeting was held on the 28th August, 1835, and ended in an unanimous resolution dismissing the appellant from the institution.

Against that resolution the appellant complained by bill of suspension, and maintained that he held his office, like that of a parochial or burghal school-master, ad vitam aut culpam, and could not be removed, unless for sufficient and relevant cause duly proved against him.

The respondents contended, upon the terms of the charter and by-laws, to which the appellant and all the teachers were
 * 249 parties, and by which they had * bound themselves, that the appellant was removable at pleasure, and that the directors had the full power to dismiss him when they should judge that measure necessary.

On the 28th December, 1835, Lord BALGRAY pronounced an interlocutor, refusing the bill and recalling the interdict ; reserving, however, the right of the appellant to claim from the respondents any arrears of salary to which he might be advised that he was entitled.

The appellant then presented a second bill, which, on being advised with answers, was dismissed by Lord COCKBURN, with a note, declaring that the Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the respondents had power to terminate their connection with the suspender, and that they exercised this power regularly.

The appellant reclaimed to the Court against the above judgment, and then brought forward the objection that, according to the terms of the charter, the manner of proceeding adopted by the directors was irregular. On this objection the Lords recalled the interlocutor, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to pass the bill.

The bill was accordingly passed, and the case brought into Court in the ordinary form. It came before Lord JEFFREY as Ordinary; and his Lordship sustained the technical objections, holding the proceedings to be irregular.

The respondents, in anticipation of this result, called other meetings, and proceeded, step by step, in the most regular manner. The last of these meetings took place on the 10th of August, 1837, when the appellant was in form dismissed.

Against this sentence of dismissal the appellant again complained to the Court of Session by bill of * suspension, * 250 which came before Lord JEFFREY, as Lord Ordinary, by whom it was reported for the opinion of the Inner House; and on the 22d of December, 1837, the Lords there pronounced a judgment recalling the interdict, and sustaining the right of the directors to dismiss the master of the academy. This was the judgment now brought before the House on appeal.

The Lord Advocate (Rutherford), for the appellant. — There have been two dismissals in consequence of the resolution of 1835, which were stopped as being contrary to law. Then there was one in 1837, the objection to which is, that it was one made after an interdict. These dismissals cannot be sustained. The Court below was not unanimous in the decision in favour of the respondents. Lord JEFFREY and the Lord Justice Clerk both thought that inquiry was necessary previous to dismissal. The question is whether the directors of an institution of this kind, being a voluntary one, have a right to remove from his office a master who has been once lawfully appointed; in other words, whether such an office is for life or only during pleasure. It is clear that the office was not one held during pleasure; it is a burgh school, instituted for the benefit of the burgh. The Magistrates of Montrose v. Strahan (a) laid down the doctrine that the being admitted to a school simply, and not expressly during pleasure nor ad vitam, gives to the person admitted a right to his office for life or until fault proved against him. A similar doctrine was adopted in the case of Kempt v. The Magistrates of Irvine. (b) There it was held that where a person had been admitted to an office, * and served for several years, though originally * 251 elected for one year only, he could not afterwards be removed arbitrarily, or without just cause assigned and proved.

(b) Morr. 13136; and see the case of Hastie, Morr. 13132.

They may be considered as endowed schools. But that fact makes no difference in the case. The feeling of the law is so strong in favour of making an office to be held for life, that where the original appointment is for one year only, if the party serves for several years his office becomes held by him on a life tenure. That principle was adopted in this House in the case of the town-clerk of Annan. Then comes the case of the directors of the school of Ayr, (a) where it was distinctly held in a case of this sort that a cause of dismissal must be shown. In that case a cause of dismissal was shown, and the dismissal was therefore held to be good. The case of the directors of the Inverness school (b) is even more in point. This is not a voluntary association, but is one that exists under a charter. The trustees have, it is true, a right to dismiss the master, but they must do so on a proper ground. How can the dismissal in this case be supported, while the decisions already referred to stand unquestioned? In Mason v. Scott (c) the Court admitted the right as it was exercised here, but that was because that particular school was entirely a private school. That is not the case here, and these directors are therefore bound to show a valid necessity for the discontinuance of the teacher. The Inverness case says, "on a proper ground;" here the word "necessity" is used, but the expressions mean the same thing. The grounds of the dismissal must be stated. If the directors contend that they

* 252 may under * their by-laws dismiss the master at pleasure, their claim is contrary to the laws of Scotland, and they cannot pass any law or regulation giving to themselves such an illegal power. But supposing that they have the power to pass such a law, then it is submitted that the law passed in this case is null and void, as it was passed without the required notice; no advertisements, such as are required by the law, having been published. The interlocutor must be reversed. It ought to have passed the bill, in order that there might be a full inquiry in the Court below.

Mr. Anderson, on the same side.—The trustees here claim an arbitrary power, which it is clear the law will not concede to them.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Suppose that there had been no

charter in this case, but it had been a mere private school, could not the trustees have dismissed the master? And if so, does the mere act of incorporation make this difference in the rights of the parties?]

In a private school the dismissal might possibly take place. Such a school would be endowed by private individuals from their private funds, and they might regulate the provision they would give the master, and the conditions under which he was to receive it. But that is a thing totally different from a public school, where the public have an interest, and where they have to examine into the administration of the foundation funds. The school here is a public school. It is established for a great public purpose, and the managers and directors of it have had their powers conferred on them by the subscribers for the purpose of promoting the object of the public utility, which was the cause of the creation of the institution. If there is not this difference between strictly * private establishments and * 253 institutions of a different kind, even borough and parish schools would be made subject to the caprice of the trustees. The numerous cases on this subject have settled that that course shall not be applicable to them.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Have you any case in which the line has been drawn between those privately endowed schools which have been incorporated, and those which have not been incorporated?]

There is no case of that kind, unless the contest between the case of Mason v. Scott, and the Inverness case, can be considered as establishing that line of distinction.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question depends entirely on the terms of the charter. In that case there had been certain conditions established, by which the right to dismiss was restricted to a case where there were proper grounds.]

The principle is clear, but was not carried out in Mason v. Scott, simply because that case was one of a merely private school.

The Attorney-General and Sir W. Follett appeared for the respondents, but were not called on to argue the case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I should be inclined to take that course which would enable the parties to go on with the suit, if I thought that I could properly do so. But if your Lordships have no doubt, on the appellant's own statement, that the Court below has come to a correct conclusion, it would be an injustice to permit the parties to engage in further litigation. This case is that of an appointment to the mastership of a school, and of the right claimed by the school trustees to dismiss from that appointment. Certain individuals who had determined on establishing a school, having met together, thought it would
 * 254 be * for the advantage of the object they had a view, that they should obtain a charter of incorporation for themselves and for those who might afterwards come in their place. But the whole matter was of a private nature. Its object was to provide funds, and those were to be considered members of this voluntary body, incorporated by the Crown, who should contribute to the support of the school. It has been decided that where individuals establish a school, to be maintained from private funds, the regulations under which public schools are conducted, are not to be deemed applicable to them. A public school-master is a public officer, and as such he cannot be dismissed without an assigned and sufficient cause. But it is clear that in the case of a private trust this rule does not apply. That is a clear and well settled principle of law. Then arises another question, namely, one relating to the effect of an incorporation. I asked, in the course of the argument, whether there was any line of distinction drawn between the case of a private establishment, the members of which had been incorporated, and a case in which no such incorporation had taken place ; and I could not find that any such distinction had ever been adopted. If so, then I am sure that your Lordships would not for the first time introduce such a distinction : nothing could more disturb the arrangements of a private establishment than that a subordinate officer in it should be considered to have a fee in his office. It is incumbent on a person who claims such an advantage, to show that it properly belongs to him. Now there are many cases in which it would be highly inexpedient for the interest of a body like these trustees that a man should continue in his situation, though it might be difficult to show a legal ground for his
 * 255 removal. He may be * unsuccessful in the discharge of his duties ; he may have great abilities, but yet be unable effectually to exert them in the instruction of his pupils. This might be a great evil to an institution of this nature, and yet it might not amount to a cause which in a Court of Justice would justify the dismissal of the master. At the same time, it must be admitted that the circumstance I have mentioned would form a good ground for desiring the master's dismissal. But the same rules are not established in private as in public schools, and there is no case to show that the mere incorporation of the trustees of a private establishment subjects them to the same rules as those which affect public establishments. It is now material to refer to this charter; for your Lordships may be of opinion that it is not necessary to establish a general rule, but that the case may be determined on the words of this particular charter. What, then, are these words? The power given to these trustees is very large. They are to have a common seal, and full power to appoint their successors. So far from the charter limiting the power of the corporation, the trustees have the most unlimited discretion vested in them to make rules and regulations for the better government of the academy.

The powers given to them are therefore as ample as language can convey. It appears, too, that the appellant was aware of these powers; for there had been previously communicated to him certain minutes of the directors, of the 16th of December, 1812, and amongst others he was informed of the by-laws which they had framed for the regulation of the school.

[Here his Lordship referred to the by-laws, and to the notification of them given to the teachers on their election.]

* These were communicated to the present appellant * 256 previous to his acceptance of office. It seems to me to be immaterial, these facts being established, to inquire whether the by-laws were advertised in the papers or not, for he accepted office under the terms of the proposed law which was afterwards regularly enacted on the 30th of April. When it is found that the charter itself left the managers of this institution at liberty to make such laws as they might think fit, and when it is found that by the laws they have made they have limited the powers which the charter gave them,—that they have confined their own powers as to the discontinuance from employment of any of the teachers to cases where they may think such discontinuance necessary, which opinion of necessity is to be declared under certain circumstances and in a certain manner, — I cannot find a ground for saying that they have exceeded the limits of the authority which they lawfully possess. This act of the trustees, indeed, gives a protection to those who may happen to be appointed, who can only be discontinued on notice, and on a meeting being held to regulate the proceedings for that purpose, and if it should be found necessary: found necessary for what? Is it possible that any other persons could have a right to judge of this necessity but those who made the appointment and settled the rules under which it should be held? We cannot doubt that the law would enable them to give judgment on that. It was originally introduced for that purpose, and the observations of Lord JEFFREY apply to that matter. Remarking on the difference between the interim law of the 16th December, 1812, and that which was finally adopted on the 30th of April following, he says, “in the former it is provided that a teacher may be

 * 257 removed not only if found on inquiry by the * directors to be unworthy of trust, but also if he be unsuccessful; whereas in the latter he is only to be dealt with in case it shall be found necessary.” The language varies, but the sense is the same. It is by law part of the contract between the directors and the master, and is, in fact, a restriction on the power which the directors have a right to exercise. Under these circumstances, the teacher becomes a teacher in this academy; and at a meeting regularly convened, the directors determined, in a way into which your Lordships cannot now inquire, that the services of Mr. Gibson should be discontinued. If they had the legal right to do that, your Lordships cannot interfere with their exercise of that right. There are in the case circumstances stated which appear to be matters of hardship on the appellant; but they are only part of the narrative of the case, for there is no evidence of them laid before you. The question now simply is whether the right which the directors claimed to exercise at the regular meeting of this body, was a right which they had authority to exercise? The case does not in my mind show any ground to doubt that they had this legal authority. It is clearly established that a private society would have the right to dismiss a master, and there is no difference here between these parties and any other private society, except that these parties are incorporated. If the charter of incorporation imposes any restrictions on them, they would by the acceptance of it be considered to enter into a contract with the Crown to exercise their authority subject to those restrictions. That was the Inverness case, (a) in which it was held that the party could not be dismissed without a good reason being given for his dismissal. * The * 258 case there showed what was the reason assigned. Then in a case of that kind there must be some jurisdiction to determine whether the reasons on which they acted were valid or not. But here that is not so, for the trustees have reserved to themselves an unqualified power of judging of the necessity, and the appellant has accepted the office acquainted with and assenting to that reservation.

The cases of parish schools seem to be admitted to have no application to the present. It is said indeed that this must be considered as a public school, because it has been incorporated. But, as it seems to me, the mere fact of the incorporation by charter does not distinguish this institution from a private school. The Inverness case is the only one which is supposed to have any application to the present ; but there the charter expressly limited the powers of the persons whom it incorporated. In consequence of the restrictions there imposed, the Court of Session said that that Court must judge of the exercise of the powers of the trustees, and of the reasons given for the exercise of those powers in any particular case. No such restriction exists here, and consequently no such reason for the interference of the Court can be alleged. Though there is not any case exactly in point with the present, yet the Ayr case (b) is in some respects similar. In that case there was an incorporation, and there certain rules were laid down under which the directors were at liberty to dismiss the master. Certain rules had also been laid down with respect to his appointment. One great question in that case was, whether the master who had been secondly appointed, came into office under the same terms as those which had regulated the appointment of his predecessor ; and it was considered * that * 259 he did so. In that school the duties of the master were so far of a public nature that it was held not competent for those who had the management of the school to alter the tenure of the master's office, and to confer it only during pleasure. It was held there that cause must be shown for the dismissal, but that, independently of that, the master there came in under the conditions which had been imposed on his predecessor. According to the rule in several of these cases, the directors could not put this restriction on him, if the office was a public office. But I think it cannot be said here to be a public office. The mere fact of the incorporation of the subscribers does not give it that character. Then the case of Mason v. Scott having established that, in a private charity, the rules applicable to a public establishment should not be applied; and there being here nothing but an act of incorporation, which, in my opinion, does not make any difference in the nature of the institution; and there being no case stated to induce your Lordships to doubt that the directors had, by the constitution of this school, the right to dismiss the master, — I cannot advise you in favour of the present appeal. Three of the Judges at the time of the argument, one of them being the Lord President, thought that this bill ought to be permitted to be passed; but they did not express any decided opinion on the ultimate merits of the case. The Lord President proceeded on what had taken place before; but that does not appear to me to be a legal ground for decision. There had been considerable error in the former proceedings. The question now is, whether what was done by the trustees was rightly done. From the fact of the earlier proceedings having been founded in error, there does not appear to me any ground on which the

(b) 4 Shaw & D. 63.

* 260 Court * ought to take them into consideration. It is, therefore, unnecessary that your Lordships' time should be occupied further with this discussion, unless the respondents should ask for liberty to say something on the subject of costs. As advised at present, I should say that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed, but not with costs.

Sir W. Follett, on the part of the respondents, disclaimed any wish to address the House on the subject of costs.

The appeal was then dismissed, and the interlocutor complained of was affirmed, without costs.

ISAAC BAXTER and Others Respondents.(a)

Deeds, Execution of.

A person labouring under great defectiveness of vision, though not absolutely incapable of writing, may, if he pleases, execute a deed by the intervention of notaries, and such execution will be good under the Scotch Acts of 1540 and 1579.

March 12, 16, 19.

THIS was a summons for reduction of a trust disposition and settlement, and two codicils thereto, executed by the appellant's father in the following manner: "At the special request of the within designed John Reid, who, from a defect of sight, or dimness of vision, cannot see to read or write clearly, as he asserts, and being desirous to execute the foregoing deed in a valid form, so as to exclude challenges on the head of blindness or defect of sight; therefore we, John Drysdale and James M'Hardy, notaries-public, and conotaries in the premises, subscribe the same for him, he having, in token of his authority, touched our pens respectively, and authorized us to do so; the said deed having been previously read over and explained to the said John Reid, in presence of us and the four subscribing witnesses; and the said deed is accordingly not subscribed at all by the said John Reid, pretended granter thereof." The ground of challenge was, that the deed had not been executed in conformity with the provisions of two Scotch statutes, the first of which, passed in 1540, enacted, "That no faith be given in time coming to any obligation, bond, * or other writing, under seal, without the subscrip- * 262 tion of him that owns the same, and witnesses; or else, if the party cannot write, with the subscription of one notary thereto." The second Act, passed in 1579, upon the same subject, contained these provisions: "That all contracts, obligations, reversions, assignations and discharges of reversions, and generally all writings importing heritable title, or other bonds and obligations of great importance, to be made in time coming, shall be subscribed and sealed by the principal parties, if they can subscribe; otherwise by two famous notaries, before four famous witnesses, denominated by their special dwelling-places, or some other evident tokens that the witnesses may be known, being present at that time, otherwise the said writs to make no faith."

The appellant, who instituted the challenge, was the eldest son and heir-at-law of the testator. The defenders were the trustees nominated in the settlement.

The only ground of challenge which it is requisite to notice, was the following: "That the trust-deed and codicils brought under challenge, are in totis null and void, in respect of not being subscribed by the alleged granter; and this both at common law and under the Acts 1540, c. 117, and 1579, c. 80, and other relative statutes."

The appellant contended, in substance, that the testator, though labouring under a state substantially of total blindness, and having called in the assistance of notaries, from a desire "to execute the foregoing deed in a valid form, so as to exclude challenges on the head of blindness or defect of sight," was yet not legally entitled, either at common or statute law, to execute his
 * 263 deeds through the medium of notaries, * but was bound to adhibit his subscription thereto with his own hand; and consequently, that the writings under challenge, not being so subscribed with his own hand, were null and void. The amount of physical ability possessed by the testator to execute the deed was at first made the subject of discussion, but the parties subsequently agreed to take the judgment of the Court upon the statement of facts set forth in the following joint minute:—

"The parties to this cause having, since the record was made up, informed themselves more accurately on the matters in dispute, and being desirous of avoiding the necessity of a jury trial, agree to hold the following as the admitted facts of the case, with reference to plea in point of law, touching the validity of the execution of the deeds under reduction:

"1. That the late John Reid, at the dates of the deed and codicils in question, could subscribe his name, and was in the practice of subscribing it to writings requiring his signature.

"2. That the said John Reid was, at the dates aforesaid, not totally blind, but that his sight was so defective that he could not read any written document, nor decipher the signature attached to it; although able, at the time of his own subscription, to infer, from general appearances, that he had affixed it, but not, by his mere vision, to decipher the same afterwards."

The Court, by an interlocutor pronounced on the 13th of December, 1837, repelled the reasons of reduction, in so far as founded on the deeds having been executed by means of notaries, and not by the subscription of John Reid, the maker; and to the same extent sustained the defences, and decreed, &c.

The appeal was against that interlocutor.

* The Lord Advocate, for the appellant. — The testator * 264 was not entitled to execute this deed by notaries, but ought to have signed it with his own hand. If a man can subscribe his name, if he has the bare capacity of writing, he must execute a deed of this sort by his own subscription. That is the rule of law, and a deed not executed according to that rule is void. The execution by notaries is only permitted to persons who cannot subscribe their names. That is the first objection; the second is, that this is a notarial document, and if the party executing it was in such a state as to entitle him to have recourse to the assistance of notaries, the instrument itself ought to set out that fact in a clear and intelligible manner. It does no such thing, but merely states that Reid, not being able to read or write clearly, has had recourse to notarial assistance. The decision of this House in Duff v. Lord Fife, (a) shows that this mode of execution, under circumstances like the present, is contrary to law.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — I do not know what is meant by the words, in this statement, that he was "able to infer from general appearances."]

Those words are used because there have been some cases in which the party has gone through the manual operation of marking the letters of his name, and yet no effect of writing has been thereby produced. In Tait on Evidence, (b) it is stated as the clear rule of law that a party possessing the ability to execute a deed with his own hand, must so execute it. It is now a settled point that writing is a necessary solemnity, and that the admission of the party of his intention to execute cannot supply the want of the proper solemnities. If the statutes require, * as they do here, a particular act to be performed in reference to the execution of a deed, and that act is not performed, it is not sufficient to say that the subscription is really the genuine result of the party's intention. Erskine is an authority on this point; (a) Duff v. Lord Fife, which is twice reported, fully bears out that proposition.

(a) 1 Sh. 498; 2 Wils. & S. 166.
VOL. VII.

(b) 2 Edit. p. 119.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — Is it part of the appellant's proposition that a blind man cannot execute by notaries? There does not seem to me to be any thing in Lord Fife's Case going to that extent. That case only seems to decide that a blind man may, but not that he must, execute by his own signature.]

It cannot be shown that the statute allows a double mode of execution. If so, then the case of Duff v. Lord Fife establishes that the signature by the party himself, he being able to write, is the only lawful mode of execution of a deed. The statute divides all persons executing deeds into two classes, those who can and those who cannot subscribe; and the appellant submits that if the man can execute by writing, he must do so. The words of the statute exactly express this meaning. Veitch v. Horsburgh (b) will be cited to show that if a party represents that he cannot write, his execution by notaries will be valid; but it is clear that a case referring so much to the will or the caprice of the party himself cannot be maintained. In order to support the doctrine contended for by the other side, the argument must go the length of asserting that if a party is able to write and can see completely, he may still avail himself of the option of executing the deeds by notaries. Such an argument is too absurd to be put forward; and yet, without adopting it, the direction of the Court below cannot be supported.

* 266 * Sir W. Follett, on the same side. — This is not a question between a person who has executed a deed, and another person who seeks to enforce the execution of it. It is a contest between a person claiming under the deed, and the heir whose interests are affected by it. That makes a difference in the principle of construction to be applied to the statute. A party who has executed a deed by notaries, on the faith of his own statement that he cannot write, certainly cannot be allowed for his own benefit to contradict the statement he has previously made. But that reason does not apply to an heir who comes in to reduce a deed irregularly executed, and the law must be construed in his favour. The appellant here submits two propositions: first, that the deed is not properly subscribed by a person who was capable of subscribing, and that the subscription of a party who is capable of subscribing a deed is essential to its validity; and, secondly, that if a party executing a deed is, by way of exception to the general provisions of the statute, entitled to give authority to notaries to execute the deed for him, there should appear on the face of the document itself the facts which brought it within the exceptions in the statutes. Neither of the things thus required to be done has been done here. There needs not be any reference made to the English law, for a deed executed like this would be totally void here. Before these statutes, the law was the same in both countries. The only ground of exception to the rule requiring a man to execute a deed by his own subscription, is that he cannot write. Here the party could write and did write long letters. There was, therefore, nothing to bring him within the exception of the statutes.

(a) Ersk. bk. iii. tit. 2, § 7.

In Bell's Lectures (a) there are many * statements on * 267 this point which show the construction that these statutes have always received among the the profession in Scotland; and his opinions are borne out by the cases of Ogilvie v. Dinn, (b) and of Falconer v. Arbuthnot. (c) From the consideration of all the authorities, it appears that the law may now be considered to be settled to this effect, that even where a party is not able to read writing but is able to sign his own name, the proper mode of execution is by his own signature, and not by the aid of notaries. That rule has not been complied with here, and the execution of the deed is therefore void. But even supposing that the party was in circumstances which entitled him to execute by notaries, then the statement of his inability, according to the terms of the statute, ought to have been made on the face of the deed. Mackenzie v. Burnet. (d) That has not been done here, the statement being merely that he "cannot see to read writing clearly;" a statement which does not in any way satisfy the requisitions of the statute.

Mr. Pemberton, for the respondent. — The first objection to the execution of this deed is, that the formalities alleged to be required by the statutes have not been complied with. It is clear that the object of the statutes was to prevent fraud; and that, under such circumstances as exist in this case, the execution by notaries was best calculated to secure that object. A person not able to read writing clearly, might have a deed presented to him of a nature totally different from that which he intended to sign, and might thus be made to put his signature to a forgery.

This could be effected much more easily by one person
 * 268 getting * the half blind man to sign a deed, than by two notaries being called in to execute the deed in the presence of four witnesses. What does the statute say? That if a man can write he shall sign his name, or that the deed shall be void. That provision is merely directory. Now, where a statute has said that a deed should be signed with the Christian and surname of the parties, a deed signed only with the initials of the party who was shown to be accustomed so to subscribe his name has been held sufficient, because the provision was construed as merely directory. Piery v. Ramsay. (a) And in Houston v. Houston, (b) a bond so subscribed by a party then resident in Ireland was held good, without the pursuer being put to prove that the granter was accustomed to subscribe in that manner. Grierson v. Grierson, (c) Brown v. Johnston, (d) Galloway v. Thomson, (e) and Ker v. Gibson, (g) all show that where it is proved that a party has been accustomed to subscribe by initials, such subscription, being duly attested, shall be deemed sufficient. Casamajor v. Strode (h) was a case of a similar sort. There an Inclosure Act provided that certain oaths should be taken, and other things done, by the commissioners, and the whole authority of the commissioners depended on their having complied with these solemnities: yet, though these solemnities had not been observed, the proceedings of the commissioners were held not to be void, because the provisions of the statute were merely directory. In like manner, the acts of the revising barristers under the Reform Act have not been questioned merely on the statute had not said that the proceedings should be null and void. It is not necessary, in order to justify a subscription of this sort, that it should be physically impossible for a man to subscribe his name ; it is sufficient if he cannot subscribe his name in the usual manner. The case of Duff v. Lord Fife (a) does not decide the question now before the House. That case merely decided that a man who was under personal disability to a certain extent, might still, if he pleased, execute the deed with his own hand ; but it did not decide that he was necessarily compelled to adopt that mode of execution, or that the deed would be void if executed in a different manner.
 * 269 account of the omission of certain * formalities which the statute had directed to be observed, but without which

Mr. Anderson, on the same side. — There is nothing in the summons which gives rise to the objection now made as to the execution and attestation. The first exception only is available to the appellant: that objection is not sustainable in law. There is a distinction in the language of the two statutes: the one says, inability to write ; the other, inability to subscribe. The second implies more than a mere capacity to make with a pen the marks which would form the letters of a man's name. But even if the statute required these formalities, the omission of them would not make the deed void, for the statute is merely directory. The distinction between a directory and a mandatory statute is taken by the Lord Chancellor in Maxwell's Case, (b) where he says, "unless a statute is imperative, and provides expressly or by plain implication for the invalidity of an instrument * if * 270 the requisites be not complied with, it is merely directory, and one of the propositions in law the best known and most commonly cited is, that a directory order in a statute need not be complied with." The argument on the other side goes to this length, that a man absolutely blind, if he can put his pen to paper, must subscribe his own name, and cannot execute an instrument by notaries. Such a practice would open a door to the most extensive frauds, and thus defeat the very object of the statute, which desired in a case of that kind to protect a person labouring under a strong degree of disability, by surrounding him with witnesses whose presence should secure the honest execution of the deeds by which he disposed of his property.

The Lord Advocate replied. — The argument for the respondent has not established that a man who is capable of writing, has an option to execute a deed by his own signature or by that of notaries. The words of the statute are positive, "if a man cannot write;" they are not, "if a man cannot clearly see to read writing." Yet the latter is the meaning attempted to be affixed to the provisions of the statute. To give it that meaning would be entirely to change its provisions.

March 19.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, this is a question which, by an agreement entered into between these parties, is reduced to a very short point, depending upon circumstances which have been agreed to, and which formed the ground for the judgment in the Court below. The facts are stated very fully in the printed papers, the object of the suit being to raise the * 271 question as to the validity of an instrument executed * by John Reid. The circumstances under which the deed was executed, and the state of John Reid at the time of executing the deed, are to be found in the admissions which I will now read to your Lordships: — "1. That the late John Reid, at the dates of the deed and codicils in question, could subscribe his name, and was in the practice of subscribing it to writings requiring his signature. 2. That the said John Reid was at the dates aforesaid not totally blind, but that his sight was so defective that he could not read any written document, nor decipher the signature attached to it, although able at the time of his own subscription to infer, from general appearances, that he had affixed it, but not by his mere vision to decipher the same afterwards." These facts are important from the provisions of two Scotch Acts, which are respectively of the dates of 1540 and 1579. The first provides, "That na faith be given in time cumming to ony obligation, bond, or uther writing under ane seale, without the subscription of him that owe the same and witnesse, or else, gif the partie cannot write, with the subscription of ane notary thereto." The second Act is nearly similar in terms, with, however, one difference. The second enacts, "That all contractis, obligationes, reversionis, assignationis, and discharges of reversionis, or eiks thereto, and generallie all writtes importing heritabill titill, or utheris bondes and obligationes of great importance to be made in time cumming, sall be subscribed and sealled be the principal parties, gif they can subscribe." In the second Act the words "cannot write," which are to be found in the first, are changed for “cannot subscribe;” and the provision in the second Act is, “uthewise be twa famous notars, befoir four famous witnesses denominat be their speciall dwelling-places or sum uther evident * tokens that the witnesses may be knawen, being * 272 present at that time; uthewise the saidis writs to mak na faith.”

It was observed, and very justly observed, that this part of the Act which declares that documents not actually subscribed shall have no validity unless one or other of those forms required for the execution of the instrument have been complied with, is not absolutely compulsory. The question is, whether under that act the instrument in question, which was subscribed, not by the party himself, but was subscribed by notaries so provided for by the Act of Parliament, is to be invalid or not, in consequence of not having been subscribed by the party himself. The proposition on the one side was that it was valid, and on the other it was said that that proposition was capable of being urged to consequences which were not a little startling. It was said that if that mode of subscribing be permitted, it would be impossible, at almost any time or under any circumstances, to object to an instrument because it was executed before notaries; the argument being, that if the party was capable of subscribing, he might still be entitled, at his own will, to execute the instrument by notaries; and then it would happen that any person, however competent, might be entitled to adopt this form of execution. But your Lordships will observe what argument may be raised on the other hand; it may be said that the proposition contended for would lead to this conclusion, that a party absolutely blind must still execute the document by himself; for though he was not capable of seeing, if he was capable of writing (as all persons who have ever been capable of writing before they are blind, must be capable of doing so to a certain extent after they become blind) he would still be bound to execute the instrument by himself. * It is quite obvious that this would open a door * 273 to great fraud; for if he was obliged to execute an instrument by himself, under such circumstances, it would by no means follow that he was subscribing the document which he intended to subscribe; another might be put before him, and he would be quite incapable of knowing whether the document to which he did subscribe his name was the document he intended, or was another fraudulently imposed upon him.

In the short view I propose to take of the authorities it will not be necessary to consider what may be the rule in cases other than that which is identically before your Lordships at this moment, and I shall therefore avoid doing so ; the more especially as I believe it a dangerous practice at all times to go into the consideration of what would be the rule in other cases, unless you are compelled to do so. We have here the fact admitted that the party, though able to write and subscribe his name, was not able to read writing afterwards ; that his sight was so defective that he could only know from the general appearance of the paper that he had subscribed a document.

It appears, my Lords, that these are statutes of ancient date ; and if any real doubt exists as to the construction of them, it is well that we should look to the construction which has been put upon them from the time when they were first passed, and to the habit which has grown up as the consequence of such construction. It will be desirable to consider those circumstances before your Lordships decide upon the case ; for if you laid down a rule of law different from that which has been in ordinary operation for a long period, you might by such a judgment invalidate the titles of property, and interfere materially with the interests of those who are concerned with property in * Scotland. My Lords, on the construction of the statutes the authorities seem to me to have been most reasonable. I should have thought that there was no great difficulty in the case, if this question had arisen for the first time ; if we had had to put a construction for the first time upon those statutes, without any previous decisions having existed. It appears to me a strong proposition to say that, on the meaning of the statutes, a party may be said to be capable of subscribing his name when he is not capable of reading the document which he has so to subscribe, or the name when he has subscribed it. But we need not necessarily discuss what might be the meaning if the question was entirely new, for from the earliest period your Lordships will find that the construction put by the Courts of Scotland has been, that a party under circumstances similar to those which now exist, has at all events been considered as at liberty to use the interposition of notaries.

My Lords, before adverting to those authorities, the question may be naturally asked what authorities there are to be found in support of the proposition of the appellant ; what decisions there are in the Scotch law to show that a person not capable from want of sight of reading a document, is yet to be the person who must subscribe it, and is not to be at liberty to avail himself of the assistance of notaries. There is not one case in favour of any such proposition. On the other hand, there is a variety of cases, in some of which it has been decided and in others it has been assumed that where a party could not read he was at liberty to avail himself of the interposition of notaries: Crosbie v. Picken, in 1749, (a) Falconer v. Arbuthnot, in 1751, (b) and Ross v. Aglianby, in 1792, (c) * all decided directly or they all * 275 indirectly assumed such to be the rule of law in Scotland.

The case of Craig v. Collison, in 1610, (d) Ogilvie v. Din, in 1612, (e) of Veitch v. Horsburgh, in 1637, (g) and of Littlejohn v. Hepburn, 1608, (h) and Thomson v. Shiel, in 1729, (i) are not directly decided on the same point, but they all seem to me to support the same proposition.

But then, my Lords, it is said that these cases do not apply, for that the question in all of them was raised with regard to the person who had himself subscribed the document, and who, to avoid the consequences of his own act, had set up the defective execution in answer. It is true that the party in all of those cases was in that situation, but in all those cases this defence was overruled. An attempt was therefore made to exclude those cases from your Lordships' consideration, on the ground that in all of them it was the personal objection of the party himself to the deed being enforced against him, and he must be looked at as an individual endeavouring to defeat the consequences of his own act by a technical objection. But how was the Court competent to know what was the conduct of the party, without, in the first instance, receiving the document in evidence? If the document was required in law to be in writing, the Court was obliged to receive it in evidence in order to know whether it was or not a valid deed, and such it must be before the party need try to evade the consequences of his own act. The party was obliged to have some form of executing an instrument.

Then it is said, on the other hand, he is not at liberty * to * 276 deny the instrument which he has executed. If he is at liberty to deny the execution of an instrument, he may plead non est factum; he is at liberty to plead that, and to show that he has not executed the instrument according to the forms required by law. I do not think, therefore, that it can be considered that this class of cases is immediately applicable to the present subject. We return, then, to the question of the mode of execution of the instrument.

My Lords, there is a case in the year 1681, Coutts v. Straiton, (a) which seems to me to be of more weight than those relied on by the appellant. It appears that that was a case in which the question before the Court was whether a party was at liberty to sign a document with initials, whether a signature so affixed was sufficient, and it was stated that the party in question was so far blind as not to be capable of reading the writing. The Court held that that was a good instrument. That, my Lords, was in the year 1681. Some of the cases I have referred to are cases of an antecedent and some of a subsequent date; so that there are concurrent decisions for a long series of years, showing that a party might properly execute an instrument either in initials subscribed by himself, or with his own name subscribed by the intervention of notaries.

Those cases, my Lords, do not appear to have been brought under the consideration of the Court, or to have been attended to by the Judges, when the case of Duff v. Lord Fife arose. That case came before the Court of Session upon proof that Lord Fife was nearly in a state of blindness, and there the Court of Session held that the deeds executed by him were not
 * 277 * well executed, though he had subscribed his own name thereto, because he was in the state I have mentioned, and that he ought, therefore, to have had the intervention of notaries; and this House reversed the judgment of the Court of Session, and held that if he could so sign the instrument it might be good, notwithstanding his state of blindness. My Lords, the only ground by which the appellant has attempted to support his case rests on the decision of the case of Lord Fife in this House. It was with a view of considering whether that decision was inconsistent with the others which had preceded it, and whether it necessarily rendered the subscription of the deed in the present case bad, that I suggested to your Lordships the propriety of adjourning the consideration of the present case. I have since gone through all the cases, I have examined all that was said in the case of Lord Fife, both by Lord ELDON and by Lord REDESDALE. The only point I considered was, whether by that case it is settled that the party is bound to execute by his own subscription under circumstances like the present ; and, my Lords, I do not think that there is any thing in that case which says that a person under those circumstances is not at liberty to resort to this mode of notarial execution. There could not be any such point in that case ; for the decision that under such circumstances as there existed he may execute a deed by himself, does not necessarily involve the other decision, that he is not at liberty to resort to the intervention of notaries.

My Lords, it appears then that for two hundred years there is no direct authority for the proposition now contended for by the appellant, but, on the contrary, a series of decisions the other way. In Coutts v. Straiton, in 1681, the construction put upon this statute was, that a person with a degree of want of * sight such as exists here, was at liberty at all events to * 278 execute by the intervention of notaries ; and against that decision nothing has been relied on, on the other side, but the supposed opinion of this House in Lord Fife's Case, which did not decide this point, but decided in a manner quite consistent with the allowance of this mode of execution.

My Lords, a variety of evils might arise from your Lordships now laying down a rule not consistent with the former decisions. A mass of property would be affected by it ; a matter which would deserve very serious consideration, even if there was more in the case of the appellant than I think there is. On the other hand, it does not seem to me that any difficulties will arise from the adoption of the course which I shall recommend to your Lordships. I have therefore come to the conclusion which I shall now state to your Lordships : that the form of execution adopted under these circumstances is good ; that the party may under these circumstances, if he pleases, execute the deed by his own signature ; but that he is also at liberty to resort to the assistance of notaries. As the decision now appealed from was unanimously adopted in the Court below, I shall move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed, and that it be affirmed, with costs.

 Legality.*

By indenture made in 1827 between R. P. and his eldest son, D. P., reciting that R. P. P. of C. was seised of large real estates, was never married, and was then in a state of mental and bodily imbecility; that in the event of his dying so seised, intestate, and without issue, R. P. as his heir-at-law would be entitled to the reversion of his estates in fee; that R. P. was desirous of having a commission of lunacy sued out for the protection of R. P. P. and his property and of his own reversion, and that D. P., at R. P.'s request, agreed to sue out and prosecute such commission and take other necessary law proceedings at his own expense, in R. P.'s name; R. P., in consideration of the agreement and of love and affection for D. P., covenanted to convey all the estates that would descend to him on the decease of R. P. P. to the use of himself for life, remainder to the uses expressed respecting the estate of R. in D. P.'s marriage settlement, being for the benefit of D. P. and the heirs male of the marriage. The commission was accordingly issued; R. P. P. was declared a lunatic, and D. P. was reimbursed for his expenses out of his estate. R. P. was then sixty-three years of age; the lunatic was forty; D. P. was younger. The lunatic died in 1829, and R. P. entered into possession of his real estates, and conveyed them to his second son, R. H. P., for valuable consideration. On a bill filed by D. P. to set aside that conveyance and for specific performance of the covenant, R. P., by his answer, said he entered into it without legal advice, and by fraud, imposition, and misrepresentation on the part of D. P. It was proved in evidence that both parties employed the solicitor who prepared the indenture under advice of counsel for each; that R. P. read it and heard it read before executing it, and afterwards as well as before expressed his desire that the estate of C. should be united to the estate of R. and go to his eldest son.

Held, by the Lords (reversing a decree which dismissed the bill), that R. P. tendered a false defence, and that all the matters put in issue by his answer were disproved by the evidence.

A party after failing in the defence set up by his answer, is not to be permitted to try another defence depending on matters not put in issue by the answer, and which, therefore, his adversary had no opportunity of disproving.²

February 13, 17, 18, 20. May 7.

By an indenture dated the 30th of October, 1799, certain lands in the counties of Galway and Roscommon, herein after called the Roxborough estate, and worth about 4500*l.* a year, were limited to the use of the respondent, Robert Persse, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male. He had issue the appellant, Dudley Persse, his eldest son ; the respondent, Robert Henry Persse, his second son ; and another son and four daughters.

By another indenture, dated the 1st of May, 1823, and made between the said Robert and Dudley Persse of the first and second parts, and other parties of the third and fourth parts, the said settled estates were conveyed to the use of Dudley, his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to an annuity of 800*l.* thereby made payable thereout to Robert, the father, during his life, by quarterly payments, and subject also to a sum of 6000*l.* for the younger children, and to certain debts and incumbrances amounting to about 17,500*l.* ; and it was thereby provided that in the event of the decease or preferment in marriage of any of the six younger children, the said annuity should be reduced by the sum of 60*l.*
 yearly for each such younger child dying or marrying, but not be reduced to less than 500*l.* a year. In the events that happened the annuity had been, previously to the year 1827, reduced to the

ber, 1826, being the settlement executed on the marriage of the appellant with Catherine O'Grady, daughter of the then Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, the several estates comprised in the deed of 1823, subject to the said annuity, were settled to the use of the appellant for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the marriage successively in tail male, with remainder to the appellant in fee.

In the year 1827 the respondent, who was then about the age of sixty-five, was the heir-presumptive of his cousin, Robert Parsons Persse, who was about the age of forty, unmarried, and considered to be a person of unsound mind. The appellant would be his heir-presumptive in the event of their surviving the respondent. R. P. Persse was at the time seised of real estates, called the Castleboy estate, of the value of 2500*l.* a year, and possessed of personal property to the amount of 25,000*l.* The appellant and his solicitor, Mr. Charles O'Connor, who had also sometimes been solicitor to the respondent, suggested to him the expediency of issuing a commission of lunacy against R. P. Persse. The respondent came to Dublin for the purpose of taking the necessary proceedings, and there executed the following deed, which is the subject of the suit in which this appeal originated.

By an indenture made on the 8th of December, 1827, between the respondent and the appellant,—after reciting that Robert Parsons Persse, of Castleboy, in the county of Galway, esquire, was then seised in fee of the lands, hereditaments, and premises in the indenture particularly described, and that in the * 282 event of his dying so seised, intestate and without * issue, the respondent, as his cousin and heir-at-law, would be entitled to the remainder or reversion in fee-simple of the said lands, hereditaments, and premises expectant upon his decease; and that the said R. P. Persse had never married, and was then, and had been for several months, in a state of mental and bodily imbecility, and that it would be necessary for the protection of his person and property to sue out a commission of lunacy against him, and to institute other law proceedings, and that for such purposes expenses would be incurred, and advances of money should be made; and that the respondent was anxious that such proceedings should be instituted for the purposes aforesaid, and for the purpose of protecting his own rights to the reversion in fee as heir-at-law; and that the appellant had agreed to sue out such commission, and to institute such other law proceedings as should thereafter become necessary for any of the aforesaid purposes, in the name of the respondent, and at his own expenses and charges; and further reciting that the respondent, in consideration of such agreement, and of the natural love and affection which he bore for the appellant, had agreed that his expectancy of and in the said lands, hereditaments, and premises, and the same when they should descend to him on the decease of the said R. P. Persse, should be limited to the use of the respondent and his assigns for life, and from and after his decease to the uses therein after mentioned, — it was witnessed that, in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the natural love and affection which the respondent bore to the appellant, and in further consideration of the sum of 10s., the respondent did for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenant and agree to and with the appellant, his heirs and assigns, * that from the * 283 decease of the said R. P. Persse, all the lands of Castleboy (then followed several other denominations), and all other the real and freehold estates of which the said R. P. Persse was seised, and which on his death should descend to the respondent, should be and remain vested in him from the decease of the said R. P. Persse, to his own use for his life, and from and after the determination of that estate, then to the use that the same should be so settled and conveyed as that they should be and remain for and upon the several uses, &c., and subject to such provisos, &c., as were expressed of and concerning the lands of Roxborough, by the herein before in part recited indenture of the 11th of November, 1826. And the respondent, for himself, his heirs, &c., covenanted with the appellant, his heirs, &c., that all the said hereditaments and premises agreed to be sold as aforesaid, with their appurtenances, should at all times remain and continue for the said purposes declared in the said indenture concerning the same, without any hindrance or claim from the respondent or any persons claiming through him.

This deed had been prepared by Mr. O'Connor in pursuance of instructions received at his house in Dublin from the respondent and appellant. Mr. O'Connor had two drafts made, which he laid before different counsel on behalf of the two parties respectively. Two engrossments were afterwards made conformably to the draft, as amended by the counsel, and both were executed by the respondent and appellant at the house of the Lord Chief Baron, the corrected draft having been previously read aloud to them by Mr. O'Connor. The respondent, after executing the deed, handed his part to the Lord Chief * Baron, * 284 and told him not to part with it without personal application. (a)

In March, 1828, a commission de lunatico inquirendo was issued in the name of the respondent against R. P. Persse, and after a long inquiry it was found that he was of unsound mind from the 17th of November, 1826, with lucid intervals. The lunatic died in October, 1829, intestate, and his real estates descended to the respondent, who soon after the lunatic's death entered into possession of the Castleboy estate, ploughed up part of the meadow land, and cut a large quantity of timber. (a)

By an indenture, dated the 9th of June, 1830, and made between the said respondent, of the first part, the Earl of Rosse, of the second part, and the respondent Robert Henry Persse, second son of the respondent Robert Persse, of the third part, after reciting that Robert Persse was seised in fee-simple in possession of the said estate, and had sufficiently provided for his eldest son by the deed of May, 1823, and was desirous to settle the remainder in fee of this estate on his second son R. H. Persse, and that he agreed to purchase the same, it was witnessed, that, in pursuance of such agreement, and in consideration of 16,000*l.* secured to the respondent Robert, as in the indenture mentioned, he granted, sold, and released unto the Earl of Rosse all the lands of Castleboy, &c., and all other estates of inheritance which descended to him as heir-at-law of the said lunatic, upon trust, to the use of the said respondent, for life, and after his decease for the use of the other respondent, R. H. Persse, his heirs and assigns, for ever.

* 285 * The appellant's first wife, Catherine O'Grady, having died in 1829, leaving a son and two daughters, the issue of the marriage, the appellant intermarried in July, 1833, with Frances Barry, and by the indenture of settlement made in contemplation of that marriage, he, in consideration of her marriage portion, conveyed the reversion in fee, expectant on the determination of the estate in tail male, limited to the first and other sons of his marriage with his first wife by the settlement of November, 1826, in the Roxborough estate, to trustees, to the uses therein declared; remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the marriage with Frances Barry, &c.; and the appellant thereby covenanted that when he should come into possession of the Castleboy estate, by virtue of the said indenture of the 8th of December, 1827, he would assure the reversion in fee of that estate to the same uses and trusts as were in this indenture expressed concerning his reversion in fee in the Roxborough estate. All the parties to this indenture had notice of the indenture of 1830 between the respondents.

In June, 1835, the appellant and his wife, and the children, the issue of the two marriages, filed their bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the respondents, Robert Persse and Robert Henry Persse, and the Earl of Rosse, and several other defendants who had been named trustees in the various indentures before mentioned; and the bill, after stating, among other things, the said indentures of November, 1826, and December, 1827, charged that the latter deed was deliberately executed by the respondent, and that he derived great personal benefit from the prevention of fraud and imposition on R. P. Persse by the establishing of his lunacy, which the respondent * was un- * 286 able to do without the aid of the appellant; and that he was heard to declare that he intended the Castleboy estate to go to the male issue, with the Roxborough estate, and that Mr. O'Connor was mutually employed by them both in preparing the said deed, and that the respondent had also the advice of counsel; and the bill, after stating the said indenture of June, 1830, charged that the same was voluntary, without consideration, and with notice on the part of the respondent, R. H. Persse, of the deed of December, 1827. The bill prayed that the said indenture of the 9th of June, 1830, might be declared fraudulent and void, and that the respondents, R. Persse and R. H. Persse, and the Earl of Rosse, might, in pursuance of the covenant of R. Persse, in the indenture of the 8th of December, 1827, be compelled by the decree of the Court to convey the Castleboy estate to and for the several uses and trusts specified and mentioned in the said settlements of the 11th of November, 1826, and 15th of July, 1833, so far as the same were then capable of being effectuated; and that it might be referred to the Master to prepare a proper deed of conveyance for those purposes, and that the respondents, R. Persse and R. H. Persse, might be restrained, by injunction, from cutting down any timber or other trees upon the said premises of Castleboy, or from burning any of the land, or committing any other waste on the said estate; and that an account might be taken of the waste committed by them, and the value thereof ascertained, and paid into Court.

respondent, Robert Persse, after stating, among other things, the said deed of 1823, and that he thereby gave up his life interest in the Roxborough estate, worth 4500*l.* a year, for an
 * 287 annuity of 500*l.*, *in consequence of the persuasions of the appellant and the pressure of creditors urged on by him ; and that the appellant allowed the said annuity, which was the only means of subsistence the respondent had for himself and family, to fall greatly in arrear, with a view of taking advantage of respondent's distress to effectuate the appellant's purpose of getting possession of the Castleboy estate ; and that in furtherance of that plan, the appellant induced this respondent to come to Dublin and reside there at the house of the appellant's father-in-law, Lord Chief Baron O'Grady, who, together with the appellant, persuaded this respondent to issue the commission of lunacy and to execute the deed of December, 1827 ; and that that deed was prepared by the appellant's solicitor, and executed by this respondent without being aware of its nature or effect ; and he knew nothing of its contents, as the Lord Chief Baron had refused to give him the counterpart, but he had supposed that its object was to secure to the appellant the expenses of the commission against R. P. Persse, until, on examining the memorial of it at the registry office, he found that it contained a covenant to convey the Castleboy estate ; and he was induced to execute the same by the fraudulent contrivance, imposition, and misrepresentation of the appellant, and without having received any valuable consideration for the same ; and he denied that O'Connor, who prepared the said deed, was then or on any previous occasion his solicitor, and he denied that he had any communication with any other professional adviser while in Dublin, or that he ever declared it to be his object to settle the Castleboy estate with the Roxborough estate, nor was it his desire to increase the provision made for the appellant, as respon-
 * 288 dent's younger sons were comparatively unprovided * for.

And the respondent, by his said answer, stated that the appellant or Mr. O'Connor did not apprise him that the expenses of the commission would be defrayed out of the lunatic's estate, nor that it was competent for the appellant himself to sue out the commission in his own name ; and the respondent submitted that the said deed, having been obtained from him under such circumstances, ought to be declared fraudulent and void ; and even if the same had been fairly obtained, the covenant therein to settle the said estates, being a voluntary agreement as to an estate in expectancy, entered into unadvisedly and without valuable consideration, could not be enforced against this respondent; and he admitted the execution of the said deeds of 1830 and 1833, and insisted that the latter was executed with full knowledge, by all the parties thereto, of the deed of 1830.

The respondent, R. H. Persse, by his answer, repeated, on his belief, most of the statements in his father's answer; and in conclusion he submitted that he was a purchaser of the Castleboy estate for valuable consideration, and that the purchase-money was settled for the benefit of his father's younger children.

The bill was amended in November, 1835, by adding as plaintiff another child of the appellant and his said wife, Frances Barry, born since the bill was filed; and as amended, it stated, among other things, that the respondent's annuity of 500*l.* was never in arrear above 30*l.*, or little more than one-half year's payment, up to the time of the execution of the deed of December, 1827; and stated several occasions, between 1818 and 1830, on which Mr. O'Connor had been the solicitor of the respondent; and it charged that O'Connor, at the time of receiving instructions * for the said deed, and Mr. Waller O'Grady, * 289 barrister, and son of the Lord Chief Baron, on a subsequent occasion, asked the respondent, Robert Persse, whether he wished any provision to be made in said deed for his younger children, and that respondent replied he did not think that necessary, inasmuch as in the event of getting the Castleboy estate during his life, he hoped to be able to make competent provision for them out of the savings of his income; and the amended bill also charged that the respondent, after executing the counterpart of the said deed at the house of the Lord Chief Baron, in the manner in the bill mentioned, handed the same to the Lord Chief Baron, and desired him not to part with it without personal application from himself; and that if he afterwards made application for the same, it was by letter not written nor signed by himself, nor in any way authenticated by him.

The respondent, Robert Persse, by his answer to the amended bill, admitted that in November, 1827, previous to the execution of the deed, not more than 30*l.* of the annuity was then due, but in 1826 the arrears exceeded 800*l.*; and he denied that Charles O'Connor had been employed by him as his solicitor in the lunacy business, or in any other business, on any occasion whatsoever, to the best of his recollection, although he might have been employed by a relation of his in carrying on some law business in the respondent's name; and he denied that he had any conversation, as in the bill alleged, either with O'Connor or Waller O'Grady, as to making provision in the deed for his younger children. He admitted that he executed the deed, but he did so without the advice of counsel or solicitor, and without having the deed read, as far as he was able to recollect

* 290 what * passed at the time; and he admitted that in giving the counterpart of the deed to the Chief Baron, he desired him not to part with it without application from him, and said he had frequently applied for the same by letter and by his solicitor, but the Chief Baron withheld it.

Witnesses were examined on both sides, and a great number of documents and accounts were put in evidence in the cause.

The witnesses for the appellant deposed to the following effect:—

Mr. Charles O'Connor, of Dublin, solicitor, said he had done some law business for the respondent or for his land agent, from 1817 to 1820. In November, 1827, he suggested to the appellant, at his house at Roxborough, the necessity of issuing a commission of lunacy against Robert Parsons Persse; and after a conversation with him on the subject, witness waited on the respondent at his house at Newcastle, and after talking on the subject with him, told him that the appellant would pay the expenses if he (the respondent) would allow his name to be used. The respondent said he would go to the appellant to Roxborough, to consult with him. Both parties came together to witness's house in Dublin, on the 3d of December following, and witness took instructions from the respondent for the deed (of the 8th December, 1827), which respondent desired to be prepared with expedition. Witness asked him if he wished any provision to be inserted for his younger children, to which the respondent replied, that in the event of his getting the Castleboy estate for his life, he would be enabled to save from the income thereof what would be a competency for the younger children. Witness prepared a draft of the deed, and laid it before * 291 Mr. Waller O'Grady for his perusal and amendment, on behalf of the appellant, and subsequently laid the same draft as amended before Mr. Blackburne, on behalf of the respondent, and told the respondent that he had done so. Witness and a Mr. Nolan were the subscribing witnesses to the deed, which was executed on the day of its date, at the house of the Lord Chief Baron O'Grady, in Dublin, in the presence of the witnesses and Messrs. Waller and Richard O'Grady, sons of the Chief Baron, in this manner: this witness read aloud the corrected draft, while the respondent and appellant each held and perused a part of the deed; it was in two parts. After the whole had been read, the parties then executed both parts. The Lord Chief Baron was not then present, but he came into the room before and after the execution of the deed.

Mr. Nolan, the other subscribing witness to the deed, gave a similar account of its execution.

Mr. Waller O'Grady said he was present at several conversations with the respondent in the end of November and beginning of December, 1827, respecting the conveyance of the Castleboy estate, and heard the respondent say more than once that he was desirous that that estate should be reannexed to the Roxborough estate, and that it was a great oversight in his family to have separated them. He said he was not in a condition to prosecute the commission against Parsons Persse, but he had arranged with his son Dudley to incur the expense, and he wished Mr. O'Connor to take his instructions for the purpose, and he went to Mr. O'Connor's house for that purpose. This witness, after giving the same account of the execution of the deed as the subscribing witnesses did, added that at that time the respondent * expressed a hope that the effect of the deed would be to * 292 perpetuate the two estates in his family. One part of the deed after its execution remained with Mr. O'Connor, and the other part was delivered by the respondent to witness's father, who had then come into the room. His lordship asked the respondent why he wished to encumber him with the deed, and the respondent replied that he had good reasons; that his younger children, when they found he had executed it, would annoy him on the subject, and therefore he wished his lordship to take charge of it, and not to give it, not even if he himself should write for it, unless he came in person for it.

In one of the conversations this witness had with the respondent, on his suggesting to the respondent whether he wished to make provision in the contemplated deed for his younger children, the respondent made answer similar to that which he had made to Mr. O'Connor. The draft of the deed had been laid before this witness on behalf of the appellant, and he made the notes, amendments, and alterations which appeared on it.

Mr. Adams, of the county of Galway, an acquaintance of the respondent, heard him say, in December, 1827, that the estates of Roxborough and Castleboy could never again be separated, and that he had executed a deed conveying the latter to his son Dudley.

Two witnesses proved that after the respondents took possession of the Castleboy estate, in 1830, they cut about 4000*l.* worth of timber, and ploughed above 150 acres of meadow and pasture land.

Mr. J. Lambert, of Dublin, solicitor, on receiving instructions, in 1830, from the respondent, Robert * Persse, to prepare the deed of conveyance of the Castleboy estate to the second respondent, observed to him that he had understood that property had been settled on Dudley Persse. The respondent denied having made any such disposition of it, and said the deed between him and Dudley went to the extent only of guaranteeing to Dudley the costs of prosecuting the commission of lunacy ; which assertion this witness believed, because he had heard Dudley swear, in his examination on the lunacy, that he had no interest in the result of that inquiry. This witness knew that the respondent had been in pecuniary embarrassments in 1826–28, and heard him complain that the appellant did not regularly pay the annuity, which was his only means of living ; and witness was employed in 1830 to file a bill against the appellant for payment of the arrears of the annuity. Witness had conducted a lawsuit for the respondent in 1826, and was his confidential law adviser from 1830 to 1833, when he was succeeded by Mr. Ardill. Mr. O'Connor had been employed by the respondent as his solicitor before 1826. This witness, in 1833, prepared a letter, to be signed by the respondent, to the Lord Chief Baron (then Viscount Guillamore), requiring his lordship to give the respondent the counterpart of the deed of December, 1827, and he accompanied the respondent R. H. Persse to his lordship's house with the letter. R. H. Persse was shown into his lordship's chamber, and on his return he told witness that his lordship said the deed was locked up in an iron safe, and the keys were in the country. A similar answer was made by his lordship to a like subsequent application, and witness was never able to procure the counterpart of the deed.

The expenses of the commission of lunacy were *ulti- * 294
mately paid out of the funds in Court to the credit of the lunatic. Witness heard Mr. O'Connor say that the money had been advanced by him, and not by the appellant. It was a very lucrative suit for Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. Thomas Ardill, of Dublin, solicitor in the cause for the respondents, proved that previous to the settlement on the intended marriage of the appellant with Miss Barry in 1833, he, by direction of the respondents, caused copies of the deed of 1830 to be served on the Master in Chancery, to whom it had been referred to approve of that settlement (Miss Barry being a ward of Court with 20,000*l.* fortune), and also on all the material parties to that settlement. This witness also defended successfully an action of ejectment which was brought by a devisee under an alleged will of the deceased lunatic against the respondent R. H.
Persse, who paid all the expenses ; no part of them was paid by the appellant.

Mr. Burton Persse, the next of kin of the lunatic, and who resisted the commission, knew the respondent to have been in pecuniary embarrassments in 1826-28, and he complained to witness that his annuity was not regularly paid ; he had no other means of support. Witness did not know by whom the money for prosecuting the commission was advanced, but all the expenses were subsequently paid out of the lunatic's estate.

Mr. James Blakeney, solicitor, said that for fifteen years previous to 1823 or 1824, his father, deceased, had been confidential law adviser to the respondent, and witness believed he was succeeded by Mr. O'Connor. In further proof of this fact, two letters were put in evidence, one written by the respondent from his house at Newcastle, the 3d February, 1828, to Mr.
O'Connor, *informing him that a law process was served * 295 on him ; the second, written from Castleboy, April 10 (no year mentioned), complaining that Burton Persse was giving directions about the property.

Upon the hearing of the cause in February, 1837, the deed of the 8th of December, 1827, was produced and read in evidence on the part of the appellant ; as were also three paper writings, marked respectively Nos. 2, 3, and 86, which were to this effect :—

The document No. 2 was proved by Mr. O'Connor as containing the instructions given by the respondent on the 3d of December, 1827, for the preparing of the deed ; and it was thereby stated that the respondent had agreed to convey to the appellant his expectancy in the estate of Castleboy, in consideration of love and affection, reserving a life-interest in the estate, and that the appellant should have full power to proceed in his name as to the suing out of the commission of lunacy. There was not any mention of any further contract or agreement between them. This paper appeared to have been submitted to counsel as instructions for the deed, with an observation that it was left to counsel to say whether the respondent's life-estate should be made free from impeachment of waste, and whether he should have a leasing power; and there appeared at the foot of the paper the words following: "I have not made Mr. Robert Persse's estate for life free from impeachment of waste, nor given him a leasing power, not being so instructed. J. B. M." These initials were stated at the bar to be the initials of J. B. Miller, barrister-at-law: no evidence was given as to the time when he made the memorandum, nor by whom nor on whose part he had been consulted.

The document No. 86 purported to be a draft of the deed laid before Mr. Waller O'Grady for his * perusal and * 296 amendment, on the part of the appellant, the instructions for which purpose were written in the fold of the draft, and at the foot thereof were written the words: "Quære, leasing powers; impeachment of waste."

The consideration specified in the draft was merely love and affection, and 10s. It appeared by the draft that the following recitals were introduced into it by Mr. O'Grady: "And whereas the said Robert Parsons Persse is now, and has been for several months, in a state of mental and bodily disease," &c. (See the substance of these recitals, ante, p. 282.)

It further appeared that Mr. O'Grady, in that part of the draft which recited the agreement to convey in consideration of love and affection, and 10s., introduced the words, "and from his desire to continue the estates of Roxborough and Castleboy united," and the words, "also in consideration of the advance of money by the said Dudley for the purposes herein before recited;" and it did not appear that he had adverted to the queries as to the leasing power and power to commit waste. Such powers were omitted in the draft.

The document No. 3 purported to be the draft of the deed submitted to Mr. Blackburne by Mr. O'Connor, on behalf of the respondent, and appeared to be a copy of the draft as altered by

Mr. O'Grady, with instructions in the fold, which were a copy of the instructions submitted to Mr. O'Grady, save that the queries as to giving the respondent a leasing power, and rendering him dispunishable for waste, were omitted. It further appeared that in the draft, as settled by Mr. Blackburne, there had remained in the covenant against incumbrances an exception as to leases to be made by the respondent; and that Mr. O'Grady had, after the draft had been so settled by Mr. Blackburne, struck * out that exception from the draft, and made the follow- * 297

ing observation in the margin : —

“ As the object is very much to unite the two demesnes of Roxborough and Castleboy, it is not intended that either party should have leasing powers. “ W. O'G.”

The cause was heard before Lord Chancellor PLUNKET, (a)

(a) The counsel on each side, in arguing the appeal, referred to manuscript notes of Lord PLUNKET's judgment taken for the parties by different hands, and said they were the same in substance and effect, though differing in words. From copies with which we have been favoured, we make the following extracts : —

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The bill has been filed by the son against his father and his younger brother, seeking to enforce the execution of a covenant, which is contained in a deed executed to the plaintiff by the father. The previous facts of the case, I believe, are these : — Robert, the father, was tenant for life of the Roxborough estate, bringing an income of 4500*l.* He, by deed, in 1823 reduced himself to the situation of an annuitant, by giving up his interest in these estates to his son, Dudley, for an annual sum of 800*l.*, and a sum of 6000*l.* to be paid to him, covenanting that in certain events the annuity should be reduced. It appears that such events did take place as reduced the annuity to 500*l.* Robert afterwards became a bankrupt, and was left solely depending on the annuity, which we find, though it should have been paid quarterly, was not even paid annually, for there was an arrear of a year and a half permitted by Dudley to accumulate. The only thing he appears to have had except the 500*l.* was the possibility of becoming heir to Parsons Persse, if he outlived him and Parsons died without issue. It does not appear that Dudley had a similar right to the estates of Parsons Persse, if his father died before him, and this fact has a bearing on both sides of the case. The thing about to be purchased was not so valuable as if it did not depend upon Robert's surviving the lunatic, and a small sum would be a fair consideration for it. But then, the son Dudley is found amply provided for, the father is, I may say, in a state of destitution, and this partly produced by Dudley's neglect in paying his annuity, and for the younger children he has scarcely the means of providing. Parsons Persse, who was seised of the Castleboy estates, becomes a lunatic, and if he died without issue, Robert Persse, and after him his son Dudley, would be entitled to them. Parsons Persse, it appears, was then a man of about forty years of age ; Robert Persse was sixty-three, and Dudley was a young man in the prime of life ; thus the life of Parsons Persse might be as good as Robert's, and that fact is material, as it seems to lessen the inadequacy of the consideration. But it also appears that it was highly important to Dudley himself to secure the estates from alienation, and he certainly undertook the case as well for his own advantage as his father's.

It appears from the state that Parsons Persse was in, and from his being exposed to the extortion and influence of persons who were disposed to plunder him, that it was necessary to establish his lunacy, and that this was a first and necessary measure we cannot doubt. On the suggestion of Mr. O'Connor to Dudley, it was determined to undertake the case. I have no right to enter into what should be the feelings of a son situated as Dudley Persse was, in possession of 4500*l.* a year which he got from his father, and having 900*l.* of his father's money in his pocket ; it is not my business to say what, under ordinary feelings, it would have been a natural and a fair and a just thing to do ; but I do not think it would have been extraordinary generosity if Dudley had said to his father, " I know how you are situated ; I know you have not money to undertake this matter, and I will, at my own expense, undertake it for you ; you lending me your name." If he had done so, no person deriving from him could have complained that he had wantonly thrown away his property ; or even if he had said, " I will be at the expense in this case, and when we get possession of the estate it shall pay." No one could complain of that. But he asks the estate itself as a reward for securing it. Funds in the lunacy were ample, more than 20,000*l.*, and the risk was only as to such portion of the costs as might not be allowed against the estate.

It is to be observed that Robert Persse was not the moving party in this transaction ; Dudley had the money, and had equal interest in proving the lunacy with Robert ; and it is plain that he and Mr. O'Connor induced Robert to embark in the matter, though they would make him appear the principal party. Mr. O'Connor informed himself of the lunatic's situation, and if he had then said to Robert Persse, " Communicate with your solicitor," which I must now remark he did not, though it is so alleged : I say that I look upon the attempts to substantiate the allegation that Mr. O'Connor was the solicitor of both Robert and Dudley, to be a miserable failure : if he had said, " Consult with your relations," all might be well : but Mr. O'Connor took upon himself the management of the entire affair. He put Robert in communication with Dudley, and between them they persuaded him to undertake the affair in the terms I have stated. The communication was made in the latter end of November, 1827, and from the latter end of November to the 3d of December we have no information of what passed, or of any communication having taken place between Robert and his man of business.

At this stage I beg to say that, so far as the answer throws disparagement upon certain high names, I must express my opinion that I consider it entirely unwarrantable : their high character and important duties place them above suspicion in this affair ; and I would have it distinctly understood that in any observations I may think it necessary to make upon the conduct of Dudley

as related to the subject of waste, that * the same be dis- * 299 missed with costs, and that the remainder of the bill be

Persse, or O'Connor, I mean my remarks to apply to themselves, and not in any manner to Lord Guillamore, or any member of his family. Mr. O'Connor, who, it is alleged, was the confidential agent of Robert Persse, takes upon himself the entire management of the affair, and without the necessary legal assistance upon the part of Robert, promotes the advantage of his client Dudley ; and his conduct, therefore, necessarily calls for remark. It is stated that it was at the desire of Robert that Dudley consented to undertake the business: now, it was by Dudley and Mr. O'Connor that Robert was called into activity at all. I ask, under such circumstances ought Mr. O'Connor to have undertaken the office of solicitor for both parties ; and if he did, was there ever a case calling more imperatively for full communication between the parties, and, above all, for a full and well defined consideration to be paid to the party parting with the estate? What was the consideration to be given for the fee-simple estate of 2000*l.* per annum? Why, the consideration for this valuable estate was the costs which might be incurred in preventing its alienation from the family of both. I have in my hand what is called "Instructions for the deed," and I must say I know of no instance of so important an instrument being based upon such a document. This is a document which it is difficult to interpret ; there are parts of it which it would appear were first written, and yet which really were not written first: [His Lordship read passages from the instructions.] By whom all this was written we have no explanation, or evidence of an explanation on the point being given to Robert. Then follows in different handwriting, "I have not made Robert Persse's estate for life, &c. J. B. M." Who J. B. M. is does not appear, but I am told it is Mr. Miller ; neither does it appear on what authority he is found preparing this deed of conveyance. Does it appear that Robert knew that Mr. Miller was employed? This undefined mode of proceeding would not be permitted in the commonest matter. On the other side of this paper we have what appears to be a true statement of the situation of Parsons Persse. [His Lordship read a further extract from the instructions.] Then follows a part which was afterwards scraped out : it commences, "The agent of the Messrs. Persse cannot more particularly state ;" and by this part of the instructions it would be made to appear that one man was acting as agent for both Robert and Dudley ; and we must also observe in this part, which has been struck out, that there was to be an exemption from impeachment of waste, and a leasing power, preserved to Robert. By whom this was struck out we are not told. Did Robert know any thing of so important a question as to whether he was or not to possess that which would give the chief value to his life-estate? We are not told that he did. There is no evidence of this draft ever having been submitted to Robert Persse, nor are we shown that the instructions were submitted to counsel employed for him with his knowledge or consent.

How ought the parties to have acted in such a case as this? It does not appear that Robert is ever informed that counsel is to be employed on his part or on the part of Dudley. Was he informed that Mr. Blackburne was to be his counsel? It seems to me very extraordinary that Mr. O'Connor felt no delicacy in acting for both parties in this peculiar case. Separate counsel is thought necessary, and why not separate solicitors quite as needful? If ever there was a case in which a person should hesitate in taking on himself the duties of solicitor for both father and son, it was this case; or, if he did undertake them, he should at each step of the proceedings guard himself from suspicion by a strict intelligence and frequent communication between the parties, and by preserving all the documents and evidence connected with the affair.

The next thing I have to remark upon is the draft sent to Mr. Waller O'Grady. In this draft there are some parts underlined which deserve particular attention. The first portion we find so marked is this: "From desire to continue the estate of Castleboy and Roxborough united." Robert, we are told, said this or expressed a desire to this effect in casual conversation; but that is not a matter upon which to ground a conveyance. It goes on, "and also for consideration of expenditure of money," which is struck out, and when this striking-out took place is left to conjecture. On the third page is another underlineation of the following words: "For and during the term of the natural life." Then comes, "in as full and ample a manner as said lands," also underlined. Then follows, in the handwriting of Mr. Waller O'Grady, "and whereas the said Robert Parsons Persse is in a state of mental and bodily disease." Would it not be a fairer recital to have said, "Whereas the said Dudley and Robert undertake this affair, but it is all thrown upon Robert, though, in truth, he has least to do in the matter?" It goes on to say that the said Dudley, at the desire and request of the said Robert, undertook this matter. Now is that a true recital, when the case was undertaken at the request of Dudley, on the suggestion of his solicitor? I must remark, however, that it was fairly introduced by the counsel of Dudley according to the instructions he received, but we have no proof that it was done with the concurrence or knowledge of Robert Persse.

The next thing to be observed with respect to this draft of the deed, is some writing which appears to have been put in after it came from counsel. There is, in the fold, "quære leasing power, quære impeachment of waste." It is quite clear that these queries were not put in at the time it was sent to Mr. O'Grady; for if so he would have consulted the parties on those points, and questioned Robert whether he was willing to omit so important a clause as that entitling him to grant leases and preserving him from impeachment of waste. But the deed was perfected without giving him any leasing power, or other power, on which so greatly depended the value of his estate. So much for the case that was laid before Dudley's counsel.

There also appears to have been a case laid before Mr. Blackburne for Robert. This draft was sent to Mr. Blackburne, and he, of course, considered that it was sent by Robert's desire. I omitted, about the signature of Mr. Miller to a part of the instructions, to observe, that at the conclusion of what he has written he says, "I have not made Robert Persse an estate free from impeachment from waste, or given him a leasing power, not being so instructed." He here very properly suggests, that if he had received instructions for granting these powers to the person who was parting with the estate, he should have done so. It appears that these powers were advisedly left out;

burne, and draft instructions * marked No. 2, respectively * 301 produced at the hearing, his Lordship ordered that the same be deposited * with the registrar, with liberty to all * 302 parties from time to time to inspect them.

The appeal was against that decree.

Mr. Miller seems to have an impression that it would be but fair, and the usual course, to make Robert's estate as valuable as an estate for life could be. Some portions of the draft laid before Mr. Blackburne are highly material ; it was read and revised by him as counsel for Robert, and we find it came out of his hands giving his client the power to make leases. I find on the margin of the deed that was before Robert Persse's counsel, the following words : " As the object is to connect the estate, it is not intended to give either party a leasing power." On what grounds is this assertion made, or by what authority is it supported? It is in the handwriting of Mr. Waller O'Grady, who, as counsel for Dudley Persse, acted very properly in the matter ; but, was it done by the authority or with the privity of Robert? When this question was mooted, Mr. O'Connor should, if he had acted fairly, have gone to Robert and said, " Do you wish to be made dispunishable for waste, and possessed of a leasing power? " yet, instead of that, he sends a case to counsel for Robert, without saying one word about it to him ; and when the counsel introduces a clause securing to his client his just rights, he strikes it out, and the counsel for Dudley is instructed to append this note to the draft as an extenuation or cause for the omission of the power to which Robert was fairly entitled. I dare say Waller O'Grady thought that it was done with the consent of Robert, and if that had been the case it would have been all right.

This mistake or this fraud, it might be supposed, would, between such parties, have been redressed, or at least no advantage taken of it. But is it so? Dudley, in the strength of it, files a bill against his father on the plea of some timber being cut down, which it appears is the most valuable part of the property on the estate. Dudley attempts to avail himself of a fraud committed on Robert's counsel and himself. If this was a bill filed by Robert to get relief from an agreement in which he had been deprived of the most valuable attribute of the life-estate covenanted for, could I refuse his prayer? I will not say that there is no case bearing in favour of the plaintiff in this matter, but certainly there was none cited ; and I am sure that in such a matter, where the consideration was so inadequate, it should be fully proved that the most ample communication took place, and that all the rights of the person transferring the final interest in the expectancy were fairly secured.

I am told this is a family transaction, and receives a different complexion from the connection of the parties in the case ; but I cannot see that any difference exists in it from any other case, except that it is more unnatural for a son to force upon his father the execution of such a harsh and fraudulent contract. I cannot forget that his father has bountifully given him by far the larger portion of his property, and that he now seeks to strip him of the remainder. Such ungenerous avarice must, to his kind father's heart, be sharper than a serpent's tooth.

There is another point which might be taken into consideration in this case : the conveyance made by Robert to his second son in 1830. It is a conveyance

*303 * Mr. Pemberton and Sir William Follett (Mr. G. Richards was with them), for the appellants. — The decree cannot be sustained on the grounds on which Lord PLUNKET's judgment is founded ; if it can be sustained at all, it must certainly be on some other grounds than those put in issue by the parties, and the House will have to deal with this case as their Lordships dealt with that of Attwood v. Small. (a) The answers of the respondents are contradicted repeatedly by the evidence, their own witnesses admit the allegation of the bill. Lord PLUNKET was of opinion that the father was defrauded by the son, and his Lordship dismissed the bill, without costs, saying there was no imputation on Lord Guillamore or any of his family. The judgment was inconsistent ; for if the bill was properly dismissed on the ground of fraud in obtaining the deed, none of the parties concerned in obtaining it was exempt from blame, and in that view the case was a case for costs. It was distinctly proved by two for good and valuable security. His children were very inadequately provided for, so large a portion being given to Dudley ; and to make some provisions for others he makes a conveyance to his younger son for the sum of 16,000*l*. I would hesitate to say the time of the payment of the money is material to the title in the case, but I am not called upon to decide that. The other objection is on a more specific ground ; but if the conveyance to Dudley is a fraudulent one, it cannot affect the person seised of the estate, and à fortiori not the purchaser from him. If it had been meant to act fairly by Robert in this case, he should have had the draft of the deeds submitted to him, and time given him to consider and consult ; but not only was not this the case, but from the time that the thing called "instructions" was prepared, until the parties were assembled to ratify the deed, no communication appears to have taken place. No doubt this deed was read then, but that was no proper or sufficient time to judge of it.

I can collect from the whole of this matter that Robert was under an impression that he had not parted altogether with his control over the estate. If he thought so, why hand over the deed to Lord Guillamore? though indeed I think, at all events, that he would have been more prudent to have made himself the trustee of it. It should not have been forgotten that after the deed was handed over to Lord Guillamore, it was sent for and desired to be given back. I am sure it could not be got when required. However, it was then the duty of Mr. O'Connor to put Robert in possession of a copy of the deed. He did not do so ; and Robert's counsel did not see the deed or a draft of it until the hearing of the case. Under these circumstances, I do not feel at liberty to give my judgment to enforce the contract. As to the costs of the proceedings, I think that the answers put in by the defendants have not explained sufficient grounds of defence to entitle them to costs. That part of the bill, however, referring to impeachment from waste, it is my duty to dismiss, with costs.

witnesses that the respondent's chief object in executing the deed was to reunite the two estates, and preserve them together in his family. The evidence not only proved the case of the appellants, but disproved the defence.

It was clear on the face of the indenture of the 8th of December, 1827, without going through the voluminous evidence in the cause, that the covenant contained in that deed was entered into by the respondent for good and valuable consideration. But even * if no consideration had been given, the indent- * 304 ure, being a family arrangement, ought to be carried into effect: Tweddell v. Tweddell, (a) Neale v. Neale; (b) and the cases cited in the latter case.

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Jacob (Mr. Lowndes was with them), for the respondents. — There is no contradiction between the case made by the respondents and the evidence for them. The deed was purely voluntary, and unfairly obtained by the suppression of facts, and under circumstances rendering it unfit to be acted upon by a Court of Equity. The appellant and his advisers knew very well that the expenses of prosecuting the commission of lunacy would be paid out of the lunatic's ample property. If they had a doubt of his insanity, they were guilty of a conspiracy in suing out a commission against him. But as it was quite notorious at the time that Parsons Persse was a person of unsound mind, any solicitor in Dublin would be glad to prosecute the commission at his own risk; there was no risk, in fact. Besides, the solicitor had the security of the respondent's property for his costs, as the commission was in his name; so that no consideration whatsoever passed from the appellant for this valuable estate. The decree left the appellants at liberty to proceed at law on the covenant.

It was absurd to call this a family arrangement; it was never put on that ground in the Court below. The cases referred to had no application to this; but Lord ELDON's observations in Gordon v. Gordon (c) were in point, and also the cases of Mortlock v. Buller, (d) Cadman v. Horner, (e) and Clermont v. Tasburgh. (g)

* 305 * THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — I do not feel that I can at present call upon your Lordships to come to a final conclusion upon this cause. It is a matter of great importance to the family, and involves questions of general importance as affecting proceedings in Courts of Equity; but there is one circumstance, as to which the noble Lords who are present, and myself, entirely concur; namely, that it is impossible for us to affirm the decree. We find that the issue, which is raised upon the pleadings, is proved on the part of the plaintiff (the appellant), and disproved on the part of the defendant (the respondent). The defendant has thought proper to tender a false defence; he has put his case upon that which is disproved by all the evidence in the cause. There can be no doubt that he must have been aware, when he executed the deed in question, and when he put in his answer, that that deed was not merely in respect of the prosecution of the commission of lunacy, but that it was a settlement of the estate, in some way at least, upon his eldest son. He has, however, thought proper to take issue with the plaintiff upon that fact; and the plaintiff, therefore, in preparing for the hearing of this cause, had only to prove his own case, and to repel the case made by the defendant, which I believe we are all of opinion he has completely succeeded in doing. It is true there are circumstances appearing upon the evidence, which the plaintiff has gone into for the purpose of proving the issue stated in the pleadings and no other, which may be said to call for explanation, but the plaintiff has had no opportunity of entering into that explanation. It was not necessary for him to go into it, because upon that subject there was no issue tendered by the defendant; it is in no

* 306 part of his case stated that, although it is true he * intended to make a settlement of this estate upon his son, with certain powers reserved to himself, there was, either by fraud or by negligence, an omission of those provisions which would have been for his benefit. There is no allusion to such a state of facts in the answer of the defendant in this cause. It was not only, therefore, not necessary, but it would have been superfluous for the plaintiff to have gone into evidence to disprove that which was not affirmed. At the same time there are circumstances which may, if investigated, show that the defendant has a case by which he might be enabled to resist a part of that, at least,

which is asked for the plaintiff. I confess I have very great difficulty in permitting the defendant, after all that has occurred, — after a statement of a false issue in a contest with his antagonist, — to have an opportunity of going into the proof of another case. I think it is extremely dangerous in principle, that it would be very likely to lead to improper means of meeting a claim, and also would incur some danger of very great difficulty being felt in coming to a satisfactory conclusion upon any inquiry which might be directed for that purpose. The only doubt, however, which I have, and I believe I may say, which my noble and learned friend now present entertains, upon this subject is, whether there ought to be some mode directed by which those circumstances which the plaintiff has had no opportunity upon the record, as the defendant tendered the issues to him, of explaining, should be the subject of further investigation. For that purpose it is necessary that we should take time to look into the proceedings; and in order to that, I would propose to your Lordships that the further consideration of this case be adjourned.

* LORD WYNFORD. — I entirely concur with my noble * 307 and learned friend, that the issue which has been tendered by the respondent, and which is that which, therefore, ought to be met by the appellant, has been proved clearly on the part of the appellant, and disproved as far as regards the respondent. But still I cannot but think that there are many circumstances in this case which are not met; probably it may be from the fault of the respondent that they were not properly brought before the Court; but it appears to me that your Lordships cannot give a perfectly satisfactory judgment unless you can find out some mode by which those circumstances may be further investigated. I quite agree with my noble and learned friend that it is an extremely dangerous thing, where a cause has been tried upon one point, to open it afterwards to the parties to inquire into other matters; but I think the danger may be avoided in this case if the objections which occur to me should, on further consideration, appear to be made out by the evidence on the part of the plaintiff. I think it will be very dangerous now to let the defendant go into fresh evidence; but if it appears on the evidence given on the part of the defendant that a judgment in favour of the plaintiff ought to have been given, or at least one less favourable to the defendant, it appears to me that there may in such case be a further investigation; what the mode of that investigation should be, I do not know. It occurred to me at one time, and it struck my noble and learned friend, that it might be sent to an issue; but the matter is of such an extended nature that it is impossible the facts on which information is desirable can be satisfactorily ascertained by an issue.

I am not familiar enough with the practice of the Court
 * 308 of Chancery to know what other * mode there may be by which this matter may be investigated; but I agree with my noble and learned friend that it is highly proper, in a case of so much importance, and where I feel bound to say that I cannot quite approve of the conduct of any of the parties to these transactions, that some delay should take place for the purpose of considering whether any mode can be discovered by which the facts may be more clearly ascertained.

May 4.

While the appeal was standing for final judgment, the two respondents presented a petition to the House, stating the proceedings in the cause, and that the instructions for and drafts of the deed, which the petitioners had not previously seen, were produced at the hearing, and the Lord Chancellor's judgment was partly founded on matters appearing in the instructions and draft, and on evidence referring to them, given on the part of the appellants. The petitioners offered, with the leave of the House, to file a bill against the appellants, to set aside the deed of December, 1827, whereby the fullest investigation could be had into the circumstances. This petition was referred to the appeal committee.

May 7.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The object of this suit was to carry into effect an arrangement between the plaintiff, Dudley Persse, and his father, the defendant, Robert Persse, respecting a landed estate of considerable value, which belonged to Robert Parsons Persse, a lunatic, to whom R. Persse was heir-at-law. By a previous arrangement of 1823, Robert, who was tenant for life of the family estates called Roxborough, with remainder to his son Dudley, in tail, had conveyed his life-estate to Dudley,
 * 309 in consideration of an * annuity of 800*l.* for his own life, and payment of debts, which are stated to have been equal to 17,500*l.*, and a charge upon the estate of 6000*l.* for Robert's younger children. The estate is represented to have produced about 4500*l.* a year, and the age of the father, in 1823, is stated to have been about sixty-one. Much has been said as to this transaction, but the propriety of it is not in question in this cause ; its validity has never been impeached, and the provisions of it are very material for the purpose of showing the relative situation of the parties in the year 1827. Before that time, that is, in 1826, Dudley married Miss O'Grady, and by the settlement upon that marriage, this Roxborough estate was so settled that Dudley took only a life-estate, with remainder to his eldest son in tail, and provision was made for the wife and the younger children.

Such was the state of the family property in 1827, at which time apprehensions were suggested that unfair means might be resorted to by others to deprive the family of the succession to the estates of Parsons Persse, then supposed to be a lunatic, which were called the Castleboy estates. The lunatic was at that time about forty ; Robert Persse, his heir presumptive, was sixty-five, and Dudley a younger man than the lunatic. It is, therefore, obvious that Dudley's expectancy of succeeding as heir was much more valuable than his father's ; and if he had so succeeded, he would have had the estates in fee. From expressions proved to have been used by the father, it appears that the Roxborough and the Castleboy estates had formerly been united in his family, and that he was anxious that they should be reunited ; but to effect that purpose it might be expedient that Dudley should not have the power of disposing of the Castleboy estate * any more than he had of the Roxborough estate. * 310 The course recommended to secure the Castleboy estate was to sue out a commission of lunacy against Parsons Persse, the expense of which, though to be paid out of the estate if the lunacy were established, required an immediate advance of money, which would fall on the party suing out the commission if the lunacy should not be established. . Robert Persse, the father, had been a bankrupt, and had no command of money. Under these circumstances, the deed of covenant in question in this cause, dated the 8th of December, 1827, was executed, the effect of which was that Dudley, the son, was to undertake the prosecution of the commission in the name of his father, and the Castleboy estate, if it should descend to the father on the death of the lunatic, was to be settled so as to give to the father an estate for life, and subject thereto upon the same trusts and purposes as the Roxborough estate stood settled. The commission was sued out, and the lunacy was established. The lunatic died in October, 1829, and a will having been set up, an ejectment was brought by the person claiming under it, but upon a trial the jury found a verdict against his claim. The title of the heir being thus established, the present bill was filed to carry into effect the provisions of the deed of the 8th of December, 1827.

With reference to the grounds upon which the prayer of that bill was refused by the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and upon which the decree has been supported at the bar of this House, it is of the utmost importance to consider the defence set up by the answer. That defence consisted simply in stating that the deed had been obtained by misrepresentation and fraud, not of

 * 311 advantage taken of the distressed * circumstances of the defendant, or of his want of legal assistance in stipulating terms for his own advantage, but by a fraudulent misrepresentation of the purport and object of the deed ; the defendant deliberately swearing in his answer that he never intended to give up his expectancy of succeeding as heir to the lunatic, or in any manner to agree to settle his estate, but that the extent of his intention was to charge the expenses of prosecuting the commission upon the estate ; and that he was told and believed that such was the only object and purport of it. That this defence is false in every part is proved beyond the possibility of doubt ; the judgment of the Court below assumes that it is so ; the instructions for the deed of December, 1827, if known to the father, disprove it ; and four witnesses, O'Connor, Nolan, Waller, and Richard O'Grady, prove that the draft deed was read over to, and a copy read by, the father before he executed it ; and Richard Adams proves subsequent recognitions of it by him. Lord Guilmore, the late Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, though not actually present at the execution of the deed, was occasionally in the room when the parties met for that purpose, and he was made the depository of the deed by Robert Persse. If any such fraud as that sworn to in the answer was committed, Lord Guilmore and his two sons must have been parties to it, or, what is scarcely more credible, the author of it must have chosen to practise it in their presence. It is unnecessary, however, to observe further upon this defence, as it forms no part of the judgment appealed from, and was not relied upon at the bar by the counsel for the respondent.

But in considering the grounds upon which the judgment was founded, and upon which the right of

and is therefore not at liberty to set up any other defence which depends upon matters of fact not put in issue, and which the plaintiff, therefore, has had no opportunity of disproving or of explaining. Objections to the relief prayed, which rest upon the nature or provisions of the deed itself, or upon facts common to both parties, are not open to this observation; but assuming that the father was perfectly acquainted with the contents of the deed before he executed it, to permit him to impeach it upon matters of fact not put in issue by him would be contrary to the established rules of Courts of Equity, and inconsistent with the most obvious principles of justice. Some of the grounds relied upon on behalf of the defendant are of a middle character, arising out of facts put in issue, it is true, but for a totally different purpose: such as the instructions and draft of the deed proved by Mr. O'Connor. These the plaintiff put in issue to disprove the defendant's statement, that he conceived the deed to be only a security for the expenses of the commission; but the circumstances under which those instructions were given and those drafts prepared were not put in issue; the transaction not being impeached upon any statement connected with that transaction. No opportunity, therefore, was afforded to the plaintiff to explain what may now seem to require explanation, or to prove additional facts where the information may appear defective. I should, therefore, have thought that any suspicions arising from so much of the transaction as was so proved in the cause, ought not to have led to any conclusion influencing the decision of the case; but as many such circumstances have * been * 313 replied upon, it may be expedient to examine how far such suspicions appear to be well founded.

It was contended that the son had taken an improper advantage of the distressed situation of his father, occasioned by the withholding his annuity. I do not find any proof of this, but, on the contrary, it appears that there was no complaint made, and no ground of complaint on that subject. The father was, indeed, in circumstances which precluded him from incurring expenses or pecuniary liabilities, but that can only be referred to his own misfortunes; and it is to be observed that this part of his case is inconsistent with another, much relied upon, namely, that the undertaking by the son to prosecute the commission was no burden upon him, and therefore no consideration for the deed, because the property of the lunatic was ample to provide for the costs. If that were so, how could the distressed situation of the father prevent him from prosecuting those proceedings himself? And where was the inability to do so, which is alleged to have been taken advantage of by the son, as a means of depriving the father of that to which he was entitled?

Another objection taken to the transaction was, that the father had no professional advice, Mr. O'Connor being exclusively the solicitor of the son. I think it is proved that Mr. O'Connor acted as solicitor for the father as well as the son, and that he was the person whom the father was so far in the habit of consulting as to make him the most natural person for him to employ upon the matter of the lunacy. The evidence of James Blakeney, examined by the defendant, and the letters of the 3d of February, 1828, and the 10th of April, sufficiently prove this. It is true that he also acted as solicitor for the son, and was thereby placed in the difficult and responsible situation of acting but the objection, if any, must be that Mr. O'Connor betrayed the interest of his client the father, in favour of his client the son, and not that the father had not professional assistance. The ground upon which it was contended that the solicitor betrayed the interests of his client the father, rests upon the written instructions and the drafts of the deed which he produced for the purpose of proving the falsehood of the defence set up in the answer. The instructions were taken down at the meeting between the father and the son; they certainly are very short, but they embrace the whole of the arrangement as afterwards carried out; they provide that the father should give up his expectancy in the Castleboy estate, except a life-interest for himself, and that the son should prosecute the commission. This appears to have been all that was at that time settled. When the solicitor afterwards prepared the instructions for counsel, and when the counsel employed for each of the parties proceeded to prepare the draft of the deed, it naturally occurred to them to inquire whether the life-estate of the father was to be dispunishable of waste, and whether he was to have a leasing power. The absence of provisions for these purposes in the deed is not insisted upon or alluded to as an objection in the answer; no explanation, therefore, could be expected from the plaintiff. That many opportunities occurred of discussing this and all other matters connected with the proposed arrangement, is proved by Mr. O'Connor and by Mr. Waller O'Grady, in whose father's house the defendant was staying; and that additional details were arranged, after the written instructions taken by Mr. O'Connor, is proved by the fact, that by the deed the Castleboy estates were to be settled to the same uses * as * 315 the Roxborough estate, in which the son had only a life-estate; whereas, the instructions would have given to him the fee,—an alteration which it is not to be supposed the son would have consented to, if it had not been stipulated for by or on behalf of the father. What passed upon this subject, or relative to the leasing power, or of the life-estate not being dispunishable for waste, is not stated, no explanation being called for by the defence set up; but as the defendant does not complain of the deed because it does not contain such provisions, why is fraud and imposition to be assumed on behalf of a party, who, with a deed before him, as stated in the bill, does not suggest any such fraud or imposition, and against a party who has thus been deprived of an opportunity of explaining the circumstances which led to the omission of them? Incidentally, however, and by accident, it is proved that the father expressed a desire that the Roxborough and Castleboy estates should be reunited in his family, which tends to explain the absence of a leasing power for any terms which could be turned to profit by the tenant for life; and that, upon being consulted whether he wished to have a power of making any provision out of the estate for any of his younger children, he answered that he did not, which explains the absence of a power to cut timber, as it may be assumed that he would have exercised such power for that purpose. It appears to me, therefore, that there were not sufficient grounds for the suspicion of unfair dealing, which have been relied upon, and that, regard being had to the matters put in issue by the pleadings, such suspicion ought not to have influenced the decision of the cause.

It was, however, open to the parties to rely upon objections appearing upon the face of the instrument * upon * 316 which relief was prayed. These objections, though divided into many heads in the argument, may be reduced to four: first, that the contract was illegal as partaking of champerty and maintenance; secondly, that it was illegal as against public policy, and a fraud upon the great seal in the matter of the lunacy; thirdly, that there was no mutuality in its provisions; fourthly, that the covenant was voluntary, being without any, or at least without any adequate, consideration.

As to the first of these objections, the answer is obvious: there was no suit to be maintained, and no property in litigation to be divided.

Upon the second objection, no case was cited; and I have not been able to understand how an arrangement between parties expecting property upon the decease of a lunatic, can be a fraud upon the great seal in the matter of the lunacy, or, upon that ground, void as against public policy. The thing to be looked to in matters of lunacy, is the protection of the person and property of the lunatic, and for that purpose the encouragement to parties to interfere and to bring the facts before the Court. It is obvious that this object would in many cases be impeded, rather than promoted, by holding that all agreements relative to the costs of the proceedings, or the ultimate division of the property, were void. I have not any principle or authority cited in support of this objection. Agreements as to expectancies have been enforced in equity, which appeared to be open to serious objections which do not apply to the present case.

In support of the third objection, that there was no mutuality in the contract, some well-known cases were cited; but the question here is, whether, after the risk incurred, and the * 317 benefit secured, and the * consideration thereby paid, the father can, on his part, resist the performance of the contract which led to those results? If this objection could prevail in this case, how could decrees for specific performance, where the defendant only signed the agreement, or upon part performance, be maintained? In those cases there is no mutuality in the sense in which the word is used in the present argument, because the contract being within the Statute of Frauds could not have been originally enforced against the plaintiff; but he having performed his part, is entitled to compel the defendant to perform his.¹

Fourthly, the supposition that the covenant was merely voluntary is negatived by the defendant's own statement of the case; for beyond all question some consideration proceeded from the son. The object of having a commission of lunacy prosecuted, the father's inability to undertake it from whatever cause proceeding, and the fact of the son's having taken upon himself the prosecution of it, are facts common to both parties, and show that the covenant was not merely voluntary ; leaving the question to be considered how far it can be objected to upon the ground of the consideration being inadequate. The situation of the parties and the properties in question, appear to me to afford a complete answer to this objection. The son was in possession of the family estate, but as tenant for life only ; from the relative ages of the father and of the son, and of the supposed lunatic, the probability was much in favour of the son, by the death of his father before the lunatic, succeeding as heir to whatever estate might descend from him ; but there was a strong apprehension, and, as the event proved, a great probability, that without * active measures to counteract the fraudulent projects of * 318 others, no part of the lunatic's estate would descend to either of them. It may well be supposed to have been an object of the father, who is proved to have been anxious for the reunion of the two estates, that the lunatic's estate should be settled in the same manner as the family estates. The agreement with the son effected all that could be done to secure the lunatic's estate to the family, and, if it should descend to the father, secured its reunion with the family property. By what scale of money consideration are these objects to be estimated ? The impossibility of estimating them has led to the exemption of family arrangements from the rules which affect others. The consideration in this and in other such cases is compounded partly of value and partly of love and affection. The ages of the parties made the father's expectancy of but little value ; but if he had been certain of himself succeeding as heir to the lunatic, his own personal use of the estate would probably have been confined to a life-interest. This, in ordinary cases, would have been the natural course, and not likely to be departed from where the father had expressed his anxious wish that the two estates should be held together. But there were several younger children unprovided for, and it is assumed that the father must have desired the dominion over the estate for the purpose of making some further provision for them. Experience does not prove that the wants of the younger children generally induce fathers to deprive the eldest son of much of the inheritance ; but, in this case, it is proved that upon being distinctly asked the question, he answered, that he did not wish to have any power over the estate for that purpose. If this be true,—and it is sworn to by

plained. There is no allegation or proof that it was part of the agreement that the father should have such powers. The omission of these powers forms no part of the father's case; but if the contract be otherwise binding, is the absence of such powers in an arrangement between a father and son such cogent proof of imposition as to invalidate it? The arrangement of 1830 is open to the same objection, and I cannot but consider the parties interested under that settlement as the real defendants in this case. The father appears to have but little, if any, interest in the contest. That arrangement of 1830 took place with sufficient notice of the previous arrangement with the eldest son, and therefore cannot prevail against it, if such prior arrangement was in itself binding.

Being of opinion that the objections stated to this arrangement are not available for the purpose of depriving the appellant of the benefit of it, I am also of opinion that he is entitled to have it completed by a decree; and as the timber has been cut with full knowledge of the appellant's title, and in defiance of the father's covenant, I think it impossible to deny to the appellant the account he prays upon that subject. I think also that the decree below ought to have been made in his favour with costs. There can be no costs of the appeal.

LORD WYNFORD.—In wading through these very long pleadings, I should have thought there were many important questions which were submitted to your Lordships' consideration, but that can make no difference in the conclusion to which I shall come;

because I am decidedly of opinion, upon a view of the

learned friend has advised your Lordships to give is a correct judgment. There certainly are many points in the case which were touched upon by the counsel at the bar, which are not raised by the pleadings. I think your Lordships cannot, with propriety, take any notice of those, as nothing can be more dangerous in the administration of justice than to allow your decisions to be affected by matters which are not pleaded. If the attention of the opposite party had been called to such points, he might have given a denial or a satisfactory explanation of such matters, which, by the course of pleading, he has been prevented from doing. The Court would, therefore, if it decided on those matters, be deciding on matters which it has been prevented from fully and satisfactorily hearing.

The points which are not adverted to in the pleadings are, first, that the respondent was not told that it was not necessary that he should take out a commission of lunacy, as it was competent to any other person to take it out; secondly, that he was not told that, if he succeeded, he would be paid out of the estate costs taxed as between attorney and client, that is, the whole of his expenses; thirdly, that the consideration was not sufficient to support the conveyance. It might be observed that the only consideration that was at first introduced, was that of natural love and affection, and it was not until after it was discovered that the consideration did not prevent a subsequent conveyance from getting rid of it, that any other consideration was introduced. But this is an objection that should not be made unless it be specifically pointed out by the pleadings. Now, the sufficiency of consideration depends on many circumstances, which * may be proved by evidence, if the atten- * 321 tion of the opposite party had been called to them. The deed of 1830, by which this conveyance is attempted to be set aside, is liable to great suspicion; it seems to be only colourable; the price is only eight years' purchase, and that is not to be paid till after the purchaser has got possession. The fourth objection is, that the conveyance was obtained by maintenance and champerty; the fifth, that the life-estate was made unimpeachable of waste, and that no power of leasing was given to the tenant for life.

The two questions, as it occurs to me, on the determination of which your Lordships' judgment should depend are, first, was the respondent deceived by being prevailed upon to execute a deed, which conveyed Parsons Persse's estate absolutely to the appellant, which deed he was made to believe was only a security upon the estate for the expenses that the appellant was likely to incur by taking out and prosecuting the commission of lunacy against Parsons Persse? In support of this objection, the respondent urges that the deed was prepared by the appellant's attorney, a person whom he had never employed, and that it was executed at Lord Guillamore's house, who was the appellant's father-in-law, in which the respondent, who had never visited Lord Guillamore before, had resided for a fortnight, surrounded by his lordship's family. It is not true that the respondent had never employed the attorney before; he had employed him many years ago when respondent was a bankrupt, and he had since been employed by the respondent's man of business; and the respondent must have known that, for he must have paid the attorney's bills for the business that was then done. On this occa-

* 322 sion the attorney was employed by the * appellant, who sent the attorney to the respondent to prevail on him to sue out a commission against Parsons Persse. He persuaded the respondent to visit the appellant, and the appellant succeeded in getting him to go to Dublin to give instructions for the commission of lunacy and for this deed. As the respondent had never before partaken of the hospitalities of Lord Guillamore, it would have been more delicate in the appellant not to have taken the respondent to his lordship's house on this occasion. But are these circumstances to disturb a solemn deed? Yet these are all which the respondent can bring forward. On the other hand, there are many witnesses of great respectability who prove that the respondent himself gave instructions for the deed; that it was read over to him at the time of its execution; that he expressed his intention to execute such a deed before it was executed, and declared that he should do this to unite the two estates in the same person; and that, after the deed was executed, he told another gentleman that he had executed such a deed, and declared he had done it with the same object as that which he had mentioned to the gentleman to whom he had said that he would make such a disposition. Whatever circumstances of suspicion may hang about it, one can scarcely conceive a stronger case. O'Connor has sworn that he took the instructions for the deed from the respondent's own mouth: those instructions, although departed from in some respects, were to prepare a conveyance of the estate to the appellant for his own use, and were not authorizing him to prepare a security for the expenses to be incurred. O'Connor, the two O'Gradys, and Nolan, swear that the deed was distinctly read over to the respondent before it was executed by him. This is confirmed by

* 323 * Adams and Lambert, one of whom swears that the respondent spoke to him before the deed was executed, of his intention to unite the two estates, and the other swears that some time after the deed was executed the respondent told him that he had executed a deed by which he had provided for the union of these estates.

The second question that it appears to me is raised by the pleadings; as I have already stated, is perfectly immaterial with respect to the judgment on the case. Did the respondent execute the deed under the pressure of distress which the appellant had occasioned by the non-payment of the annuity payable to him by the appellant out of the Roxborough estate? Considering the amount of that annuity, compared with the rental of the estate out of which it was to be paid, and that the respondent had only this annuity to subsist upon, I cannot find sufficient excuse upon the evidence for the irregularity with which it was paid. But this defence is inconsistent with the case before made by the respondent: he was not likely to be induced by distress to execute a deed which was to provide for the security of money to be expended for a purpose beneficial, although not in any equal degree, to both parties. A man under the pressure of distress may execute deeds to obtain the means of supplying his present wants, but not to provide for any remote advantage. The hope of advantage here was very remote indeed: as Parsons Persse had by will given his estate from this branch of the family, and as it was so difficult to get him found a lunatic that one jury summoned to try that question had been discharged without finding a verdict, I do not think there was any great probability that it ever would have been realized. I cannot think that your Lordships can say that this deed was * executed under * 324 the influence of distress. Whether the execution of that deed were a wise act on the part of the respondent or not, I think it was executed by him with a full knowledge of what he was doing, and for the attainment of the object that he stated to Adams and Lambert he had in his contemplation when he executed it; and I cannot conceive that the straitness of his circumstances could have contributed to influence him to make that conveyance. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, the decree of the Court below set aside, and the directions proposed by my noble friend should be given.

Ordered that the decree be reversed: declared that the appellants are entitled to the benefit of the indenture of the 8th of December, 1827, and of the covenants and agreements therein contained; and that the indenture of the 9th of June, 1830, is to be considered as fraudulent and void, so far as it affects or interferes with the indenture of December, 1827; and ordered that, with this declaration, the cause be remitted to the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

Road Acts, Construction. Title to sue. Practice. Liability of Sureties.

On the true construction of the general Turnpike-Road Acts for Scotland (4 Geo. 4, c. 49, and 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 43), the clerk appointed by trustees of district roads under a local Act, may, as their representative, sue and be sued on their account in his own name; and he is the proper person to bring an action against their treasurer's sureties for payment of balances due from the treasurer. (Williamson v. Goldie questioned, infra, p. 342.)

Quære, whether the trustees can authorize their clerk so to sue or defend, independently of the statutory provisions? For, if by the rule of practice in the Scotch Courts (which constitutes the law of Scotland, and therefore is not to be disturbed on appeal, without full inquiry into the grounds of it), a party having himself a right to sue, can enable another to maintain a suit in such other person's name, without assigning to him the subject-matter of the suit, consequences inconsistent with the principles of justice would flow from such practice. (Infra, p. 343.)

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that a defender whose name has been omitted per incuriam from the conclusions of the summons, is not to be permitted to have recourse to that omission as a fatal objection to the whole process, after his defences preliminary and on the merits have been repelled. The defect was cured by the acts and acquiescence of the defender and of his representative sisted in his place. (Infra, p. 344.)

The treasurer appointed by district road trustees having absconded with the trust funds; Held (affirming the judgment of the Court below), that a cautioner for the faithful discharge of his office was liable to the trustees for the balances due from the treasurer, although at several prior audits of his accounts they were guilty of neglect of their duty, by allowing him to retain in his hands balances far exceeding the amount allowed by the terms of the bond of caution, without requiring payment and without notice to the cautioner.

The rule as to the liability of sureties in a bond is the same in Scotland as in England, viz., that they are not to be discharged from their obligations unless the contract between them and the obligees is varied by a positive contract between the obligees and the principal, without notice to the sureties. It is the duty of a surety to see that his principal performs his obligations.¹ (Infra, p. 346.)

THE actions in which this and another appeal (hereinafter mentioned) between the same parties originated, * were raised before the sheriff of Ayrshire, and afterwards by * 326 advocacy brought before the Court of Session. The claim made was resisted upon certain objections (after noticed) to the title of the respondent to pursue, and to the regularity of the proceedings, and also upon the merits.

The facts, as to the present appeal, were these :—The subsisting Road Act for the county of Ayr (a) was passed on the 21st of June, 1827, and at the first meeting of the county trustees, held at Ayr, on the 11th of July following, authority was given to the committees appointed for the management of the different lines of road under a former Act, “to continue the management of the turnpike-roads connected with their districts under the present Act, until the first Wednesday in August next, taking along with them the new trustees appointed by the present Act, having interest in the parishes through which the particular lines of road pass, and to recommend to the former conveners to call meetings for the purpose of appointing clerks, cashiers, and collectors,” &c. By virtue of that authority, a meeting of the trustees for the district of Lochlibo was held at Beith on the 27th of July, when Robert Rankin, junior, was appointed treasurer of roads in that district; and on the 2d of August, he and his cautioners executed a bond, which, after reciting the new Act, and the election of the treasurer, &c., proceeded thus: “We, R. Rankin, junior, as principal, and Robert Dunlop and Patrick Creighton, as cautioners, bind and oblige ourselves, jointly and severally, and our heirs and executors, * that I, R. * 327 Rankin, junior, shall not only duly and faithfully execute the said office of treasurer, but also from time to time, &c., hold just count and payment to the said trustees, or a quorum of them, of my intromissions with the funds of the said road, and any other road that may be put under the management of the said committee, and of all moneys that shall be paid over to me as treasurer, &c.; and particularly that all moneys to be received by me shall be lodged in bank, &c., and that I shall at no time keep in my hand more than 20*l.* for answering contingencies. All this under the penalty of 200*l.* sterling."

At a general meeting of the county trustees, held at Ayr, on the 1st of August, 1827, the permanent appointment of trustees for the care of district roads took place, and among others, the Lochlibo district trustees were appointed to take charge of three roads: 1, the Lochlibo road; 2, an intended road from Lochlibo to the road between Ayr and Irvine (not yet made); and 3, the Monkredding road, which was made in 1828; so that the treasurer of the Lochlibo road was also treasurer of the Monkredding road funds.

In June, 1833, R. Rankin, the treasurer, absconded, taking with him funds belonging to the Lochlibo road, amounting, as ultimately ascertained, to 367*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*; and at a meeting of the district trustees, held on the 14th of June, 1833, it was resolved "to instruct Robert Rankin, their clerk (the respondent), to take such measures, judicial or otherwise, as might be necessary for obtaining possession of the books and other papers belonging to the trust, which were under charge of the treasurer, and to uplift and discharge the balances due by him to the trust, and, if necessary, to sue him and his cautioners for any defalcation."

* 328 * Under that authority, the respondent, on the 6th of July, 1833, raised an action before the sheriff of Ayrshire against the treasurer, and the said Patrick Creighton, and Mrs. Dunlop, relict, and Jean Dunlop, daughter of the other cautioner, who was then deceased. The summons, after setting forth the title of the pursuer, as "Clerk to the committee of road trustees for the Lochlibo district, as representing the said committee, and duly and specially authorized by a general meeting thereof, held at Beith," &c., narrated the appointment of the treasurer, the bond by him and his cautioners, and the fact of his having absconded without accounting for the funds in his hands; and that the pursuer, in the name of the said committee of trustees, had often requested the said R. Rankin, junior, as principal, and Patrick Creighton, and the said other defenders, as cautioners, to hold just count, &c., with the pursuer, for said trustees, of the said R. Rankin's intromissions with the funds of the different lines of road within the Lochlibo district, and of all other moneys paid over to him as treasurer foresaid, &c. The conclusions of the summons, by an error, omitted the name of Patrick Creighton, and were to this effect: that the said R. Rankin, junior, as principal, and Mrs. Dunlop and Jean Dunlop, representatives of R. Dunlop, as cautioners, defenders, should be decerned jointly and severally, &c., to produce R. Rankin junior's accounts of his intromissions as treasurer; that "the said defenders, as principal and cautioners foresaid," should be decerned, jointly and severally, to pay the pursuer, for behoof of the said committee of trustees, so much as should appear to be due from the said treasurer to the said committee; and that "the said defenders, as principal and cautioners foresaid," should be decerned in like manner to pay the penalty * of 200*l.*, stipulated in the * 329 bond, for having unfaithfully executed the affairs of the trust.

To this action Patrick Creighton alone entered defences, raising various objections; 1st, to the respondent's title to pursue; and 2d, to his claim on the merits, on the ground that the trustees had, by neglecting their duties, discharged the defender from all obligations of his bond. He did not at all notice the omission of his name from the conclusions of the summons. The pursuer, however, in order to rectify the error, raised a supplementary action, concluding regularly against the defender, Patrick Creighton, as against the other defenders. P. Creighton, after taking objections to the competency of this action, made the same defences to it that he had made to the original action.

The sheriff, by an interlocutor of the 24th of June, 1834,—adhered to by an interlocutor of the 29th of July,—repelled the preliminary defence as to the respondent's title to pursue, remitted the supplementary to the original action ob contingentiam, and found that the trustees, or those appointed by them, in terms of the bond, were entitled to call the defenders to account.

At that stage of the cause Patrick Creighton died, and the appellant desiring to be sisted as a defender in the cause, the sheriff, by an interlocutor of the 24th of March, 1835, sisted him as defender in room of his deceased brother, and transferred the action against him accordingly, and ordered the parties to give in mutual condescendences. A record having been accordingly made up on condescendences and answers, the sheriff, by an interlocutor of the 15th of December, 1835,—adhered to by two interlocutors of the 19th and 26th of January, 1836,— "finds it averred * by the pursuer, and not denied by the * 330 defender, that the treasurer's accounts were regularly and yearly lodged with the pursuer, as district clerk of the road trustees, from the treasurer's appointment in 1827, until the year previous to his elopement in the end of May or beginning of June, 1833 ; and that the same were examined and docketed by the trustees, and afterwards by a committee appointed by the general meeting, by whom the same were passed from year to year : finds that the cautioners were bound with the treasurer, that he should not only duly and faithfully execute the said office of treasurer" (the interlocutor stated the extract of the bond before set forth) : " finds, therefore, that it was the duty of the cautioners to see that the said R. Rankin, junior, duly and faithfully executed the duties of his office of treasurer, by accounting for his intromissions, and complying with the terms of the bond which they came under : therefore, repels the defences for the defender, George Creighton, as to his liability as the representative of the original cautioner and defender, Patrick Creighton."

By another interlocutor of the 15th of March, 1836, the sheriff decerned against the defenders, R. Rankin, junior, as principal, and George Creighton, as cautioner, jointly and severally, for payment of the sum of 367*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* sterling, in terms of the state produced, with interest thereon, as libelled : " finds them also liable in expenses of process" (which were found by another interlocutor of the 4th of April to amount to 16*l.* 16*s.*) : " finds the defender, Mrs. Dunlop, as executrix to her husband, only liable for the amount confirmed to the general body of her husband's creditors, after deduction of all preferable claims ; and quoad ultra, assoilzies her and Jean Dunlop from the conclusions of the action."

* 331 * The appellant, by letters of advocacy, brought these nine interlocutors under review of the Court of Session. In the condescendence and case presented by him to that Court, founding his defence (under reservation of the preliminary defences before stated) on the alleged improper conduct and neglect of the committee of road trustees, he set forth inter alia, the 17th and 18th sections (a) of the late general Turnpike Act for Scotland

(a) The 17th section enacts, that " All such officers as shall be appointed by any trustees of any turnpike-road, shall, as often as required by the trustees, render and give to them, or to such person as they shall for that purpose appoint, a true, exact, and perfect account in writing under their respective hands, with the proper vouchers, of all moneys which they shall respectively, to the time of rendering such accounts, have received, paid, and disbursed by virtue of this or any turnpike Act, or for or on account, or by reason of their respective offices ; and in case any money so received by any

(4 Geo. 4, c. 49, the provisions of which are re-enacted by the corresponding sections of the existing general Turnpike Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 43, and extended to all Turnpike Acts in Scotland), the 22d section (a) of the local Turnpike Act (7 & 8

* Geo. 4, c. 109), and various reports and resolutions of the * 332 general meetings of the road trustees, enjoining on the district trustees the most rigid adherence to their orders for the regular production and annual auditing of the accounts of the different treasurers; and insisted that the road trustees for the district of Lochlibo, constantly, since the date of the bond of caution, acted in violation thereof, and of the said Acts of Parliament, reports and resolutions, and evinced gross negligence and remissness in reference to the intromissions and accounts of their said treasurer, and allowed him to retain in his hands large sums of money, without any intimation to the cautioners, so as to discharge them from the obligations of their bond.

As instances of the negligence imputed to the district trustees, the appellant stated two occasions on which they allowed the treasurer's accounts of one year to run into the next as far as the middle of June or beginning of July, instead of settling and closing them on the 26th of May, as required by the 22d section of such officer shall remain in his hands, the same shall be paid to the trustees, or to such person as they shall in writing under their hand authorize and empower to receive the same," &c.

The 18th section enacts, "That the trustees of every turnpike-road shall, and they are hereby required, either by themselves or some committee of their number, annually to examine the vouchers and audit, and settle the accounts of the respective clerks and treasurers appointed by them, and to examine into the state of the revenues and debts of the several roads for which they act, and to make up abstracts of such accounts, which abstracts shall contain a statement of the revenues and debts of the trust, and also an account of all bonds given by the trustees, and the dates thereof," &c.

(a) That section enacts, "That the trustees who shall be appointed for the special care and management of any district, or particular roads, shall be subject to the control of the general meetings of the trustees appointed by this Act, for their proceedings in the matters committed to them, and shall be accountable to the said general meetings for their intromissions with the revenues and management of the affairs of such district or road; and for these purposes they shall, on or before the 31st day of July yearly, transmit to the clerk of the general meetings a state of the revenues of such district or road, and of the expenditure thereon, and an account of all other transactions for the year ending on the 26th day of May preceding; also a list of all debts affecting the same; in order that the same may be laid before the general meeting on the first Wednesday of August yearly, under a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* sterling."

the local Act; and as to sums left by them in the treasurer's hands, he averred that the balance due by him on the accounts for the Lochlibo road, on the 13th of June, 1828, the day on which his accounts were examined for that year, was 119*l.*, of which there was then only 20*l.* in the bank, so that 99*l.* were allowed to remain in his hands; and on the 4th of July and 22d of December of the same year, on which days there were

* 333 meetings of the trustees, they * allowed 110*l.* at the former date, and 103*l.* at the latter, to remain in his hands, instead of 20*l.* as allowed by the bond of caution, and without any notice to the cautioners. Going through the accounts, as appeared by the treasurer's books in each year, from June, 1828, to the 15th of February, 1833, the appellant showed that the balances allowed to remain in the treasurer's hands varied from 100*l.* to 264*l.*; and that on the 4th of June, 1833, when the trustees met after the treasurer absconded, the sum then declared to be due from him was 367*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

The following pleas in law were entered for the appellant: First, as to the objections before noticed, to the competency of the action: "1. The respondent had no title to sue as clerk to district road trustees; it is only the clerk or treasurer to the general road trustees of the county that is authorized to sue and be sued for behoof of or as representing his constituents (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 43; Williamson v. Goldie, 2 March, 1832, 10 Sh. & D. 413). 2. The directions which a meeting of the committee of the district road trustees are said to have given to the respondent, merely amounted to an authority to bring an action otherwise competent and legal, and did not vest any right or title in the respondent himself to pursue at his own instance." Secondly, as to the objections to the omission in the conclusions of the original libel: "1. There were no termini habiles for pronouncing decree against the advocator under the conclusions of the original action. 2. The supplementary action afterwards brought by the respondent had not the effect of making the advocator a party to the original action, or of validating the procedure against him, in respect these actions never were conjoined." Thirdly, as to the

3. In respect of their not having intimated the omissions of the principal debtor to the cautioners, till long after the principal had absconded."

The respondent, in his answers and case, set forth several sections of the general Turnpike Act for Scotland (the effects of which are before stated in part, and again by the Lord Chancellor in his judgment), and of the said local Act; and showed, as to the state of the treasurer's accounts, that although large balances of the Lochlibo road funds appeared to have been in his hands from time to time, there was owing to him at the same time, up to May, 1831, large sums in respect of his advances for the Monkredding road, which was under the Lochlibo trust, but had no funds of its own. From May, 1831, to June, 1832, he admitted that the balances on both lines of road were against the treasurer, viz., 203*l.* in May, 1831, 145*l.* in May, 1832, and that the balance against him increased, in the year previous to his absconding, to 355*l.*, while the state of his accounts did not come before the trustees. His embarrassments or defalcations were not known to them, and it was the duty of the cautioners to look to his circumstances. It was unnecessary to give them notice of the balances against the treasurer, as they might have easily learned how matters stood, the accounts being, by the 23d section of the local Act, open in the treasurer's hands to the inspection of all persons interested.

* The following pleas in law were entered for the re- * 335
spondent. First, as to the objections of form: "1. The title to pursue libelled on in the summons is unexceptionable, and was justly sustained by the sheriff; the more especially having regard to the terms of the bond upon which the action is laid, and the provisions of the Road Acts referred to in the pleadings. 2. The decree pronounced on the merits against the advocator was in all respects regular, and no well-founded objection exists to that decerniture, either upon the ground of want of conjunction of the supplementary with the original process, or upon any other formal or technical ground. 3. The supplementary action having been remitted to the original action ob contingentiam, and having been thereafter held and recognized by the parties as part of the proceedings in the cause, and more especially the advocator's predecessor having pleaded on the merits, and gone to issue with the pursuer, and the advocator himself having afterwards sisted himself as defender in room of his brother deceased, any objection otherwise competent, on the ground of there having been no formal conjunction of the actions, is not now pleadable by the advocator. 4. There are not termini habiles for the objection that the supplementary summons was asleep before decree was pronounced; Ferrier v. Ross, 7th March, 1833; 11 Sh. & D. 531." Secondly, as to the merits: "1. The advocator was justly held liable for the intromissions of the treasurer with the road funds, to the extent found by the sheriff's interlocutors, which are in all respects wellfounded. 2. No sufficient or relevant defence in law has been stated or exists to liberate the advocator from his obligation, as representing his brother the original defender, * 336 on the * ground of violation of duty, negligence, want of due intimation, or mora, on the part of the trustees."

The Lord Ordinary (JEFFREY), on considering the cases, the 12th of May, 1837, reported the cause to the second division of the Court, stating his own opinion in a note on the points raised in the pleadings. (a) The Lords of the second division, by an interlocutor of the 18th of January, 1838, "repel the objection to the title of the pursuer, and the other objection stated by the advocator to the regularity of the proceedings in the inferior Court; and on the merits, before answer, allow the advocator within eight days to lodge a minute, and state in figures the amount of the balance at the last audit of the treasurer's accounts in the year 1832; and allow the respondent to answer the same, if necessary, within eight days thereafter." (a)

In obedience to that interlocutor, a minute was given in on behalf of the appellant, of the balances of the funds in the treasurer's hands at the last audit of his accounts in 1832-33; and an answer thereto on behalf of the respondent; and the cause having been again considered by the Court, along with that minute and answer, their Lordships, on the 6th of February, 1838, pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lords having advised the cases for the parties, and whole process, and heard counsel for the parties, repel the reasons of advocacy, adhere to the interlocutor of the sheriff submitted to review, remit simpliciter to the sheriff, and decern; find expenses due; allow an account to be given in, and remit the same when lodged to the auditor to tax and report."

* 337 * The auditor having afterwards taxed the costs and reported, their Lordships, by an interlocutor of the 9th of March, 1838, approved of the report, and decerned for payment thereof.

(a) See the judgments and the Lord Ordinary's note, 16 Dunl., B. & M. 454.

The present appeal was against the sheriff's nine interlocutors before stated, and against these three interlocutors of the Court of Session.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Anderson, for the appellant, in support of the objection to the respondent's title to bring the action, cited, among other cases, Crawford v. Mitchell, (a) Lawson v. Gordon, (b) Wilson v. Kippen, (c) and Williamson v. Goldie, (d) in which last case it was held that the 16th section of the general Turnpike Act authorized the clerk of the general trustees, and not the clerk of district trustees, to sue or be sued.

In support of the objection, that as the summons in the action did not, in its conclusion, mention the name of the defender, Patrick Creighton, whom the appellant represents, the action and all the proceedings in it failed altogether, they referred, among other cases, to Wedderburn v. Town of Dundee, (e) and distinguished the present case from that of Boyd v. Lang, (g) which was cited against the objection by the Lord Ordinary in the Court below.

On the merits, they submitted that the sureties were discharged from the obligations of their bond by the acts and omissions of the trustees, on three principal grounds: first, that the trustees so conducted themselves as to alter the condition and risk of the cautioners, as stipulated or contemplated when the bond * of caution was granted; secondly, that they violated or * 338 failed to observe the duties and obligations made incumbent upon them by the Road Acts, and which formed conditions precedent to the enforcement of the cautionary obligation; and, thirdly, that they not only suffered the treasurer to act in opposition to the rules and regulations of his office, but connived with and encouraged him in their violation, and otherwise conducted themselves towards him with gross negligence: and in support of these propositions they cited the English cases of Montague v. Tidcombe, (h) Stratton v. Rastall, (i) Eyre v. Bartrop, (k) Bowmaker v. Moore, (l) Bacon v. Chesney, (m) Smith v. Bank of Scotland; (n) and the following among other Scotch cases: University of Glasgow v. Earl of Selkirk, (o) Dick v. Nisbet, (p) Pringle v.

Tate, (a) and Fell on Guarantees, p. 180 ; and they distinguished this case from that of Mactaggart v. Watson, (b) the decision of which by this House they submitted was not adverse to the appellant's case.

The Lord Advocate and Sir W. Follett, for the respondent, — after referring to the terms of the bond, and to the provisions of the Road Acts, — contended that the title of the respondent to institute the action, as clerk of and representing the committee of road trustees, was beyond all exception. Wilson v. Kippen, (c) Low v. Lord Arbuthnot, (d) Oswald v. Lawrie, (e) and Gemmels v. Barclay. (g)

With respect to the objection of form to the omission * 339 * of the original defender's name from the conclusion of the summons, they submitted that the supplementary summons cured that defect, and that the appellant was, at all events, precluded by his acts and acquiescence from taking that objection, after, by his own desire, he was sisted as defender in the action, and proceeded with his defences preliminary and substantial to a decree against him.

On the third point, they submitted that there was no sufficient ground on the merits, regard being had to the facts of the case, to discharge the appellant from the obligations of the bond. Their line of argument on this part of the case was the same as that which the Lord Chancellor pursues in moving the judgment of the House on the case. They cited Nares v. Rowles, (h) The Trent Navigation Company v. Harley, (i) Eyre v. Everett, (k) and Mactaggart v. Watson. (l)

The second appeal was between the same parties, against interlocutors pronounced in a similar action brought by the same pursuer, as “ clerk of the committee of road trustees for the district of Irvine, and as representing that committee,” for recovering a balance of 325*l.* due for the intromissions of the said R. Rankin, Jr., who had been appointed treasurer by that committee, in July, 1827, over three lines of road within their district, viz., the Kellybridge road, the Girdle road, and the Stewarton road ; and a bond of caution, with the same sureties in the same terms as were contained in the bond given by them to the Lochlibo district trustees. This action was also brought before the sheriff of Ayrshire, went on simultaneously with the former, similar defences were made, and * similar interlocutors were pro- * 340 nounced, both before the sheriff and upon advocacy before the Court of Session; against all which the appellant appealed.

The same counsel, on both sides, argued this appeal on the 18th of May.

May 26.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The pursuer in this case is described in the summons as “clerk of the committee of trustees of the Lochlibo district,” and “as representing the said committee, and duly and specially authorized by a general meeting thereof.” If, therefore, the pursuer can maintain his title to pursue, in either character, the first preliminary objection must fail. Lord JEFFREY, the Lord Ordinary, was inclined to support the pursuer’s title upon both grounds. (a) I do not understand the other Judges to have expressed any opinion upon the first ground, viz., the title to pursue under the statute. (b) This is to be regretted, as both points are of considerable importance and of general application.

I have thought it my duty to look into that statute, now the general Road Act for Scotland, for the purpose of forming my opinion. The 9th section authorizes trustees, acting under any Turnpike Act, to divide the roads comprised in such Act into districts, to name committees of their number for the more immediate direction and management of such roads, or particular parts thereof; and the regulations in former sections enacted are to apply to and to affect all such committees. The 11th section of the former statute (4 Geo. 4, c. 49), gives to the trustees, in their district or committee meetings, full power to appoint clerks and * collectors and treasurers, with salaries; but the 10th * 341 section of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 43, gives the power to trustees acting under any Turnpike Act, in which the district committees clearly are included; and the 11th section of that Act directs the trustees of every turnpike-road to take security from every treasurer to be appointed by them. By the 10th section the district trustees are to appoint a treasurer. The security directed by the 11th section must be given by the treasurer, so to be appointed, to the district trustees, who are so to appoint him. The 13th, 14th, and 15th sections contain regulations for the conduct of the trustees, in which they are described as "trustees of every turnpike-road;" and the 16th section, using the same description, enacts that the trustees of every turnpike-road may sue or be sued in the name of their clerk or treasurer, and provides that his costs shall be paid out of the trust funds of the road for which he shall act. The 17th section provides that all such officers as shall be appointed by the trustees of any turnpike-road shall account with them, and in default the sheriff is to act on the application of the said trustees; and by the 18th section, the trustees of every turnpike-road are by themselves, or some committee of their number, annually to examine, settle, and audit the accounts, and make abstracts of them.

(a) 16 Dunl., B. & M. 453.

(b) 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 43, § 16.

The result of those several provisions of the general Act appears to me to be, that when the road under any Turnpike Act is divided into districts, and a part assigned to a committee of the trustees, that committee are the trustees for the purposes of that part of the road so assigned, and as such have all the powers and authorities given by the Act, though subject to the direction and control of the general body of trustees; and

* 342 that they have the power of appointing the clerk * and treasurer of such road; that they are to take security from such clerk and treasurer; and that the clerk so appointed is, under the 16th section, when necessary, the proper person to sue upon the security so given by the treasurer to such committee of trustees. I certainly am not able to reconcile the expressions attributed to some of the Judges in Williamson v. Goldie, (a) with this construction of the statute. That case was not brought to this House, and Lord JEFFREY thinks that, from the circumstances of that case, it is not necessarily a decision adverse to this construction. Be that as it may, it cannot, in this House, operate against our adopting a construction of the statute which appears to be the correct one, and which is necessary for the due operation of its several provisions. The particular road, or part of a road, being assigned to a committee of trustees, they are to appoint the officer for such road or part of a road; they are to take security and to audit his accounts; and they, to whom this security is given, are, by their clerk so appointed by them, to enforce against the surety the payment of the balance found due from the treasurer appointed by them, upon the examination and audit of his accounts.

If this be the right construction of the statute, the pursuer's title to sue is established without the necessity of considering the other ground upon which it appears to have been principally supported by the Judges of the Inner House. I certainly feel relieved by not being under the necessity of expressing any conclusive opinion upon that subject; a question purely of practice, which has been thought free from difficulty in the Court below, and as to which, from * that cause probably, we are * 343 without any reasons given for the opinion expressed by the Judges. Upon a question of practice, the rule of the Scotch Courts, constituting as it does the law of Scotland, must prevail, and upon such a subject your Lordships would be most unwilling to disturb a deliberate judgment of the Court of Session. If any case should come before this House, calling for a decision upon that point, your Lordships will be anxious to be informed more fully as to the practice of the Courts of Scotland upon the subject, and as to the reasons upon which any decision upon it may be founded. No such practice exists in this country; and if by the law of Scotland a party having himself a right to sue can, by such directions as were given in this case, enable another to maintain a suit in his own name, it will be necessary to consider many consequences which may flow from such a rule. In that case the usual provision in Acts of Parliament, that companies or other bodies may sue by their officer, will be unnecessary in Scotland; and if the power exists only to enable a company to authorize a person to maintain a suit, and does not render the company liable to be sued in the name of the same person, it would appear that consequences may follow which are not consistent with obvious principles of justice. Here I must be understood as speaking of transactions which do not amount to assignments of the subject-matter of the suit, but which leave the property in such subject-matter, and therefore the fruits of the suit, in the party giving the authority to sue. These and many other considerations will, no doubt, receive all due examination by the Court of Session, in any case in which a similar question may be raised. I shall only further observe that the 109th section (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 43) does not * aid the * 344 proposition contended for; because, if that section enables any person authorized by the trustees to sue for the penalties, that authority is conferred by the statute ; whereas the argument in this case assumes a right of delegating the power to sue independently of any statutable provision.

As to the objection that Creighton was not named in the conclusion to the summons, I cannot but express my satisfaction that the learned Judges of the Court of Session have not found anything in the practice of that Court to compel them to give effect to such an objection. The summons does not in its conclusions name Creighton, but it states previously that Rankin, the principal, and Creighton and the other defenders as cautioners, had been applied to for payment, and had refused, unless compelled ; and then, omitting the name of Creighton, but stating the name of the principal and of the other defenders, concludes that the said principal and cautioners aforesaid might be decreed to pay, &c. To this summons Patrick Creighton appeared and put in defences, but did not raise this objection. After his death, his representative, the present appellant, sisted himself as a defender in this process in his place, but did not raise this objection, and the suit proceeding against him without this objection being made in the sheriff's court, a decree for payment was pronounced against him. It would have been much to be regretted, if, under such circumstances, the whole proceedings could have been set aside by the mere omission of the name of Creighton in the conclusion of the summons. In the case of Capel v. Buller, (a) Sir JOHN LEACH, V. C., refused to permit a party who had appeared at the hearing, and consented to be bound by the decree, * 345 afterwards to * object that he had never been served with process, or appeared to the suit.

The case then remains to be considered upon its merits. The appellant is sued as the representative of Patrick Creighton, who became bound to the committee of trustees of the Lochlibo road as surety for Robert Rankin, Jr., treasurer of that road, that he would faithfully execute his office, and from time to time, and as often as required, account for and make payment to the road trustees of his intromissions with the funds of the road, and of all moneys that should be paid to him as such treasurer. It was also provided by the bond, that all moneys to be received by the treasurer should be lodged in the bank in his name, and that he should at no time keep in his hands more than 20*l.* to answer contingencies. The conduct of the trustees, the parties assured, is made the ground on which the non-liability of the surety is rested: and as a most learned Judge, Lord JEFFREY, has expressed an opinion, although accompanied with much doubt, that the cautioners had thereby been discharged; and as it is of much importance that the rule of law in Scotland upon this subject should not remain in doubt; I think it right to go into some consideration of it, although the four Judges of the second division agreed in opinion that the surety was not discharged; in which opinion I entirely concur.

The ground upon which Lord JEFFREY thought that the cautioners were discharged was, that the trustees had neglected at the annual audits to require payment of part of the balance then in the treasurer's hands, and to direct the application of such part of the balance, being of opinion that there was no impropriety in there being in his hands part of such balances to meet * the current expenses; and therefore he thought * 346 that the cautioners might, upon that ground, be relieved, notwithstanding the decision of this House in the case of Mac-taggart v. Watson. (a) In that case the defence of the cautioner was that the commissioners had neglected the duty prescribed by statute, in not calling the trustee to account from 1826 to 1829, and upon that ground the Court of Session thought the cautioner relieved; but when the case came to this House, the noble and learned lord (Lord BROUGHAM) who advised the House, observed truly, "that very dangerous doctrines on suretyship obligations appear to be suggested in some of the cases in Scotland:" (b) the interlocutors appealed from were reversed, and the surety was declared to be liable. That case is of the highest importance, as it removes the authority of some early cases in Scotland, which are not consistent with it, and makes the rule applicable to such cases the same in Scotland as in England. Indeed it has not been contended at the bar that the rule in the two countries is different. Upon the rule in England there is no doubt. It is familiar to every lawyer, and I am glad to be able to expound it in the terms in which a Judge of the highest authority has laid it down, and which I think entirely correct. Lord ELDON says, in the case of Samuell v. Howarth, (c) "The rule is this, — that if a creditor, without the consent of a surety, gives time to the principal debtor, by so doing he discharges the surety; that is, if time is given by virtue of positive contract between the creditor and the principal; — not where the creditor is merely inactive. And, in the case put, the surety is held] to be discharged, for this reason, because the creditor by so

 * 347 giving time to the principal, has put it * out of the power of the surety to consider whether he will have recourse to his remedy against the principal or not; and because he, in fact, cannot have the same remedy against the principal as he would have had under the original contract.” In Eyre v. Everett, (a) a delay of five years, during which the obligee had not sued the principal, was urged as an exoneration of the surety, but the same learned Judge held the surety liable; and this rule of law is so well understood in this country, and so well explained by Lord ELDON, that it is not necessary to enter into an investigation of any other cases on the subject.

What, then, are the facts of the present case with reference to this rule? The accounts were regularly examined and audited, and it may be assumed that it was the duty of the trustees not to leave more money in the hands of the treasurer than might be necessary for the current expenses of the road, and that, in fact, more was left in his hands than was necessary for that purpose; but there is no evidence of any alteration in the terms of the contract to which the surety was a party; nothing that could have precluded the trustees from requiring payment of the balance found due. There was, therefore, nothing more than an omission to require payment; and although this might be a neglect of the duty imposed upon the trustees by the Act, it does not for that reason operate more strongly in favour of the surety, than a similar neglect of the course of proceeding which the surety might, from the usual course of business, or the routine of trade, or the nature of the transaction, have been led to expect would take place. Such neglect can only be urged in his favour as placing him in a different situation, and exposing him to
 * 348 greater risk, * than he had intended; and this effect is produced by every omission in keeping the principal punctual to his payments; but such omission cannot be pleaded as an exoneration of the surety.

It was truly said that the trustees had improperly sanctioned the treasurer's applying the balances in his hands for the Lochlibo road, to defray the expenses of the Monkredding road; and

this I think appears to be the case ; for I cannot think that the Monkredding road can be considered as included in this bond ; but that does not appear to me to be material, as the facts arise in this case. If, indeed, the attempt had been to make the surety repay balances from the Lochlibo trust, which the treasurer had, with the consent of the trustees, applied in repaying to himself balances due to him upon the Monkredding road, a question would arise whether such application of the Lochlibo trust balances was not equivalent to payment to the trustees, for the purpose of relieving the sureties from a claim for so much of the balances as were so applied ; but no such case arises. The appellant, in his revised case, states the annual balances of the Lochlibo trust in the treasurer's hands, and brings out 367*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* as the ultimate balance on the 4th of June, 1833 ; and he also shows the effect of including the Monkredding account, which does not materially affect the balance, as indeed it could not, the balance due to the treasurer on the Monkredding road in June, 1833, being only 10*l.* 15*s.* 2½*d.* ; and the appellant's minute, given in pursuant to the interlocutor of the 18th of January, 1838, shows that he has not, in the sum which he has been decreed to pay on account of the Lochlibo trust, been prejudiced by the manner in which that account has been blended with the account of the Monkredding road. It would, indeed, from that * minute, appear that a small part of * 349 the sum the surety has been decreed to pay consists of a balance due from the treasurer in respect of Monkredding road to 26th of May, 1833 ; but in the former part of his case, he states 10*l.* 15*s.* 5½*d.* to have been due to the treasurer on that account on the 4th June, 1833. I have not been able to reconcile these two statements ; but the difference, if any, must be very small, and no case is made for the appellant upon any such error in the accounts.

I am, on the whole, perfectly satisfied that the interlocutors appealed from are correct ; I shall, therefore, move your Lordships that they be affirmed, with costs ; for although the Lord Ordinary threw out an opinion upon the merits of the case, he came to no judgment, but made avizandum to the second division, and the judgment of the Inner House was unanimous.

In the other appeal, with respect to the Irvine trust, the circumstances do not appear materially to differ from those of the present case ; I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutors complained of in that appeal also be affirmed, with costs.

Interlocutors in both appeals affirmed, with costs.

Partnership, Shares in. Accounts, Mode of taking them.

R. and A. T. having carried on the business of navy agents as partners in equal shares, and R. having retired, leaving the partnership accounts unsettled, with large balances due to the firm from its customers, A. T. took C. into partnership, the customers' accounts were transferred to the new partnership books, and the business was carried on as before, until A.

T.'s death, without any agreement in writing, or settlement of ac-
* 350 counts between * these partners, or other evidence to show their shares in the concern. On a bill being filed by A. T.'s representatives against C. for an account, he stated that the agreement was "that if A. T. would bring into the partnership 40,000*l.* of good debts due from the customers to the former partnership, his share in the concern should be two-thirds and C.'s one-third, otherwise they should have equal shares;" and that, in consequence of A. T.'s not bringing in the 40,000*l.* of good debts, the agreement was varied accordingly. There were entries in the accounts debiting the partners equally with the prices of wines purchased, and with losses on transactions in the public funds; and one witness said that C. directed him in A. T.'s presence to make up the general partnership accounts in equal shares.

Held, that as it was established by a judgment in a former appeal, that the 40,000*l.* of good debts were brought into the new partnership according to the agreement, the event in which it was to be altered never occurred; and as the accounts were uniform and contained no evidence of an alteration, the partnership was continued in the proportion of two-thirds to A. T. and one-third to C.¹ (Infra, pp. 370, 373.)

Held, also, that in taking the accounts between C. and A. T., and between them and the former firm, the moneys paid in by the customers of both firms without specific appropriation or contract, were to be applied first in discharge of their debts to the former firm, according to the rule in Clayton's Case, although A. T., in an affidavit made by him in a suit between himself and R.'s representatives, swore that it was agreed between him and C. that the advances to be made by them to the creditors should be first repaid out of their payments, and the surplus only in liquidation of their debts to the former firm.² (Infra, pp. 375, 376.)

It requires a very strong case to induce the Lords to reverse a decree, nine years after its date, especially if that decree established no fact, adjudicated no right, but merely directed proper inquiries to obtain information for the Court, and the objects of it were exhausted, the appellant himself having joined in the inquiries and failed. (Infra, p. 369.)

p. 681), reversing an order of the Court of Exchequer, which disallowed an exception to the Master's separate report, and remitting the cause, with instructions to allow the exception, was * made an order of that Court; and in pursuance thereof, it was referred back to the Master to review his said report. The Master accordingly made another separate report on the 2d of July, 1835, and thereby certified that he found that Abraham Toulmin did bring into the partnership of Toulmin & Copland 40,000*l.* of good debts, which were owing to the former partnership of Richard and Abraham Toulmin, according to the true intent and meaning of the agreement mentioned in the decree made in the cause in 1828. And he further certified, "that he found, by the evidence laid before him, that the agreement was varied and altered after the commencement of the partnership between A. Toulmin and the appellant, and that it was agreed between them that they should carry on and be interested in the partnership in equal shares, and should receive and pay the profits and loss in equal moieties."

To this report the respondents took two exceptions; insisting by the first, that instead of the above finding, the Master ought to have found that the said agreement was not afterwards varied or altered; and by the second, that the Master had not stated under what circumstances and in what respects the agreement was varied and altered.

Those exceptions were argued before Lord ABINGER, C. B., who, by an order made on the 27th of February, 1836, allowed them, and directed the Master to review and vary his report. (a)

(a) The following are extracts from the short-hand writer's notes of his Lordship's observations during the argument:—"I do not see how to get over this part of the argument. The House of Lords has established and decided, that the 40,000*l.* were brought in in pursuance of the contract; and the only question is, whether, independent of that circumstance (the reason that Mr. Copland, in his affidavit, gave for the new agreement, having failed) any new agreement did take place. Chief Baron ALEXANDER, when he made the decree in 1828, had before him the whole of the evidence to sustain any inference of a new agreement that the Master had; the object of his reference to the Master afterwards was to give the advantage to Mr. Copland of adding more evidence before the Master than had appeared before the Court, to induce the Chief Baron to make a decision that there was a new agreement; because, if the evidence before the Chief Baron was sufficient to warrant the opinion that there was such a new agreement, it was the duty of the Chief Baron so to decide, and not to make this reference to the Master. He must have been of opinion that the evidence, as it then stood, was too doubtful for him to come to a decision that Copland and Toulmin had made a new agreement.

The Master accordingly, by his report, dated the * 30th * 352 of November, 1836, certified, that in obedience to the last-

The reference was made to give Copland an opportunity of producing new evidence before the Master. I don't know that any new evidence was produced : the onus probandi was thrown upon Copland. That appears to be the short view of the case."

His Lordship afterwards, in giving his judgment, observed : "I not only think that it was too doubtful to have come to the conclusion that a new agreement was made, assuming always, as the House of Lords declared, that Toulmin complied with his engagement according to the spirit of it, in the bringing in the 40,000*l.* good debts ; but I do not think the evidence referred to by Harrison, on the books, which is the only evidence besides that of Edmunds, at all justifies the inference.* That evidence, I must conclude, did not satisfy Chief Baron ALEXANDER, — did not justify him in drawing such an inference ; nor would it satisfy me.

"Supposing the fact to have been, which now I assume, that the original agreement was a partnership for two-thirds for Toulmin and one-third for Copland ; if any variation took place, it became important for Copland then to have that variation established by entries in the books, and by making up the partnership accounts. Now, Edmunds swears to a conversation that took place fourteen years before he gave his evidence. It is a long time to recollect a conversation of a precise character. He supposes, and I have no doubt believes, that he had that direction from Copland ; and he also believes that Toulmin heard him : that depends on the recollection of fourteen years. How very few men there are who could undertake, if they were cross-examined in a Court of Justice, vivâ voce, to swear positively to such a recollection ? I should doubt very much, assuming the fact that an agreement had been made for a partnership, and that the interest was divisible into thirds, — two-thirds to one man, and one-third to another, and no evidence whatever of any new agreement, — whether a jury would ever draw a conclusion, upon the memory of a witness of a conversation fourteen years back that he had received a direction so to make up the books, that that was evidence of the agreement. Where is the consideration for the alleged new agreement ? What change of circumstances had taken place to give rise to it ? It is argued very ingeniously by Mr. Copland's counsel, that although the House of Lords has put a proper interpretation on this agreement, and that by the facts in evidence the agreement has been complied with, in their sense of it, yet it was competent for Toulmin and Copland to put a different sense on it, and then to have come to the new agreement, on the supposition that the first was not performed in their sense of it. Could their sense of it be different from the expression in Copland's own affidavit,† that Toulmin was to bring in 40,000*l.* of good debts to meet claims ? It is quite plain he has done that effectually ; and how can I assume, for the purpose of raising a conjecture, founded on imagination and inference, that they misunderstood the agreement in the real sense of it, which was very plain from the words of it, and that it meant something else, and therefore they made some new agreement, which is not proved, except by

- * 353 mentioned order he reviewed his said * report, and found that the agreement was not varied, and that the partner-

Copland's own suggestion, in order to vary the original contract? It is true Copland's affidavit goes to that effect ; but although I do not mean to question his veracity, one cannot take the affidavit of a defendant in his own favour as evidence on a fact that is controverted. It is receivable evidence, but it is not evidence that a Court is warranted to pronounce a judicial decision upon, unless it be admitted, or confirmed by other facts in the cause.

“ Assuming, therefore, that the original contract was for a partnership in three parts, one of which only was to be Copland's, without any sort of evidence of any new agreement to change it, or any proof of a consideration to justify a new agreement to change it ; could any jury in the world be advised by any Judge to give credit to the mere evidence of a witness of a conversation fourteen years before, that he had heard Copland, in Toulmin's presence, direct him to make up the books on the footing of an equal partnership, and that Toulmin had made no objection to it? Is that sufficient evidence to prove such an agreement? Chief Baron ALEXANDER did not think that that evidence, accompanied with the evidence of Copland's affidavit, was sufficient; nor did he think that the evidence of the books was sufficiently conclusive to induce him to form that judgment.

“ I cannot conceive but that the transaction respecting the stocks, which is the foundation, or one of the foundations at least, of the inference that is drawn of an equal concern, is a mistaken one. I have no doubt that Harrison is a good accountant; but I have had experience of many accountants in Courts of Justice; they sometimes make mistakes like other men; their conclusions are not absolutely inevitable; and as Harrison has given us the foundation of his judgment, we can look at it, for it is quite clear, on his statement, that he refers for the judgment he draws that these books furnish evidence of equality of interest to those particular items only which have been the subject of discussion before me yesterday, — the stock transactions. We find instances of stock speculations, which are gambling transactions, in which the losses are paid by the partnership drafts ; but immediately, and upon some direction by Toulmin himself, they are charged in equal portions to the two partners. Now, that this was not a partnership transaction, is perfectly clear. If the parties had made together an expedition to Newmarket, and had there betted on some race, and had put their accounts into hotch-potch, and paid them by a draft of the copartnership funds, they would have just done the same thing, — they would have directed the clerk to charge each man's separate account with an equal portion, but that would not be a partnership transaction. The very circumstance of its being so charged, and charged at the very moment, shows that the transaction is completed at once, and that it is not entered in the partnership books in any other way than merely as a payment made to each individual partner. It is exactly the same as if each individual partner had drawn a draft on the partnership concern, payable to himself ; he does what he likes with that draft, the clerk charges him in his private account with it. Navy agents, I presume, do not enter into transactions of gambling as matters of partnership ; if they make joint transactions in gambling, on each occasion they will do it by a specific contract with the other, as one partner could not bind another in such a transaction. Suppose there had been three partners in this concern, and all habitually paying their private accounts by draft on the partnership, in which case the separate account of each person would be debited with that draft; suppose two had agreed to have a transaction in the funds to make a speculation of this nature, without consulting the other; or the other, a prudent man, would not be concerned in it at all; the same thing would have happened; they would have paid the money for the loss by a check on the bankers of the partnership; and the clerk would have debited, in equal moieties, the two partners who made the transaction, to the amount of the loss. I do not think, therefore, any of those transactions furnish any evidence whatever of a partnership in equal moieties; nor that those were partnership transactions, because if they were, there would be no occasion to carry them immediately to the debit of each party.

“ Well, then, next come the household expenses. If the charge had been for wine purchased by the house, and that wine had been sent to each party, and each party debited with the wine so sent, what would the inference have been? Why, that each partner dealt with the house, as they would with any other wine-merchant, and was charged in the account with what he had: that is the case as to some of the entries, but not of the entries where the charge is to household expenses. The very circumstance of its finding no further place in the accounts, but terminating in household expenses, shows it was bought for some purpose connected with the household expenses, as against both these partners; that it is inevitable, and it comes under all those charges which are charges of household expenses, payment of house rent, payment of land tax, of assessed taxes, and of every other charge that belongs to the common house. I do not find from the evidence, that they dispensed this wine in their common house, that is, the house belonging to both, but yet it is household expenses. It appears to me to be a just and legitimate inference, that it was a contract between them, that the wine which they purchased for the household expenses should be equally divided between them; because the household expenses could not fairly be charged, unless it was for the entertainment of customers.

“ What inference is to be drawn from the account not being balanced, or settled at all? It is argued that it was so much the interest of Toulmin, if he had the larger share, to have the accounts settled, that, therefore, the argument is strongly against him that they were not balanced and settled. I do not feel that: on the other hand, it may be said, as soon as the agreement was changed, if it was changed, it was so much the interest of Copland to have some evidence of it, as he had none but the honour of his partner and his memory, that he ought to have it immediately evidenced by some settlement of the books. One of the clerks who had been with them all the time, and who is with Copland now, swears he could not make out by the books to what degree they were interested respectively. That argument, therefore, stands equal; it appears to me to make nothing in either scale.

“ Considering that the House of Lords have established one part of this case in a way in which I am not at liberty to shake it by any issue on the subject; considering, that on the remaining part, the evidence did not, in the

* 355 * By another separate report, bearing date the 15th of February, 1836, the Master, after certifying that states of facts had been laid before him on behalf of the appellant and respondents, supported respectively by the evidence mentioned in that report, found, amongst other things, that, in taking the accounts

* 356 * between A. Toulmin and the appellant, as directed by the decree of June, 1828, (a) all sums received by the firm of Toulmin & Copland from their customers and clients, who had been debtors to the former firm of Richard & Abraham Toulmin, and to whom advances had been made by the firm of Toulmin & Copland, in the ordinary and necessary course of the business and practice of navy agents, should, in the first place, be applied towards the discharge of such advances and interest respectively, and that the surplus only should be applied towards the discharge of debts due from such customers and clients respectively to the firm of Richard & Abraham Toulmin.

The respondents took four exceptions to that report, of which it is only necessary to state the second, viz., "that the Master, regard being had to the evidence laid before him, instead of his said finding, ought to have found, that in taking the accounts between A. Toulmin and the appellant, as directed by the said decree, all sums received by the firm of Toulmin & Copland from their customers and clients who had been debtors to the firm of Richard & Abraham Toulmin, and whose debts had been transferred to their respective accounts in the books of Toulmin & Copland, should in the first place be applied towards the discharge of the debts owing to Richard & Abraham Toulmin, and of the interest thereon, and that the surplus only (if any) should be applied towards the discharge of the advances and interest in the said report mentioned; and that the firm of Toulmin & Copland, as between them and Abraham Toulmin, should be charged with the sums so firstly applied, and with interest thereon opinion of the Chief Baron, justify him in coming to the conclusion that there was any variation of the agreement; and considering that the Master has had no new evidence to lead to that conclusion, and being myself very strongly of opinion, that on the evidence, as it stood, the Master ought not to have come to that conclusion any more than the Chief Baron did, — my disposition is to allow these exceptions."

(a) See the decree, ante, Vol. II., p. 685.

The four exceptions came on to be heard before Lord ABINGER, C. B., who, by an order bearing date the 17th of December, 1836, was pleased to allow the said second exception, (a) except where it appears on the face of the accounts in the books of the firm of Toulmin & Copland, in the Master's said report mentioned and referred to, that deductions had been made from particular receipts, and the balances only carried to the credit of the account; and it was thereby referred back to the Master to review his said report, and vary and amend the same accordingly.

In February, 1837, the appellant presented his appeal to this House from the said orders, dated respectively the 27th of February and the 17th of December, 1836.

While that appeal was pending, various proceedings were taken in the Court of Exchequer in prosecution of the original decree pronounced in June, 1828. (b) In November, 1837, the appellant enrolled that decree and presented an appeal against it. That appeal was objected to by the respondents, as being against the standing orders of the House, but the appeal committee sustained it on the authority of the case of Brooke v. Champernowne. (c) Both appeals came to be heard together in May, 1838.

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Wakefield, for the appellant. — The protracted litigation between those parties was caused by the want of any written agreement of the terms of the partnership between the appellant and Abraham Toulmin. From the commencement * of that partnership in 1806, until the * 358 death of Mr. Toulmin in 1819, their business was carried on by them without coming to any settlement of accounts. When the respondents, as the representatives of A. Toulmin, filed their bill for an account against the respondent, they had not a particle of evidence to show the proportions of interest which each of the partners had in the concern. The only evidence on which their claim to two-thirds has been founded, was furnished by the respondent, in an affidavit which he made in support of a motion in an early stage of the cause. In that affidavit he says, "It was on the formation of such copartnership, in the first instance, agreed between this deponent and the said A. Toulmin, that upon the said A. Toulmin's bringing into the said partnership, between him and this deponent, 40,000*l.* of good debts which were owing to the late concern, which was carried on in partnership between the said A. Toulmin and Richard Toulmin, then a lunatic, and which was for the purpose of meeting the claims by debts transferred from the said firm; and upon this deponent's bringing 4000*l.* into the said partnership concern between him and the said A. Toulmin, the said A. Toulmin should be entitled to two-thirds of that concern, and this deponent to the other third; but the said A. Toulmin not being able to bring 40,000*l.* of good debts into the said partnership concern, it was afterwards agreed between this deponent and the said A. Toulmin, that they should carry on their said copartnership trade or business of navy agents upon equal terms as to profit and loss, and they did accordingly so carry on such trade or business."

This House has decided in the former appeal that A. Toulmin brought in the 40,000*l.* of good debts, in the true sense and
 * 359 meaning of the agreement. To * that decision the respondent is bound to submit, however aggrieved he may be by the result. But although the state of facts presented to the House justified the conclusion to which the House came, there is no inconsistency in supposing that the partners themselves did not consider the terms of the agreement to have been complied with in their sense of its meaning, and that therefore they came to a new agreement to carry on the business in equal shares of profits and loss. That supposition is consistent with the decision of the House, with the state of the accounts, with the affidavit and answer of the appellant, and also with an affidavit made by A. Toulmin in the matter of his brother's lunacy. The latter part of the appellant's affidavit stating the alteration of the agreement, is as much entitled to credit as the former part, which states that by the original agreement Mr. Toulmin was to be interested in two-thirds of the business. This affidavit was made evidence in the cause by the respondents, and if admissible at all, it should be taken altogether, and that part which was for the benefit of the appellant should be read for him, as the other part was read against him. Boardman v. Jackson. (a)

There were depositions of a witness named Reynolds, read de bene esse at the hearing. They set forth a conversation which that witness said he had with the appellant, after the suit had commenced, to the effect that the appellant admitted that he was only entitled to one-third share, but that the respondents had offered him four-ninths, which he would accept. These depositions were properly objected to as inadmissible by the rules of pleading and evidence, as, the alleged conversation not being put in issue by the pleadings, the appellant had no opportunity of contradicting * or explaining it. Hall v. Maltby, (a) * 360 Fitzgerald v. O'Flaherty. (b)

The Master, upon the whole of the evidence laid before him, certified by his report of the 2d of July, 1835, that the original agreement was afterwards varied, as stated in the appellant's affidavit, so that the partners were interested in moieties of the concern. Some entries in the partnership books showed that the prices of wines purchased, and losses on certain stock transactions, were paid out of the partnership funds, and debited to the partners in equal shares; there was no entry showing an inequality of shares: all the accounts and all the transactions deposed to by the witnesses were consistent with a partnership in equal shares, which is also the presumption of law in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. Peacock v. Peacock. (c) The Lord Chief Baron, in his judgment in February, 1836, (d) allowing the exceptions taken to the Master's report, admitted that it was not inconsistent with the decision of this House on the former appeal; but his Lordship was of opinion that the balance of evidence was against the equality of partnership. That, it is submitted, is an erroneous opinion, and the order ought to be reversed.

The second order complained of in the first appeal allowed exceptions to the Master's report as to the principle on which he directed the partnership accounts to be taken. After the declaration by this House that the 40,000*l.* of good debts had been brought into the concern by A. Toulmin,—without, however, stating when or how,—was made an order * of the * 361 Court of Exchequer, the Master next reported that though he found the 40,000*l.* had been brought in, the agreement had been varied, and the partners became equally interested. The Lord Chief Baron dissenting from that conclusion, directed the Master to review and vary that report, and the Master accordingly by his next report certified that the agreement had not been varied. By a subsequent report, the Master, considering the partnership to be two-thirds to A. Toulmin, and one-third to the appellant, as was declared by the last order of the Court, stated that the principle on which he proceeded to take the accounts between them, as directed by the decree of June, 1828, was by applying all moneys received by the new firm of Toulmin & Copland from the debtors to the former firm, to whom the new firm had made advances, in discharge of such advances first, and applying the surplus only in discharge of the debts due by them to the old firm. The Lord Chief Baron, in allowing exceptions to that report, disapproved of the principle on which the Master proposed to take the accounts, and declared that the converse of that principle, independent of the rule in Clayton's Case, (a) was the proper mode of taking the accounts. (b) But his Lordship's arguments in support of the order then made,—which is the second complained of in the first appeal,—powerful as they unquestionably are, cannot stand against the evidence contained in Mr. Toulmin's own affidavit, made in the lunacy of Richard Toulmin, and declaring that, in forming the partnership with Mr.

Copland, it was agreed between them that the advances to * 362 be made by them to the old customers should have * priority of payment over the debts due by the customers to the former firm. The proceedings in the matter of the lunacy did not affect Mr. Copland, as to him they were res inter alios acta; but A. Toulmin was bound by them. Notwithstanding his affidavit in that cause, and Mr. Copland's concurrence in it, the Lord Chief Baron decided against the agreeing statements of those contending parties, on the ground that as a matter was decided one way in R. Toulmin's lunacy, another matter should be decided in the same way in Toulmin v. Copland.

The affidavit of Mr. Toulmin and the other evidence, including the partnership books, on which the Master grounded his report of February, 1836, proved that the only correct mode of taking these accounts directed by the decree of 1828, was, as stated by the Master, that all sums received by the firm of Toulmin & Copland from customers and clients who had been debtors of the firm of A. & R. Toulmin, and to whom advances had been made by Toulmin & Copland in the ordinary and necessary course of their business, should in the first place be applied towards the discharge of such advances and interest; and that the surplus only should be applied towards the discharge of the debts due from such customers and clients to the firm of A. & R. Toulmin. It is alleged that those who represent the estate of Richard Toulmin object to that mode of taking the accounts, insisting that the first payments recovered from customers should be appropriated to the payment of the debts to the old firm. But no third party had a right to interfere and vary the agreement between Toulmin and Copland. The order is manifestly wrong so far as it allows the latter clause of the second exception, which insists that the firm of Toulmin & Copland should be charged * with interest at 5l. per cent with annual rests, * 363 on the sums applied by them in discharge of their own advances.

The second appeal complains of the decree of 1828, directing an inquiry to ascertain the terms of the partnership agreement, as there was nothing in the cause to found such an inquiry on. In the absence of evidence of contract, the law presumes that persons who enter into partnership together, are to be interested in equal shares, and the whole of the evidence as to the nature of the partnership agreement was contained in the appellant's affidavit, of which the Court might judge without any reference. That affidavit having been read in the cause by the respondents, was to be taken against them as conclusive of the terms of the partnership. The appellant did not appeal against the decree when it was pronounced, because he believed he should be able to satisfy the Master that the partnership was in equal shares; and so the Master found, and Chief Baron ALEXANDER was of that opinion. If this House should entertain any doubt of the terms of the partnership, it may yet direct an issue to a jury, and order Mr. Copland to be examined as a witness. That course was taken in De Tastet v. Bordenave, (a) Roe v. Gudgeon, and Peacock v. Peacock. These two cases are not reported on this point.

Mr. Simpkinson and Mr. Jacob, for the respondents. — By the decree of 1828, Chief Baron ALEXANDER directed inquiries on three heads: First, whether the 40,000l. of good debts were brought from the old to the new firm, according to the partnership agreement. This House held in the former appeal (b) that the 40,000l. were so brought in, and reversed the Chief * Baron's order, which overruled exceptions to the Master's * 364 report, finding that the 40,000l. were not brought in. The Master then proceeded on the second head of inquiry, — whether the partnership agreement was at any time varied, and he reported that it was. Exceptions taken to that report were allowed by the present Lord Chief Baron's order, which is the first order complained of in the first appeal. The Master next proceeded to the third head of inquiry directed by the decree, namely, as to the mode of taking the partnership accounts, taking the shares of the partnership to be two-thirds to A. Toulmin and one-third to Copland. To the Master's report on that point also exceptions were taken, and allowed by the Lord Chief Baron's order of December, 1836, which is the second order comprised in the first appeal. After that appeal was set down for hearing, the appellant presented an appeal against the decree of 1828, without taking any notice of the pending appeal, or of the order of the House on the first appeal, declaring that the 40,000*l.* of good debts had been brought in by Mr. A. Toulmin, in the true meaning of the partnership agreement; and without stating the several orders and proceedings which have taken place under the decree, and from which the appellant has not appealed. This last appeal is open to many objections, but the appeal committee allowed it to be brought to a hearing. This House forbids the practice of splitting appeals. Norbury v. Meade. (a) There an appeal was brought against part of a decree, and the appellant, having succeeded, then appealed against the other part.

(b) 2 Cl. & Fin. 681.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—There the two appeals were against the same order; here they are against different orders, as * 365 in Champernowne v. Brooke. (b) The competency of * this appeal was discussed before the appeal committee, and allowed.]

The objections to it on the merits remain yet to be disposed of. The real object of this appeal is to get rid of the order of the House in the former appeal, and to send for inquiry before a jury the very question which this House has already decided. After that decision, that the 40,000*l.* of good debts were brought in by A. Toulmin in the true sense of the partnership agreement, there was no longer any question to be made that the partnership was in thirds. If the appellant had been dissatisfied with the inquiries directed by the decree, he ought, before the inquiries were completed, to have asked the issue which he now claims. In that case the Court might have followed the course pointed out in De Tastet v. Bordenave and the other cases that were referred to. But if appeals of this kind were encouraged, orders of very ancient date, which might appear defective, erroneous, or imperfectly expressed, would be brought under review, although all the subsequent proceedings in the causes in which such orders were pronounced might be perfectly right. An instance has recently occurred in the case of The Earl of Kingston v. Viscount Lorton. (a)

The inquiries directed by the decree were necessary in consequence of the ambiguous and contradictory statements made by Copland of the terms of the partnership, in his affidavit and in his answer, agreeing only in this, that the partnership was to be in two-thirds and one-third, if Toulmin brought in the 40,000*l*. This House has acted on the decree, and decided that Toulmin did bring in that amount of good debts according to the true intent and meaning * of the partnership agreement. * 366 Any variation that the House might now make in the decree would be inconsistent with its former order, and the parties could not now be placed in the situation they would have been in if that order had not been made. Besides, the decree was warranted by the evidence adduced at the original hearing. Although the depositions of Reynolds of the conversation with the appellant were not strictly admissible in evidence, as not being put in issue by the bill, they showed that Copland's answer to the bill was not to be trusted, and that inquiry was necessary.

The law does not always presume, in the absence of agreements, that partnerships are on equal shares: the rule depends on circumstances. In Peacock v. Peacock, (b) the jury inferred from the circumstances that the partnership was in quarter shares, three to the father and one to the son. The circumstances of the present case were these: A. Toulmin was the remaining partner of an old-established firm, having upwards of 1000 accounts with naval men; Copland, a purser in the navy, without any connection, brings only 4000*l*. into the concern: it is reasonable that a partnership under such circumstances would be in the proportion of two shares to one. An instance of it occurred in the case of Robley v. Brooke. (c)

As to the other appeal from the orders of the 27th February and 17th December, 1836, there was no case made by the appellant to justify the House in dissenting from these orders. It has been before decided that the terms of the original agreement, stated by the appellant himself to have been in thirds, were

(a) Ante, Vol. V. p. 269.

(b) 16 Ves. 49.

(c) 7 Bligh, 90.

strictly complied with, and there was no evidence that the
 * 367 agreement * was ever varied after the commencement of the partnership.

From the mode of keeping the accounts with the customers of the firm of Richard & Abraham Toulmin, adopted by the firm of Toulmin & Copland, and continued down to the death of A. Toulmin, the first receipts from such customers were applicable to the payment of the balances owing to the firm of R. & A. Toulmin. The advances made to such customers were in fact (except to the extent of so much, if any, of the 4000*l.* capital brought in by the appellant, as might be applied to that purpose) made by the firm of Toulmin & Copland, out of the assets of the firm of R. & A. Toulmin. And the balances, owing to the firm of R. & A. Toulmin, and adopted by the firm of Toulmin & Copland, cannot be recovered by the representatives of R. & A. Toulmin, in consequence of the mode of dealing with them by the firm of Toulmin & Copland; and all remedies to recover them are barred by lapse of time. The decision in the lunacy on the question was, in fact, a decision as binding upon the appellant as upon Abraham Toulmin.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The questions raised in these appeals depend on circumstances so numerous and various, that it will be necessary to take time to consider them before we can give judgment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, this case came before your Lordships on two appeals; the first is from certain orders of the Court of Exchequer: after that appeal was presented, the second was brought, complaining of the original decree in the cause, pronounced so long ago as the 12th of June, 1828.

* 368 * I propose to consider this second appeal first, as it relates to the earlier stage of the cause; and if your Lordships should be of opinion that the original decree was wrong, it necessarily follows that all the subsequent proceedings will fall with it. That decree merely contained a reference to the Master to inquire, first, whether one of the partners of the firm, A. Toulmin, brought into the partnership of Toulmin & Copland 40,000*l.* good debts due to the former partnership, according to the true intent and meaning of the agreement, stated in a certain affidavit of the appellant; and, secondly, whether such agreement was at any time varied. Under that reference the Master made a report on the 26th of May, 1830, in which he negatived the fact first inquired into. The accuracy of that finding was questioned by exceptions taken, which were heard in December, 1830, and were overruled. The result, therefore, of the decision of the Court of Exchequer upon that subject was to negative the proposition that 40,000*l.* good debts had been brought into the concern of Toulmin & Copland. That decision became the subject of appeal to this House, and by an order of this House, of May, 1834, the decision was reversed, and the exceptions taken to the report were allowed. (a) It therefore became established, by an authority which could no longer be questioned any where, that A. Toulmin had brought into the concern 40,000*l.* of good debts, and he had therefore to that extent performed the contract which he had entered into with his partner Copland.

The parties went on, and in July, 1835, there was a report on the second part of the inquiry, by which the Master found the agreement had been varied. * That finding also be- * 369 came matter of question before the Court of Exchequer on exceptions to that report; and by an order made in the year 1836, the exceptions were allowed. The Court of Exchequer in that instance, therefore, established the fact that the original agreement had not been varied by any subsequent agreement between the parties.

Various proceedings followed in the cause, until at last, in the year 1837, nine years and a half after the original decree had been made, the appellant thought it expedient to appeal against that decree, to which appeal I am now confining my observations. That decree directed mere inquiry. It may be undoubtedly true that a decree ought not to contain a mere inquiry, and that there was either no ground for the inquiry, or that some other mode of inquiry ought to have been adopted; but it will require a very strong case, where all the objects of the decree have been exhausted, — where the decree adjudicates no right, establishes no fact, but is merely an act of the Court by which the Court desires that further information may be obtained, — it will require a strong case to induce your Lordships to reverse a decree made merely for the purpose of ascertaining the fact in order to enable the Court with more certainty to adjudicate between the parties. Now, it appears that the answer which the appellant put in to the respondent's bill stated the contract to have been, that if A. Toulmin brought in 40,000*l.* of good debts, then the partnership between them should be in thirds ; Toulmin being in that case to have two-thirds, and Copland to have one-third. We have now the fact, by the judgment of this House, that those 40,000*l.* were brought in, and that Toulmin therefore did perform his

* 370 part of the contract. We have, therefore, * according to the answer, a statement of the partnership terms ; the answer denying the fact of the 40,000*l.* having been brought in ; but that fact being established, the case stated by the answer is that in an event, now proved to have existed, the parties were to divide the profits in thirds. The present contest, on the part of Mr. Copland, is, that the ultimate agreement between the parties was, that the partnership profits were to be divided in moieties. The affidavit referred to in the decree is an affidavit in which it is stated that, upon failure of A. Toulmin to bring in 40,000*l.*, a new agreement was made. It states the original agreement, namely, that the parties were to divide in thirds, if 40,000*l.* were brought in, the same as the answer ; but the affidavit goes on to say, that A. Toulmin having failed in bringing in 40,000*l.*, the parties afterwards agreed to divide the profits in moieties. Now, inasmuch as it has been established by the judgment of this House that the 40,000*l.* were brought in, according to the true intent and meaning of the contract, that event never occurred upon which, according to the affidavit, the parties entered into a new contract ; the affidavit stating that it was on failure, that is, on an event which never took place, that the new contract was entered into between the parties.

My Lords, it was said that this affidavit must be taken altogether ; that is to say, if it is used for the purpose of showing what the original contract was (namely, that there should be a division into thirds if the 40,000*l.* were brought in), it must be taken together, and therefore you are bound to take that part of the statement which states the new contract. It is quite certain that it must be taken together, but it does not follow

* 371 because it must be taken together, * that every part of it is conclusive of the fact of which it is evidence, and the Court therefore required further information, and directed the Master to exhaust the first inquiry as to the payment in of the 40,000*l.*, and then directed him to inquire whether there had been any subsequent contract entered into between the parties. That inquiry refers to the other appeal ; I need not advert to it further than to state that the party now appealing having exhausted the subject-matters of inquiry, and having, in my opinion, failed in both, he then complains of the Court having inquired into these facts at all.

My Lords, I think that extreme case does not occur here, in which your Lordships would be disposed to disturb a decree merely directing inquiries, after the lapse of time which has taken place, and after the proceedings which the parties themselves have followed up in consequence of the inquiries directed by that decree; but if it were not for that time, and if your Lordships were called upon to exercise an opinion upon the original decree immediately after it was pronounced, I should say this is a case of all others in which it was the bounden duty of the Court further to inquire of the facts, because the answer sets up the defence. I know that the answer was not read, but the Court and both parties are entitled to look to the answer to see what is the nature of the defence set up. The defendant (now appellant) sets up a defence depending upon certain facts, upon which there was much dispute at the hearing; it was impossible for the Court to come to any satisfactory conclusion upon the facts so stated. The Court adopts one or other mode of ascertaining the facts, which are not at that moment before it in a way to enable it to dispose of the case. It might have directed an issue: that is one of the * arguments, that there ought to have * 372 been an issue. There might have been an issue, or it was competent to the Court to direct an inquiry. The Court directed an inquiry, and no complaint was made of the inquiry directed until all the subject-matter had been exhausted, and the party now complaining had failed in establishing the facts in his favour. I think this House will not listen to a complaint, under the circumstances of this case, of a decree merely directing an inquiry, after all that has taken place, and I think the inquiry itself was perfectly proper; and upon both grounds, therefore, that appeal, that is, the appeal against the original decree, has no foundation to rest on, and therefore must be dismissed, with costs.

The other appeal, the first in point of date, that is, the first presented, though relating to a subsequent part of the case, complains of two orders; first, of the order of the 27th of February, 1836, by which exceptions were allowed to the report of the 2d of July, 1835;—now, the effect of allowing those exceptions was to decide that there had been no alteration in the agreement after the commencement of the partnership; secondly, of another order of the 17th of December, 1836, which allowed the second exception taken to the report of the 15th of February, 1836, by which the Master had reported that all sums received by Toulmin & Copland from their customers ought to be applied in repaying the advances of the firm, and the surplus only applied in payment of the debts due to the former firm. The effect, therefore, of this order was to establish the converse of that proposition as to the rule to be followed in taking the accounts.

As to the order of the 27th of February, 1836, it is to be
 * 373 observed that Copland's affidavit rested altogether * upon the new agreement having been made on the assumption that the 40,000*l.* good debts had not been brought into the concern by A. Toulmin. But this House having decided that such assumption was unfounded, the very ground on which the supposed existence of such new agreement rested failed; and after a careful examination of the evidence, I think there is no proof of any such new agreement. I lay aside all evidence of declaration and admission imputed to A. Toulmin or Mr. Copland, which are not stated in the pleadings, and which there was not therefore any opportunity of explaining or disproving. And in the absence of all direct evidence on the subject, either verbal or in writing, it can only be ascertained by reference to the evidence furnished by the very books themselves. The books do not contain any division of profits. And here I may observe, that a supposed new contract, according to the proposition of the appellant, must take place at some subsequent period. Now there is a total absence of any trace in the books of any altered mode of keeping the accounts. If the parties had been originally connected together according to a certain agreement as to the division of profits, and at a subsequent period had agreed to adopt a different mode of dividing the profits, it is hardly to be supposed that the accounts would have gone on and been found to have been kept during the whole of that period in the same manner, if that altered contract had taken place between the parties. The books are uniform, following the same system from the beginning to the end, and no alteration is to be found in the keeping of the accounts at any alleged period when the new contract is supposed to have been entered into.

The books do not contain any division of the profit and
 * 374 loss as to the general business between the parties, * and so far they afford no evidence of any new contract. But as to the particular items, they do show that certain expenses and losses were charged equally to the partners, that is, as to certain losses in the purchasing and selling of stock in the public funds, and that certain wines purchased by the firm were divided equally between the partners. But to this it is answered, that these purchases and sales of stock were not on the partnership account, but that they were speculations of the two partners as individuals, and that the losses were therefore properly charged in moieties to each of the two; and such appears to me to be probably the true solution; for if they were, in fact, partnership transactions, why were they kept separate from the other transactions of the firm, and why were the results carried to the account of each partner, when no such course was followed as to any of the other partnership transactions? It may also be observed, that if the parties were to bear the result of all the transactions in moieties, why were the losses on these stock transactions to be carried separately to the account of each partner? But if they were to bear these losses in moieties, and the result of the general business of the partnership in thirds, there was an obvious propriety in separating the results of these adventures from those of the general business. As to the wine which was divided between the parties, the answer given was, that that was so divided to meet the expenditure of entertaining the customers of the firm; and there seems some probability for this supposition. The reference in the accounts to the house expenses leads to this conclusion, and if any use could have been made of it for the purpose of showing a general division of profits in moieties, it would have been necessary to have shown that the same mode of division * applied to all similar purchases, which does not * 375 appear to be the case. The evidence, therefore, of a new agreement to divide the profits equally, in my opinion, wholly fails, and the order of the 27th of February, 1836, appears to me to be correct, and that the exceptions to the report of the 2d of July, 1835, were properly allowed.

As to the order of the 17th of December, 1836, it establishes a rule for taking the accounts consistent with the ordinary course of business, and which the law assumes to be the course to be followed, unless there be proof of a contrary course agreed on between the parties. Certain debts due from the customers of the house to the former firm of Richard & Abraham Toulmin were, by agreement between A. Toulmin & Copland, upon the formation of the partnership between them, transferred into the books of the new firm of Toulmin & Copland, and the transactions with such customers continued as before; moneys were received on their account, and advances were made to them, or payments made on their account, without a distinct appropriation by the customers paying the money ; at least that is the general course of business ; in some particular instances there seems to be a particular appropriation, but generally without any appropriation by the customers paying the money, or any agreement between the parties prescribing a different course of appropriating the moneys so received to the earlier debts. What, then, is the proof that there was any such agreement ? And here, again, I must lay aside all declarations imputed to A. Toulmin, which are not stated in the pleadings. In the accounts of the customers, the old and new debts constitute one account, and the balance struck is the result of the pending account ; but it is

* 376 said, that in certain proceedings * between A. Toulmin and the estate of his former partner, who had become a lunatic, he had represented that the moneys so subsequently received were to be first applied in repaying the subsequent advances ; but it will be found by the objection and exception of A. Toulmin, in the matter of the lunacy, that he endeavoured to support this proposition, — although in the affidavit he states the contract, yet when he brought the matter before the Court he endeavoured to support the proposition on the ground of the custom of the trade, as applicable to that particular business, and not of any special contract for that purpose. But the decision of Lord ELDON (a) negatived any such contract, or any such custom, by deciding that as between those two branches of the firm, — no doubt A. Toulmin being the nominal party as between himself and the estate of his late partner, yet there was abundant to show that Copland was a party and privy to the proceedings then carried on, — Lord ELDON decided, upon the evidence in that case, that the moneys received were to be applied in payment of the older debts. He therefore negatived the two grounds set up for a contrary proposition, namely, that either by the custom of the trade or contract it was to be applied first in payment of the advances by the subsequent firm. I think, therefore, there is no proof of any special contract or any particular custom of the trade to support the proposition contended for by the appellant, and the general rule of law is against it. So far, therefore, I think the order of the 17th of December, 1836, is correct. —

That order, however, allows the second exception, with * 377 an exception which I think very proper, but which * is not here in question. (a) It, therefore, allowed that part of the second exception, which asserted "that the firm of Toulmin & Copland, as between them and A. Toulmin, should be charged with the sums firstly applied, and with interest thereon from the times when they were respectively received to the 4th of January, 1819, at the rate of five per cent per annum, with annual rests." The Master, by the report to which this exception was taken, after stating his opinion as to the manner in which he conceived the moneys received ought to be applied, stated that he had forborne to take the account until this point was decided. Now, the part of the exception to which I refer does not relate to the question of the manner of applying the moneys received as raised by the report, but to the manner of taking the account, consequential, indeed, perhaps on the decision of the first point, but which was not directly raised by it, an account which the Master has stated he had forborne to take. It is impossible, therefore, to say that the Master, if he was right in making a separate report at all, as to the mode of applying the receipts, ought to have reported in the terms of the latter part of the second exception to which I have alluded. I by no means wish to be understood as expressing any opinion against the proposition so raised ; but before the account is taken, and without some more information as to the fact, I think it would not be safe for this House, à priori, to lay down that or any other proposition beyond what is necessary to decide the question raised by the report, and I have before said, that it is not regular, by an exception, to raise a proposition foreign to the subject-matter of the report excepted to. I think, * therefore, that there * 378 should be a variation of the order of the 17th of December, 1836, so as to make it allow the second exception, except that concluding part of it to which I have alluded ; not for the purpose of expressing any opinion against the proposition so raised, but because I think it was not regular to express any opinion in that state of the case and on that exception to such a report.

I have had some doubt whether this alteration in the order ought to protect the appellant from the payment of the costs of the appeal. This objection to the order is not put forward as a ground of appeal in the printed case, but it was insisted on at the bar, and I think it is of some importance. On the whole,

therefore, I think that the appellant should pay the costs of the second appeal, and of so much of the first appeal as complains of the order of the 27th of February, 1836, and that each party should bear their own costs of the remaining part of the first appeal.

[It was accordingly ordered that the appeal against the decree (the second appeal) be dismissed, and that the decree be affirmed, with costs to be paid by appellant.

And as to the first appeal, it was ordered, that the order of the 27th of February, 1836, be affirmed, and that the order of the 17th of December, 1836, also be affirmed, except so far as that order allowed that part of the second exception which asserts "that the firm of Toulmin & Copland, as between them and A. Toulmin, should be charged with the sums so firstly applied, and interest thereon from the times when the same were respectively received, to the 4th of January, 1819, at the rate of 5l.

*379 per cent per annum, *with annual rests," which part of the said exception is overruled, but without prejudice to any future question as to charging such sums and interest. And it is further ordered that the appellant pay the respondent the costs of so much of the said appeal as complains of the said order of the 27th of February, 1836, and that each party pay his own costs with reference to the remaining part of the said appeal; and it is further ordered that, with this variation, the cause be remitted to the Court of Exchequer].

Lease, Covenants in. Timber Trees. Practice.

A clause in an indenture of lease reserving, out of the demise, to the lessor "all wood and underwood, timber and timber-trees, standing, growing, or being thereon, or at any time thereafter to stand or grow thereon, with full and free liberty of ingress and egress to take and carry away the same," applies only to trees standing when the lease was granted, and not to those afterwards planted by the tenant. Its operation is so restricted by the 23 & 24 Geo. 3, c. 39.¹

Quære — Whether a judgment given by the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, on a bill of exceptions tendered to the charge of a Judge of that Court in an action brought and tried in that Court, is not in itself irregular and erroneous?

March 13, 15, 1838. July 28, 1840.

THIS was a writ of error on a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland. John and Edward Galwey, being seised in fee of and in the lands of Lota, and the dwelling-house thereon, by indentures of lease and release, dated the 28th and 29th of October, 1789, demised unto Sir Richard Kellett, knight, the said dwelling-house and lands of Lota, to hold the same unto the said Sir Richard Kellett and his heirs for the term of three lives therein * named, with covenants for * 380 perpetual renewal, reserving a certain rent therein mentioned.

The indenture of release contained a clause in the words following; viz., "Saving and always reserving out of the said demise unto the said John Galwey and Edward Galwey, and to the person or persons who shall from time to time be entitled to the reversion in said lands, all mines, minerals, and royalties happening or being thereon, and also all wood and underwood, timber and timber-trees, standing, growing, or being thereon, or at any time thereafter to stand or grow thereon, with full and free liberty of ingress and egress to take and carry away the same."

John Galwey, the plaintiff, had since become seised of the reversion in fee of the said premises, subject to the demise for the term of lives, which term is still subsisting.

Some time after the execution of the indentures, one William Massey Baker became seised of the estate and interest of Sir Richard Kellett in a part of the demised premises, by assignment, and planted divers timber-trees thereon, and duly registered the same pursuant to the provisions of the Irish statute of 23 & 24 Geo. 3, c. 39, (a) and shortly after died, leaving Godfrey Thomas Baker, the defendant, his heir, who thereupon became seised of the premises so assigned as aforesaid for lives renewable for ever; the reversion in fee belonging to the plaintiff. The defendant cut down and sold certain of the trees (of the value of 1*l*.) which had been planted and registered by William Massey Baker, whereupon the plaintiff, in Hilary term, 1835, brought an action of trover in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland to recover * 381 the value of the said trees, and the defendant * having pleaded the general issue, the action came on to be tried on the 21st day of March, 1835, at the assizes for the county of the city of Cork, before Richard Wilson Greene, Esquire, one of his Majesty's Serjeants at Law; and the several matters and things herein before stated having been proved or admitted, the counsel for the plaintiff contended that the clause in the indenture of the 29th day of October, 1789, reserved to the reversioner the property in all trees at any time growing upon the demised premises: but the counsel for the defendant contended that, notwithstanding that clause, all-timber trees planted after the execution of the indenture were, under the provisions of the 5 & reciting the number and kind of the trees planted, and the name of the lands, in form following.” 23 & 24 Geo. 3, c. 39, § 6.

By sect. 7, it was enacted that “ any tenant may sell his or her right, title, and property in said trees or coppices, or any part of the same, to any person under whom he or she may derive mediately or immediately, and that the person so purchasing may have all the rights, titles, and properties, and privileges therein which are, or by this Act shall be, secured to the said tenant.”

By sect. 8, it was provided “ that no sale or transfer of the same shall be deemed good in law, unless and until the same shall be done in writing, and an attested copy of such writing lodged with the clerk of the peace,” who shall register the same: “ and if the head or principal landlord shall so purchase the said trees or coppices from an undertenant having a right to sell the same, then from and after the registry of the sale as aforesaid, the said trees shall belong to the landlord, notwithstanding any intermediate term that may exist between the term of the said tenant and the estate of the said landlord.”

By sect. 12, it was declared that the surrender of a lease for the purpose of taking a new one should not be considered an expiration of the term so far as regarded that Act, but that every renewal should be considered a further continuance of the original term, and the tenant should be entitled to enjoy all the benefits of the planting, &c., given by the Act in the same manner as if the additional term had been contained in the original lease.

Sect. 21 declared that “ nothing herein shall be construed to extend or relate to any trees planted or to be planted in pursuance of any covenant contained in any lease, nor to affect or invalidate any such covenants.”

Judge that the defendant, upon the facts proved and admitted, was entitled to a verdict. The learned Judge, however, was of a different opinion, and directed the jury, if they believed the evidence, to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the timber so cut down; whereupon the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 1*l*. The counsel for the defendant tendered a bill of exceptions, to which the Judge put his seal, and the case was afterwards brought on for argument before the Court of King's Bench in Michaelmas term, 6 Will. 4, when that Court gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff sued out a writ of error to the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, by which the judgment of the Court of King's Bench was unanimously affirmed, and the present writ of error was then brought.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Campbell), for the plaintiff in error. — There has been one great blunder committed in this case. The action was brought in the Court of King's Bench, and the bill of exceptions was argued before that Court. In fact, the bill of exceptions was treated as if it was a special verdict. This was clearly erroneous; if the proceeding had been regular, the verdict given before the Judge at Nisi Prius would have gone before the Court of Error; and then, if that Court thought that the verdict could not be sustained, it would have awarded a
 * 384 venire de novo. But here the course has been quite different, for the Court of Error has set aside the verdict, and ordered a judgment to be entered for the defendant. This course is itself erroneous. The Statute of Westminster (13 Ed. 1, stat. 1, c. 31), which first gave a party the right to a bill of exceptions, was introduced into Ireland by Poynings' law, and the law on bills of exceptions therefore must be the same in both countries.

Sir F. Pollock, who appeared for the defendant in error, said that he did not know whether the fact would appear on the record, but he understood that there was a written consent given, when the case came before the Court of King's Bench, that it should be treated as a special verdict.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The case comes before us on this record as a writ of error on a judgment given on a bill of exceptions, which is all that we can know about it. By that it appears that a judgment of this extraordinary description has been given on this bill of exceptions. If any consent of the kind spoken of was given, a special verdict might have been substituted for the bill of exceptions.

The Attorney-General. — That could have been done. If this judgment had been reversed a venire de novo might have issued, returnable in the Court of King's Bench. The course pursued here was clearly erroneous. In Nepean v. Knight (a) the rule is distinctly laid down. In delivering judgment there, Lord DENMAN said: (b) "For these reasons, we are of opinion * that * 385 the learned Judge's direction to the jury, in respect of which the lessor of the plaintiff tendered a bill of exceptions, was correct, and that the verdict ought to have been found for the defendant; but as we cannot order it to be so entered, the result is, that the verdict found for the lessor of the plaintiff must be set aside, and a venire de novo awarded." On this ground alone the judgment must be reversed.

But besides this, it is clear that the exceptions cannot be maintained, and that the direction at Nisi Prius was right. The provisions of the covenant are direct enough; but then there are two Irish statutes, on which it is said that doubts may arise whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The plaintiff is the reversioner; the defendant the tenant pur autre vie of an estate in Ireland, and has cut down timber from the demised premises. The question is, whether under the 5 Geo. 3, c. 17, (c) and 23 & 24 Geo. 3, c. 39, (d) such a person can cut the timber which he or his ancestor has planted. At first sight, the terms of the statutes, especially the later one, may appear to give the tenant this right; but even in that statute itself there is a restriction on his right; for the 21st section provides, "that nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend or relate to any trees planted or to be planted in pursuance of any covenant contained in any lease, nor to affect or invalidate any such covenants."

[LORD BROUGHAM. — Does not that mean such covenants as are antecedent, such covenants as those by which the tenant expressly undertakes to plant the property?]

It is submitted that the section cannot be so restricted, but that it applies to any covenant respecting the planting of trees. There are * many such covenants in reservation or * 386 exception. The present is one of that sort. There may be a covenant of reservation, which would still reserve to the lessor all the right in the timber grown during the term. There is no question that by the terms of the statute the tenant may sell the timber when grown; then why may he not sell his right to it before it is planted? The question here is, whether there is any objection, in point of law, for the lessor, after these Acts passed, by apt words to reserve to himself the right to timber-trees growing on the premises, or planted there during the term. If an Act of Parliament grants to a tenant a particular right, there may still be an exception introduced in a case which, by agreement between the parties, may put an end to that right. One species of minerals may be reserved and not another. Those which are between the surface and the centre may be parcelled out, and, in fact, the rights of the two parties may be strictly dependent on the agreement into which they have chosen to enter. But it was objected in the Court below, that though there may be a reservation of things existent, there cannot be one of things non-existent; so that the timber growing may be reserved, but not the timber to grow, for that the exception must come out of the subject-matter demised.

[LORD BROUGHAM.—How do you reserve rent to become due? That may be payable in corn to be grown, as well as in moneys numbered.]

It is quite clear that that objection made in the Court below is untenable, for Sir F. Barrington's Case (a) distinctly shows that there may be a grant or reservation of trees growing or to grow.

Then, in Stanley v. White, (b) a belt of trees grew
 * 387 *round Sir T. Stanley's estate; the soil in which they grew was not in him, but was in the owner of the adjoining land, and it was held that they might belong to his freehold, for that there might have been a conveyance of the soil, with a reservation of the trees growing and to grow. If there may be a reservation of trees to grow in future, where, as in that case, there was a conveyance in fee-simple, there may also be one where there is a reversion still existing in the lessor. If a lease does not reserve mines, the lessor cannot maintain trespass for digging the soil and opening the mine, but he may maintain case for an injury to the reversion. But if there is a reservation in a lease of timber or minerals, trespass may be maintained by the lessor. Then, as it is clear that such a special reservation may be made, and as a reservation has been made in this case, the question is whether here it is restricted to trees existing at the time, or will include those which were thereafter to be planted. The words of the lease clearly include all trees growing and to grow. The Earl of Cardigan v. Armitage (a) was cited on the other side in the Court below, but it is difficult to see how it can apply to the present case, and the same observations may be made with regard to Bullen v. Denning. (b) At the time of the making of this lease the lessor was the owner in fee-simple; he might therefore grant a part or the whole of his right over the estate. He has only granted a part. Had it not been for this express reservation in the lease the property in the timber planted would, by the operation of the statute, have passed to the lessee. But here is an express reservation to those entitled in reversion.

(a) 8 Rep. 271.

(b) 14 East, 332.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — This reservation is in * dero- * 388
gation of the grant, but it did not require the grant to give the tenant the right to the trees in question.]

But the reservation is not inconsistent with the grant, for if it was it would be null and void. It is a particular reservation of something which the lessor has a right to reserve, and is therefore good. It was not denied in the Court below, and is even admitted here on the face of the reasons presented to the House, that the trees growing from old stocks belong to the lessor. Then why not the rest? The direction at Nisi Prius was good, and the judgment must be reversed.

Sir W. Follett, on the same side. — The most important part of this case will be the construction of the second of these statutes, on which as yet no decision has been given in Ireland. The provisions of the statute are not intelligible if they are to be taken to apply to leases existing at the time of the passing of the Act, and not meant to control contracts or covenants which might be entered into after the passing of the Act. It was supposed in the Court below, that the first Act did not apply to leases made after the passing of that statute. The whole question, therefore, depends on the 23 & 24 Geo. 3, c. 39. That statute gives to the tenant the power to cut or fell any timber trees which he may plant. What is the effect of that statute? Is it intended that it shall interfere with contracts or covenants afterwards entered into? If not, then here is a distinct covenant defining the rights of the parties. If there was no covenant, the trees under the common law would have belonged to the landlord. But then the statute interposes for the benefit of the tenant. But that leaves either party at liberty to give up his right to the other; a tenant may, if he pleases, covenant

(a) 2 B. & C. 197.

(b) 5 B. & C. 842.

* 389 to give up * his right to house-bote. The only question

therefore is, whether there has or not been any such contract in this case. In this lease there is, first, a reservation of all trees, and then a covenant that all improvements, which must include trees planted, shall belong to the lessor. If a lease contains a covenant on the part of the tenant not to cut or fell trees, the next question is, whether the landlord has not a right to reserve to himself an action if the trees are cut. If the trees are the property of the landlord while on the land, they are equally so when they have been wrongfully cut by the tenant. The reservation in the lease made them his property. According to Lord COKE, (a) "reserving sometime hath the force of saving or excepting, so as sometime it serveth to reserve a new thing, namely, a rent, and sometime to except part of the thing in esse that is granted." The words of exception in this lease are strong; parties must be supposed to know their legal rights, and if the tenant did not mean to allow his landlord to reserve a right to all the trees that might be planted, he ought to have stated his intention. The landlord is to have the right to enter and cut and take away the trees; there is no distinction made as to any particular sort of trees, and there is nothing to show that the words used have not their ordinary meaning. One of the learned Judges in the Court below said that it might be doubtful whether the tenant intended to give up his established rights. It might be so if the language used here did not sufficiently show that that was the case.

As to the form of the judgment here, it is clearly erroneous.

The Court of Error had no right to direct the verdict to
* 390 be entered as found by the jury, when * it appeared on the record itself that the verdict was not so found. An Irish statute of the 28 Geo. 3 (b) will be relied on by the other side

(a) Co. Litt. 143 a.

(b) 28 Geo. 3, c. 31, § 1, after reciting that the carrying of a cause by bill to show that the proceedings here are correct. The great object of that statute is to take away from the Judge the necessity of sealing the bill of exceptions, and to render his signature sufficient. It is true that the statute says that the Court may make such order as is agreeable to justice; but that does not give a Court of Error the right to enter a verdict. There must be a clear enactment to enable the Judges to place themselves in the situation of a jury.

[LORD BROUGHAM.—A special verdict is not a verdict by the Court, but the Court directs how it is to be entered, on the finding of the jury.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—But that is not assigned here as error.]

The assignment is in general terms that the judgment is erroneous; the statute does not cure the material objection of directing the verdict to be entered. So that even if the direction of the Judge at Nisi Prius was wrong, there ought to be a new trial; but that direction was right, and the verdict for the plaintiff ought to stand.

Sir F. Pollock, for the defendant in error.—The object here was to save expense in putting this case in the Court below into the shape of a special verdict instead of that of a bill of exceptions. It is impossible *for this House, after judg- * 391 ment in two Courts, to avoid coming to the conclusion that there was an arrangement between the parties as to the form in which judgment should be prayed. But the words of the statute amply justify this judgment. The words “or otherwise” enable the Court to give a judgment on the very right and justice of the case, even though the form of it should be that of a bill of exceptions, when in substance it is a special of exceptions to a superior Court is a cause of great expense, enacts “that it shall be sufficient if the Judge to whom such bill of exceptions shall be tendered sign the same, and that it shall not be necessary for him to put his seal thereto, and that such bill of exceptions so signed shall remain with the clerk of Nisi Prius, and be incorporated in the postea and be returned therewith to the Court in which the action is brought, which Court shall have authority to examine the same, and give judgment thereon, or make such order, either by arresting the judgment, granting a venire facias de novo, or otherwise, as shall be agreeable to justice.”

verdict. The practice of the Court is according to that construction of the statute.

The practice of the Courts must be evidenced by what the Courts have done in this case. The Courts of King's Bench and Exchequer Chamber have in this very instance shown what is the practice. What better authority can there be for showing what is the practice, than the fact that these two Courts have pursued this course in the present instance?

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—And the plaintiff in error has not raised the objection in his statement of errors.]

Which shows that in the Courts in Ireland the practice must be considered as established. This House will not favour an objection which must either have been abandoned or considered untenable in Ireland. That practice must be taken to give the true construction of the statute, or at all events this House will not, without being clearly satisfied that that is not the case, deprive the Court of the power of dealing out justice to the defendant as well as the plaintiff, when both have shaped the record in such a way that the real merits of the case may be seen. It is clear that it was intended that by this Act the Judges should have a larger power than they possessed by virtue of the statute of Westminster. In the first place, the

* 392 same Court as that out of which the writ * proceeds may examine the bill of exceptions; in the next, it may arrest the judgment, and it may do so on what occurs at the trial, and on what is shown on the bill of exceptions.

There is nothing in the pleadings here to import that there was a planting of trees by the defendant or his ancestor, or a registering of them under the statute; but if the bill of exceptions puts the Court in possession of the real merits of the case, it was intended by the statute that the Judges might adopt any course that justice might appear to them to require. They may, therefore, as it appears proper to them, either arrest the judgment or grant a new trial, or they may give judgment thereon on the record, as it stands before them, or direct a venire facias, “or otherwise, as shall be agreeable to justice.” These latter words must have some meaning. What is that meaning? It is that the Courts may give judgment for the defendant if there is any thing to call for it; that they may do any thing which will be agreeable to public justice. Where the object of a statute is, as it is here, to prevent delay and to save expense, and powers are given to the Court for that purpose, this House will construe that statute in as large and ample a manner as may be necessary for effectuating the object of the legislature.

Then as to the principal question in the case; it may be true that a reservation of timber in a lease may apply to all timber, whether growing on old stocks or raised by the labour of man. Barrington's Case (a) may be admitted as undisputed law, and so may Stanley v. White, (b) which proceeded upon it, and yet the argument attempted to be raised upon * them would * 393 not be true. In the first place, they are not precisely in point with the present case. But in the next, this case is wholly independent of them, and depends on the construction of the two statutes for the encouragement of the growth of timber; and on the construction of those statutes it is clear, that unless there was a distinct renunciation of the timber by the tenant, the trees planted by him must be his property. Now, in the first place, there can be no such thing as the renunciation of a right created for a great public purpose.

[LORD BROUGHAM.—Is it quite clear that that argument can be supported? Suppose the legislature should say that all game shall belong to the tenant, could not the tenant renounce it? The legislature trusts to people's attention to their own interests, and vests rights in a party, but does not prevent him from disposing of them.]

In this case something more than a mere private right was created. A great public purpose was secured by creating a private right. Nothing but express words of renunciation can surrender that right. Generally speaking, it is undoubtedly true that a right may be abandoned by a party, as a pecuniary right and the like, but that is not true with respect to all rights. For example, no man can voluntarily part with his right to personal liberty; he cannot give another the power to detain him in prison, or to do him some bodily harm. There is but one way in which the landlord can secure to himself the right to these after-planted trees, and that is by making the tenant covenant to plant them. No other reservation whatever can operate to contravene the policy of these two statutes.

[LORD BROUGHAM. — The 5 & 6 Geo. 3 strikes at leases already made, but does it not leave landlords and tenants to deal with each other for the future?]

* 394 * It does not. With respect to past contracts, it required the express language of the legislature to meddle with them, but with respect to all future leases, as it was clear that, if made in contravention of the statute, they would be contrary to law, it was not deemed necessary to mention them.

[LORD BROUGHAM. — Does not the 16th section of the later statute affect your argument?]

That is in the second statute, and may be observed on presently. As to the first statute, it is clear that that extends to future leases, and that if any tenant should make any covenant that any timber he may in future plant shall be the property of the landlord, such covenant will be void as contrary to the policy of the statute. There are many cases where protections are thrown round individuals for the purposes of public policy, and where those individuals cannot by any arrangement of their own get rid of those protections. The public purpose must be served at all events. Minors and married women are instances of this sort, and so are persons whose acts are affected by the usury laws. Now, in these statutes the declaration that the sole property in the trees planted shall be in the tenant for life or years, and the fact that liberty is expressly reserved to the reversioner to purchase the tenant's right, shows how absolutely that right is given. Nor is his right the less certainly vested because it is restricted to the continuance of the term. But then it is said that the 16th clause of the statute affects the tenant's right. That clause applies to no covenants but such as are covenants to plant imposed by the lessor on the tenant. If the effect of the statute may be got rid of by a reservation or covenant, the 16th section is mere surplusage, for if the tenant would be

* 395 bound at all events to do what is there supposed to be * done in consequence of an express covenant, that section was at best quite useless. On the other hand, is it not clear that the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, must be applied, and that this one case of trees planted under a covenant to plant, being thereby excepted from the operation of the statute, all trees planted without such a covenant must be taken to be within the statute? As an encouragement to plant trees, the legislature says that all trees may be cut down by the persons who planted them, and the only exception is when the trees are expressly planted for the benefit of the landlord. In that case, what the tenant did would be matter of bargain, and the purpose of the statute would be fully answered. The 16th section may be read thus: "that nothing herein contained shall extend to trees planted according to a covenant for that purpose, but that as against the object of this Act all other covenants shall be void."

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — And the statute is so anxious to reserve to the tenant the right to the trees, that he is only entitled to sell them to the landlord under certain restrictions.]

It might be contended in general terms that the statute meant to contravene all past and all future covenants, except those of a special kind. But it is not necessary for the purposes of this argument to go to that extent. To effect the purpose insisted on by the other side, the words of the covenant ought to have been much stronger than they are. They might have been to this effect, "although planted and registered by the tenant in pursuance of two statutes of the 6 & 24 Geo. 3." Such a covenant might have overcome the force of these statutes, but none other could produce any such effect. The case of The Earl of Cardigan v. Armitage (a) was cited by Mr. Justice *BAY- * 396 LEY, in Bullen v. Denning, (b) for the principle that, where there was any reasonable degree of doubt as to the meaning of an exception in a lease, the words of the exception, being the words of the lessor, were to be construed favourably to the lessee, and against the lessor. The clause in this lease is only that which was in leases before the statute, and there can be no doubt that if these words had been found in a lease made before the year 1765, they would have been abrogated by force of that statute. All the text writers agree that where there is a distinct grant by a lessor, or by the Crown itself, and afterwards an exception which destroys such grant, such exception is, even in the case of the Crown, void, and the grant is valid. On the whole it is clear, in this case, that in the first place the Court of King's Bench had a right to give the judgment it has given; in the second, that the right of the tenant being introduced to favour a great public object, it was not intended that the tenant by any voluntary act should strip himself of the right thus given, or deprive himself of the advantage which the legislature had conferred upon him for the purpose of inducing him to plant trees on his land; thirdly, that the language of the covenant being only such as was in use before these Acts passed, it must be at least doubtful whether it could ever have been intended to operate upon these statutable rights; and, lastly, the doctrine in Bullen v. Denning is applicable, and the language and intention of the parties being doubtful, the tenant is entitled to the advantage of a construction in his favour, and the more so as such construction will best effectuate the object of two important public statutes.

* 397 * The Attorney-General, in reply. — The first question now is, whether the judgment can be supported on the bill of exceptions. The reference, by the other side, to the agreement, shows that the course adopted here was not according to the practice of the Court. The words in the statute, "as should be agreeable to justice," do not give a Court of error power to set aside a verdict given in the Court below. All that the statute requires here is, that certain forms should be observed. Then as to the principal point: if the reservation here was of all the trees growing and to grow, there would be no distinction between trees which were planted by the lessee and those which grew spontaneously during his term. That would be considered in this country as equivalent to a conveyance of the fee. Then, suppose that this was found in a lease for years, Bullen v. Denning is an authority under such circumstances. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this argument, that the statute gives the tenant for life the same rights as to this matter as would belong to the tenant in fee. But even then he would not have a right to cut and convey away these trees. Now, it is clear that a tenant for life cannot be in a better situation than a tenant in fee-simple. The right, therefore, claimed here, is more than the law will permit.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — On the facts of this case, as they appeared at the trial, the learned Judge was of opinion that the landlord was entitled to the trees. The counsel for the defendant then tendered a bill of exceptions, as he was entitled to do under the Irish statute. The Court of King's Bench was of opinion against him, and proceeded to deal with the matter as to that Court seemed right. It is very probable that the form of the proceeding was not brought to the * consideration of * 398 the Judges; but when the case was brought before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it is obvious that the defect, if any, in the mode of proceeding, must have been apparent on the face of the record. The Exchequer Chamber confirmed the judgment of the Court of King's Bench. It does not appear that the point of the objection to the form of the judgment was made before the Judges of the Exchequer Chamber, but that objection appears to have been first put forward in the argument at your Lordships' bar. If you should be of opinion that you ought to concur with the opinion of the Judge at the trial, it will not be necessary to consider the form in which the judgment was entered, for then the judgment itself, as given in the Court of King's Bench, would be reversed; but as I am at present advised, I think that it will be necessary for your Lordships to consider the form of the judgment, which certainly is not according to the form of judgments in this country, and the proceeding itself is one which never could have occurred here. It is desirable, therefore, that you should take such means as you possess to consider the question arising on the form of the judgment. The Irish Act, in some respects, alters the mode of proceeding, and gives power in matters relating to bills of exceptions; but whether it really alters the mode of proceeding so far as to justify the course here adopted, is a question that may be somewhat doubtful. It may, on this subject, be material to inquire what has been the usual course of proceeding in Ireland, and what has in this way been the interpretation put by the Courts on the statute. It is obvious that it is a wholesome exercise of power to prevent the unnecessary expense of the parties going down to another trial, where the result is settled by the law beforehand. But on the other * hand, it may be open to danger to give the Court * 399 this unchecked power of dealing with a bill of exceptions, and thus to withdraw the question from the jury, and submit it in fact to the Court. The only thing now to be done is to adjourn the consideration of this case, for the purpose of making an inquiry into the practice.

Adjourned for further consideration.

grown thereon, and words for that purpose were therefore expressly used. Now, the question arises whether it was necessary for this purpose to assign to him that which would other-

* 402 wise have been the property * of the lessee? There is in the lease a right reserved to enter, and take and carry away trees. If this reservation applies to the trees which the tenant has planted, it would take from him a right and a benefit, without conferring any corresponding advantage on the lessor.

It cannot be supposed that the tenant would plant trees if the lessor might at any time, and that too under the very terms of the lease itself, enter and cut them.

It is equal whether the tenant does not plant trees, or has no property in those which he has planted. The legislature itself has declared this proposition, and has made it the reason for passing the Act which is now submitted for our consideration.

It seems to me that the clauses on which the plaintiff in error relies were intended to secure for the inheritance the full benefit of the trees which have been previously planted, and which are in existence at the time of the making of the lease; but they do not attach to trees which have since been planted by the lessee, and which never were, and were not intended by the law to be, the property of the lessor.

I shall not, my Lords, make any observation on the question of the alleged irregularity in the proceedings in the Court in Ireland, as the parties have asked for our judgment on the construction of the statute notwithstanding such irregularity: Being of opinion that the view taken by the Court below of the Irish Acts, and of this covenant in the lease, was the correct one, I move that the judgment of this House be given for the defendant in error, with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I entirely agree with the opinion

* 403 expressed by my noble and learned friend. The * question can only arise on the supposition that the clause in the lease does reserve after-planted trees. But the intention of the legislature, and especially the 21st section of the later of the two Acts of Parliament, show that the reservation must be most plain and distinct in order to effect such a purpose. The reservation must therefore be considered as a contract, and construed accordingly. It is admitted that the parties may contract in this manner so as to give the landlord the right to the timber even in cases of perpetual renewal, for the tenant may sell him such right. Has that been done here? What are the words in which the plaintiff in error has made this reservation? The reservation is of trees "at any time thereafter standing or growing." Do those words mean trees after-planted? They do not; such trees might never come into existence; there is no covenant to plant any trees, and therefore the 21st section does not apply. They mean trees growing on the stools of old trees,—trees which were in existence at the time of the granting of the lease, and which would therefore continue the property of the landlord, subject only to use during the term by the tenant. The other construction is absurd. Why should a person stipulate for a property in trees which might never come into existence; since, by making such a stipulation, he would in all probability prevent the tenant from planting them? The clause which confers the power of entering on the land, and taking and carrying away trees, does not apply to trees planted by the tenant; it refers only to those things in which the landlord had a legal vested right. He had such a right in the mines and minerals, and in the trees which were then—that is, at the time of granting the * lease — growing * 404 on the estate; and to them and to nothing else does this clause refer. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Court below was right, and that we must decide in favour of the defendant in error.

It was accordingly ordered and adjudged that the said judgment given in the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, affirming a judgment of the Court of King's Bench in Ireland for the defendant in error, be affirmed; and that the record be remitted, to the end that such proceeding may be had thereupon as if no such writ of error had been brought into this House. And it was further ordered, that the plaintiff in error do pay to the defendant the costs incurred in respect of the said writ of error, &c.

Lease for Lives. Renewal. Construction of Agreement. Issues.

A tenant of lands in Ireland, under the seventh renewal of a lease, made in 1672, not in existence, but admitted to contain an agreement as to the amount of fine to be paid "upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives," filed a bill for renewal against the lessor's assigns, and, referring to the recitals of that agreement in former renewals as evidence of the covenant contained in the original lease, prayed that that covenant be decreed to be a covenant for perpetual renewal.

Held, that the case so made, and the issues tendered by the bill, were confined to the construction of the agreement as to the amount of the fine contained in the lease of 1672, and identified by the reference to the recitals of it in the renewals; and did not warrant either of two issues that were directed to try, 1st, whether at or before the making of the lease of 1672 (which was previous to the Statute of Frauds in Ireland), there was an agreement between the parties for a lease of lives renewable for ever; 2dly, whether that lease contained any agreement or covenant for renewal, independent of the agreement as to the amount of the fine to be paid on inserting any life or lives.

The latter issue would be consistent with the bill, if it had prayed relief on the ground that, the original lease being lost, the dealings between the parties for one hundred and twenty years justified an inference that it contained a covenant for perpetual renewal. But the draftsman was precluded by former proceedings from so framing the bill.

By indenture of lease, dated the 24th of May, 1672, and made between Henry Pakenham, of Tullynally, in the county of Westmeath, Esq., of the one part, and Bartholomew Cooper, of Mayne, in the said county, of the other part, the said H. Pakenham demised unto the said B. Cooper, his heirs and
 * 406 assigns, the town * and lands of Mayne, containing, or reputed to contain, 148 acres profitable land, and 23a. 0r.

12p. of unprofitable land, of the late Irish plantation measure, be the same more or less ; and part of Fiermore, containing 25a. 2r. 5½p., situate in the barony of Fore, in the same county ; to hold the same unto the said B. Cooper, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the said B. Cooper, and of Appollina Cooper, his wife, and of Bartholomew Cooper, the younger, his son, and the survivor of them, at the yearly rent of 30*l.* for the first seven years, and the yearly rent of 33*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* afterwards, payable half-yearly, &c. The lessee's part of this lease was long ago destroyed by fire, as hereafter appears, and the respondents, in whom the interest in that lease is vested, insist that it contained a covenant for perpetual renewal. There was an indorsement on the lease, in these words : " And it is hereby agreed between the parties as aforesaid, that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives, there shall be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper, the father, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Henry Pakenham, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of 16*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, current and lawful money of England." That indorsement, the respondents insisted, was made in consequence of some inaccuracy in the statement of the amount of the renewal fine, in the body of the lease, or to supply some omission in the covenant, alleged to be therein contained, for perpetual renewal.

Mr. Cooper, by virtue of the lease, entered into and enjoyed the lands therein comprised, and some time before the year 1713 he sold his interest therein to Garrett Nangle, the great-grandfather of the respondent, John Hyacinth Nangle, and conveyed the same to him by indorsement upon the back of his part of the original lease.

* The estate and interest of Mr. Pakenham, the lessor, * 407 in the lands of Mayne and Fiermore, became vested in his son, the Rev. Robert Pakenham, who, by indentures of lease and release, in the year 1706, for valuable consideration, conveyed his estate and interest and reversion in the lands comprised in the said lease of 1672, to Thomas Smyth (hereafter, for distinction, called Thomas Smyth, the first), the ancestor of the appellants, by the description of " all that and those the town and lands of Mayne, containing 148 acres profitable land, plantation measure," together with other lands which are not the subject of this case. That Thomas Smyth, by his will dated the 20th of February, 1712, devised the fee and inheritance of the lands of Mayne, to his second son, the Rev. Thomas Smith (called Thomas Smyth, the second), for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to the second son of testator's eldest son in tail, with remainders over. Upon the testator's death without altering his said will, the lands of Mayne, subject to the lease of 1672, became vested in Thomas Smyth, the second, for life, with remainders over, as in the will mentioned ; and the lands of Fiermore, comprised in the same lease, remained in the Pakenham family.

Appollina Cooper, and Bartholomew Cooper, the elder, two of the lives named in the lease of 1672, respectively died about the years 1676 and 1696 ; and Bartholomew Cooper, the younger, became, and continued to be, the only surviving life in that lease, until the year 1719, when the first renewal of it was executed, pursuant to a decree of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, in a cause of Nangle v. Smyth. Garrett Nangle, the ancestor of the respondent, filed a bill in that Court in 1713, against T. Smyth,

and the bill stated, "that the said H. Pakenham did, in May, 1672, come to a treaty and agreement with the said B. Cooper (the elder) to make him a lease for lives renewable for ever, and that afterwards, on the 24th May, 1672, in pursuance and performance of the said agreement, the said H. Pakenham, by deed, demised the said lands to the said B. Cooper, his heirs and assigns, for the term of three lives, as by the said lease, which was then in the possession of the plaintiff in that suit, would appear ;" and the bill also stated, "that it was concluded and agreed, between the said H. Pakenham and B. Cooper, before and at the time of making the said lease for lives, that the same should be renewable for ever, to the said B. Cooper, his heirs and assigns, on the payment of 16*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, which the more plainly appeared by its being expressed in the said lease that it was thereby agreed upon between the said H. Pakenham and B. Cooper, that upon renewing or inserting any life or lives, there should be paid by the said B. Cooper, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of 16*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* ;" and the bill further stated, "that in consequence of the manner of wording the covenant or agreement mentioned in the said lease, the plaintiff could not have an action at law to compel the defendant to renew the lease, although it plainly appeared by the lease that it was the intention and meaning of the parties thereto that the same should be a lease for lives renewable ;" and "that the person who drew the said lease was an unskilful person, and unacquainted with the terms and manner of drawing leases for lives renewable." The bill prayed, "that your suppliant may be relieved in the premises according to equity and good conscience."

T. Smyth, the second, admitted by his answer, "that *a covenant, in the words above mentioned (as in the *409 indorsement), was contained in the lease of 1672;" and he stated, "that he had heard and believed that there was no other clause in the said lease relating to a renewal."

The plaintiff in that suit proved, by the evidence of the Rev. R. Packenham, "that he had sold the lands of Mayne to T. Smyth, the first, as subject to a lease for lives renewable, and that he had heard that the general reputation in the neighbourhood was that the said lease was renewable;" and the plaintiff further proved, by other witnesses, that all the body of the said lease was the proper handwriting of Andrew Williams, who was not a person skilled in drawing leases, but was a parish clerk.

Lord MIDDLETON, then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, said, upon the hearing of the cause, "I am of opinion, upon the evidence in this cause, that the plaintiff is entitled to a renewal. Will the defendant consent to accept of the money that is to be paid for the two renewals, and that a reasonable time may be limited for the renewal for the future? If not, I will give judgment in it. Let the defendant consider of this proposal till to-morrow." On the following day, the cause having been again called on, the Lord Chancellor said, "I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to a renewal of the lease, paying the fines, according to the covenant in the lease; and, therefore, I decree it accordingly." "The defendant is to renew to the plaintiff, for the two lives that are dead, at the fine of 16*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* for each life; but I do not decree that it is a lease for lives renewable for ever, but leave the plaintiff at liberty to take his remedy to sue for a renewal after the determination of the three lives." It was accordingly decreed that the defendant should *perfect to the *410 plaintiff a lease or leases of the said lands of Mayne for the lives of Thomas Nangle and Patrick Cashell, in the room of the two lives that were dead, the plaintiff paying a proper proportion of the rent and of the fines for each life, payable by the said lease in respect of the said lands of Mayne, regard being had to the lands of Fiermore; and it was referred to one of the Masters of the Court to apportion the rent and fines between the lands of Mayne and Fiermore. In the decree his Lordship declared that he did not establish that the said lease was a lease for lives renewable, or not.

By indenture of renewal, made in pursuance of that decree on the 8th of April, 1719, between T. Smyth, the second, of the one part, and the said G. Nangle, of the other part, in consideration of the sum of 28*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*, paid by Nangle to Smyth, for two renewal fines, or proportions of renewal fines, payable in respect of the said lands of Mayne (the rent and renewal fines having been then apportioned under the decree), Smyth added to the term of the original lease the lives of Thomas Nangle and Patrick Cashell, therein described, in place of the said B. Cooper and Appollina Cooper, deceased; and he, T. Smyth, the second, granted unto G. Nangle "the said part of the said lands of Mayne, containing 148 acres profitable land, and 23*a.* 0*r.* 12*p.* of unprofitable land, of the late Irish plantation measure, be the same more or less, situate in the barony of Fore, and county of Westmeath aforesaid, to hold the same unto the said G. Nangle, his heirs and assigns, for the life of the said B. Cooper, the younger, and for the lives of the said T. Nangle and P. Cashell, and the survivor of them, at the yearly rent of 28*l.* 10*s.* 3½*d.* of the then currency of Ireland, being the rent apportioned * 411 in respect of said lands of Mayne." This, * the first renewal of the lease of 1672, was registered in Ireland, and the memorial stated that it was "annexed to a lease of lives renewable for ever."

Garrett Nangle soon afterwards died intestate, leaving Hyacinth Nangle, his grandson and heir-at-law, in whom the lessee's interest in the original lease became vested. B. Cooper (the younger), the last surviving life named in the lease, died between the years 1719 and 1752; and by indenture of renewal, dated the 5th of May, 1752, T. Smith, the second, in consideration of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.*, released unto the said Hyacinth Nangle the said lands of Mayne with the appurtenances, in as full and ample a manner as he, Hyacinth, then enjoyed the same under the original lease and deed of renewal, to hold the same unto the said Hyacinth, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the said T. Nangle and P. Cashell (the two lives named in the renewal of 1719), and of George Prince of Wales (the new life then added), and the life of the survivor of them; and by this indenture it was agreed between the parties thereto, "that upon the renewing of any new life or lives, there should be paid by the said Hyacinth, his heirs or assigns, unto the said T. Smyth, the second, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.* current and lawful money of England." This, the second renewal of the lease of 1672, was duly registered in Ireland.

Thomas Nangle, one of the lives named in the two renewals, died in or before 1754; and, by indenture of renewal, dated the 2d March in that year, T. Smyth, the second, in pursuance of a covenant for renewal contained in an original lease in this indenture recited, and in consideration of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.*, demised unto the said Hyacinth Nangle the lands of Mayne, to hold the same unto him, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of * the * 412 the said P. Cashell, George Prince of Wales, and of Prince Edward, his brother (the new life then added), and the survivors and survivor of them.

The house of Hyacinth Nangle, at Streamstown, in the county of Westmeath, was, shortly after the execution of the last mentioned renewal, set fire to and burnt, and he and those of his family then in the house were murdered, and all his title-deeds, including the lessee's part of the lease of 1672, and the said several renewals, were destroyed. He left an only child, Christopher Nangle, to whom the lessee's interest in the lands of Mayne descended.

In the year 1764, T. Smyth, the second, died without issue, whereupon Thomas Smyth, the second son of the eldest son of the testator (T. Smyth, the first), became entitled to the lands of Mayne, for an estate tail, under the limitations of the will of T. Smyth, the first; and the said Thomas Smyth, called T. Smyth, the third, in 1765 suffered a common recovery of the lands of Mayne; and thereby acquired an estate in fee-simple therein, subject to the said lease of 1672; and by indenture of release, dated the 8th of May, 1766, he, in pursuance of a proviso contained in his marriage settlement of prior date, conveyed the said lands of Mayne to the use of himself for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male.

Prince Edward (one of the lives named in the renewal of 1754) having died previous to the year 1768, by indenture of renewal, dated the 2d April in that year, and made between T. Smyth, the third, of the one part, and the said Christopher Nangle, a minor, by John Lowther, his guardian, of the other part, after reciting the lease of 1672, and the several renewals thereof, and that the said T. Smyth, the third, had, at the request of the said C. Nangle, by his guardian, * pursuant * 413 to the true intent and meaning of the said covenant for renewal, agreed to add a new life to the term of the said demise in place of Prince Edward ; it was witnessed, that T. Smyth, the third, pursuant to the said covenant for renewal in the said original lease contained, and in consideration of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.* paid by the said J. Lowther as a fine for a renewal in respect of the said lands of Mayne, demised, &c., unto the said C. Nangle the said lands of Mayne, to hold the same unto him, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the said P. Cashell, King George III., and William Henry, Duke of Gloucester (the new life added in place of Prince Edward), and the survivor of them, at the said yearly rent of 28*l.* 10*s.* 3½*d.* This, the fourth renewal of the lease of 1672, was duly registered in Ireland. The tenant's part of it was lost, but the contents appeared by the registered memorial.

By indenture of renewal dated the 25th December, 1768, made upon the death of P. Cashell, the survivor of the lives named in the renewal of 1719, after reciting the lease of 1672, and the several renewals thereof, and that "the said T. Smyth, the third, had agreed to add a new life to the said indenture in place of the said P. Cashell, pursuant to the true intent and meaning of the said covenant for renewing the same ;" it was witnessed that T. Smyth, the third, "in pursuance of the covenant of renewal, in the said original lease contained, and in consideration of the payment of the renewal fine of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.*, demised unto the said C. Nangle the lands of Mayne, to hold the said lands, &c., unto him, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of King George III., William Henry, Duke of Gloucester, and of the said C.

Nangle (then added to the term of the said indenture), * 414 and the survivor * of them, subject to the aforesaid yearly rent of 28*l.* 10*s.* 3½*d.* Of this, the fifth renewal of the lease of 1672, the tenant's part is in existence.

In July, 1774, T. Smyth, the third, filed a bill in Chancery against Christopher Nangle and Myles Dowdall, an under lessee of the lands of Mayne, stating, among other things, that by indenture of lease, dated the 5th May, 1752, T. Smyth, the second, executed to Hyacinth Nangle a lease for twenty-one years, of Upper and Lower Coole, which expired on the 25th of March, 1773 ; and that the lands of Coole adjoined the lands of Mayne, both lands being occupied by Hyacinth Nangle during his life, and afterwards by the said C. Nangle, under the said several indentures ; and that Hyacinth Nangle, and the guardian and friends of the minor, C. Nangle, had from time to time defaced the boundaries of the lands of Mayne and Coole, and had gradually encroached upon the lands of Coole, wherein they had only a determinable term, and added to the lands of Mayne, "wherein, as is alleged, they had a perpetual interest," several acres of the lands of Coole; and stating that the guardian and friends of the said minor, having despaired of obtaining a renewal of the lease of Coole, did, contrary to the consent of the plaintiff, cause a new ditch to be made, whereby about twenty-eight acres were taken from Coole and added to Mayne, and that the lands of Mayne contained 15a. 3r. and 33p. more than the number of acres demised by the original lease made to B. Cooper. The bill prayed that the plaintiff might be restored to and quieted in the part of Coole so taken from it and added to Mayne, and that the ancient and real boundary between Coole and Mayne might be set out and ascertained.

Christopher Nangle, by his guardian, put in his * answer * 415 to that bill, resisting the relief prayed, except so far as it sought a partition, to which he acceded. But no decree was pronounced, nor were any further proceedings had in that suit, the parties agreeing to come to a partition of the lands of Mayne and Coole. Surveyors were accordingly nominated, who ascertained the meres and bounds, and a new line of mering was, with the consent of both parties, made through the upland of Mayne and Coole, and through the bog of each, and proper maps were made of such partition.

On the death of T. Smyth, the third, the lessor's interest in the lands of Mayne, subject to the lease of 1672, became vested in Thomas Hutchinson Smyth. In or before 1806, William Henry, Duke of Gloucester, one of the lives named in the renewal of December, 1768, died. By indenture of renewal, dated the 16th of February, 1806, and made between the said T. H. Smyth, of the one part, and C. Nangle, of the other part, it was witnessed that, "in pursuance of the said covenant for perpetual renewal, and in order to fill up the three lives agreeably thereto, and in consideration of the renewal fine of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.*," the said T. Smyth added to the time of the said demise the life of the respondent, John Hyacinth Nangle, therein called John Nangle; and accordingly the said T. H. Smyth granted, &c., unto the said C. Nangle, and to his heirs and assigns, the said lands of Mayne, with the appurtenances, to hold the same unto him, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of King George III., C. Nangle, and J. H. Nangle, and the survivor of them, subject to the payment of the rent and renewal fines, and to the performance of the covenants and agreements by the said indenture particularly reserved.

* 416 * King George III. having died in 1820, by indenture of renewal, dated the 12th August in that year, and made between the said T. H. Smyth and C. Nangle, in consideration of the renewal fine of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.*, T. H. Smyth added to the term of the said demise the life of William Nangle (one of the respondents), and accordingly granted, released, and confirmed unto the said C. Nangle, and to his heirs and assigns, the said lands of Mayne, to hold the same unto him, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the said C. Nangle, J. H. Nangle, and W. Nangle, and the survivor of them, subject, &c. (as in the last-mentioned renewal).

Thomas Hutchinson Smyth died in 1830, and the lessor's interest in the fee and inheritance of the lands of Mayne, subject to the lease of 1672, and to the said several renewals, became vested in the appellant, Thomas Smyth, as tenant in tail. In Michaelmas term, 1831, he suffered a common recovery of the said lands, and thereby acquired the fee-simple; and by indenture of settlement, made upon his marriage in 1832, the lands of Mayne were limited to his own use for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the marriage in tail male, whereby the appellant, Thomas James Smyth (who is the eldest son of the marriage), is entitled to the first estate of inheritance in the said lands.

In 1831, the appellant, Thomas Smyth, alleging that a larger quantity of the lands of Mayne was in the possession of Christopher Nangle than he was entitled to hold under the description contained in the lease of 1672, caused a notice in writing to be served on him, requiring him to deliver up the quiet and peaceable possession of all parts of the town and lands of Mayne

* 417 and Upper and Lower Coole, then in * his possession, together with the moors and bogs and appurtenances thereunto belonging, "save and except such parts of the lands of Mayne as are contained in a certain indenture of renewal, bearing date the 8th April, 1719, and which indenture purports to be made in pursuance of the decree of his Majesty's Court of Chancery in Ireland, pronounced in 1716, &c. (before mentioned), and to be a renewal of a certain indenture of lease, bearing date the 24th day of May, 1672, so far as that part of the said lands of Mayne contained 148 acres of profitable land, plantation measure, and 23 acres 12 perches of unprofitable land ;” and “to take notice, that should you decline, &c., to deliver up to me the possession of the said lands, and to pay such mesne profits, &c., I will, from time to time, and for ever hereafter, decline and refuse to execute to you any renewal or underlease of any part of the said lands and premises to which you may claim to be entitled under and by virtue of the said original lease; or any renewal thereof, or the said decree, or otherwise howsoever.”

Christopher Nangle died in June, 1836, having by his will devised estates, including the said lands of Mayne, unto the respondents, Richard More O’Farrall and Gerald Dease, to the use of the respondent, J. H. Nangle, for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to the respondent, William Nangle, the second son of the said testator in tail, with remainders over.

Christopher Nangle having been one of the lives named in the seventh renewal of the lease of 1672, J. H. Nangle, becoming, upon his death, entitled to an estate for life in the lands of Mayne, claimed to have a new life added in his father’s place, upon payment of a renewal fine of 14*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.*; and accordingly

* Mr. Palles, his solicitor, wrote a letter to the appellant, * 418 T. Smyth, the 8th of July, 1836, apprising him of the death of Christopher Nangle, and of the right of J. H. Nangle to have a renewal executed to him, upon payment of the rent and renewal fine then due. The appellant’s solicitor, in answer, served a notice on Mr. Palles, in the appellant’s name, “that upon J. H. Nangle’s surrendering to the appellant such parts of the lands of Mayne, and Upper and Lower Coole, with the bogs and moors adjoining thereto, except such part of the lands of Mayne as were contained in the lease of the 8th April, 1719, and upon his paying all mesne rates and annual profits of the said lands, save as aforesaid, he, the said appellant, was ready to execute such renewal of the lease of the 8th April, 1719, as the representatives of Garrett Nangle might be entitled to claim from him;” and the notice required the respondent, J. H. Nangle, to state precisely under what title he claimed any part of the said lands, save 148 acres of profitable land, and 23a. 0r. 20p. of unprofitable land.

A negotiation was carried on by the solicitors of the parties for some time, without any result; but up to this period no objection was made by the appellant or his solicitor to execute a renewal of the lease of 1672 on the ground of its not containing a covenant for perpetual renewal ; their only objection being that the respondent, J. H. Nangle, was in possession of a larger quantity of the lands and bog of Mayne than had been devised by that lease, although the boundaries had been ascertained and settled in 1782, as before mentioned.

In November, 1836, the respondents filed their bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the appellant, and,
 * 419 as afterwards amended, against his eldest * son, Thomas James Smyth, a minor, thereby stating most of the several matters herein before mentioned, and that, “ in the said indenture of lease (of 1672) was contained a covenant on the part of H. Packenham, for the perpetual renewal of the said lease, on the fall of any of the lives therein, or in any of the renewals thereof to be, mentioned, on payment of a fine of half a year’s rent to the lessor, &c., as by the said original lease, which had been destroyed, had the plaintiffs the same to produce, would appear, and as appeared by a recital thereof in the indenture of December, 1768. The bill prayed (among other things) that the covenant for renewal, contained in the original lease, might be decreed to have been a covenant for perpetual renewal ; that the plaintiffs, or such of them as should appear entitled thereto, might be decreed to have the said original lease for lives renewed to them and for their benefit, on paying to the person who should appear to be entitled to the reversion of the said demised premises the rent and renewal fine payable thereout pursuant to the covenant in the said original lease contained ; and that the said defendant might be directed to execute such renewal to the plaintiffs forthwith, on payment of the said rent and renewal fine, &c.

The appellant, T. Smyth, by his answer, denied that he had in his possession the original lease of 1672, and insisted that it did not contain any other covenant or agreement relating to the renewal thereof, than the memorandum herein before mentioned, and which he admitted to have been indorsed thereon, and that such memorandum did not amount to a covenant for renewal ; and he relied upon the proceedings and decree in the suit of 1713, as evidence that the lease of 1672 contained no
 * 420 other agreement relating to a * renewal ; and that the Lord Chancellor, who pronounced that decree, conceived that the lease was not renewable for ever ; and the appellant further insisted, that all the persons who executed the seven renewals herein before mentioned, were, respectively, strict tenants for life of the lands of Mayne, at the time of the execution of such renewals, which they executed in ignorance of their rights; and he claimed the said lands by title paramount to the titles of all those persons and to the title of T. Smyth, the second, the defendant in the suit of 1713; and consequently insisted that he was not bound by such renewals, and that they were fraudulent and void, as against him; and he altogether denied the respondents' right to a renewal.

In Easter term, 1837, the appellant, T. Smyth, brought an ejectment in his own name and in the name of his son, the other appellant, a minor, and others, for the purpose of recovering possession of the lands of Mayne; and in case it should be held that they were not entitled to recover the entire of said lands, then they sought to recover the residue in the respondents' possession beyond the precise admeasurement demised by the lease of 1672. A verdict was found in that action for the respondents. The appellants took exceptions to the charge of the learned Judge who tried the case; and the Court of Queen's Bench awarded a venire de novo, but declared, at the same time, that the indorsement on the lease of 1672, which was recited in the renewal lease of December, 1768, did not amount to a covenant for renewal. (a)

The proceedings in that action were put in issue in the Chancery cause by a supplemental bill, filed in October, 1837, the prayer of which was, that the plaintiffs * might have * 421 the same relief in the premises as was prayed by their original bill. The appellant, T. Smyth, in his answer to the supplemental bill, relied on the same grounds of defence as were insisted on by his answer to the original bill; and the appellant, his son, joining in that answer, stated that he was a minor, and submitted his rights to the protection of the Court.

The cause came to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in November, 1838.

The respondents, by their evidence, proved the loss of the tenant's parts of the original lease of 1672, and of the renewals of 1719, 1752, 1754, and of the 2d of April, 1768. They proved the memorials of those renewals, and also produced and proved the renewals of the 25th of December, 1768, of February, 1806, and of August, 1820; and they produced the bill filed by Garrett Nangle, in 1713, the depositions of witnesses, the notes of the hearing and the decree therein, and the bill filed by T. Smyth, the third, in 1774.

(a) Bell dem. Smyth v. Nangle, 1 Jebb & S. 199.

The Lord Chancellor, by an order made on the 22d of December, 1838, ordered that the respondents' bill should be retained for six months, with liberty for the respondent, J. H. Nangle, to commence a feigned action at law against the defendants in the suit, to which they should appear gratis, and plead the general issue, and admit all matters of form, so that a trial might be had of the two following issues: First, whether at or before the time of the execution of the lease dated the 24th of May, 1672, it was agreed between Henry Pakenham (the lessor), and Bartholomew Cooper (the lessee), that the said H. Pakenham should grant to the said B. Cooper, his heirs and assigns, a lease for lives renewable for ever, of the lands and premises in the

* 422 said lease mentioned. Secondly, * whether, independent of the memorandum or indorsement on the said lease, whereby it was agreed by and between the parties thereto, "that on the renewing or inserting of any life or lives, there should be paid by the lessee, his heirs or assigns, the sum of 16*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*," there was contained in the said lease any clause, covenant, or agreement, relating to the renewal of the said lease to the said lessee, his heirs and assigns. And the parties to the said action were to be respectively at liberty to give in evidence, on the trial of such issues, all the evidence used by the said parties on the hearing of this cause. (a)

The appellants, in their petition of appeal against that order, prayed that the same might be reversed, and that the original, amended, and supplemental bills might be dismissed with costs.

Sir William Follett and Mr. Jacob, for the appellants. (b) — It is not alleged by the respondents' original or amended or supplemental bill, that there was any agreement between the lessor and the lessee, in the lease of 1672, that the lessor should grant to the lessee, or his heirs and assigns, a lease for lives renewable for ever, of the lands therein mentioned. The only agreement set forth in the bill and in the renewals therein stated, is the agreement contained in the memorandum or indorsement. It is not alleged that, independent of that memorandum or indorsement, there was contained in the lease any clause, covenant, or agreement relating to the renewal of it to the lessee, his heirs or assigns. The Court below ought not, therefore, to have directed issues as to such matters, the respondents having by their bill relied for relief * exclusively on the construction to be * 423 given to the memorandum which the appellants admitted to be on the lease of 1672. Even if the respondents had by their bill relied on any such supposed agreement at or before the execution of the lease, or on any such supposed clause, covenant, or agreement in the lease, yet, as Garrett Nangle had insisted on such supposed agreement by his bill in the Irish Court of Chancery, in 1713, and examined witnesses and failed to prove any such agreement, and as he also, on the hearing of that cause, produced the lease itself, and had it read in Court, and thereby negatived the existence of any clause, covenant, or agreement relating to the renewal of it, independent of the memorandum or indorsement, no inquiries ought now to be directed, after the lapse of more than a century, as to matters in favor of the respondents, claiming under Garrett Nangle, who had failed to prove them when witnesses living at the time of the transaction might have been and were examined.

The acts of the lessors in the several renewals granted by them since 1719 do not affect the appellants. The parties granted those renewals not only in ignorance of their own powers to grant such leases at all, but also in ignorance of their right to refuse to renew, or of the rights of the lessees to claim renewals. At all events, the acts of parties cannot form any ingredient in the construction of this agreement. An agreement that a Court will construe to be a covenant for perpetual renewal, must be so clear that it will not bear any other construction. Iggulden v. May, (a) Harnett v. Fielding, (b) Browne v. Tighe. (c) It is impossible to hold this memorandum to be a * cov- * 424 enant for perpetual renewal. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in the decree of 1716, declared it was not; and the Judges of the Queen's Bench declared the same upon deciding the exceptions to the Judge's direction at the trial of the ejectment. (d)

By the general rules of the common law, if there be a contract which has been reduced into writing, evidence is not allowed to be given of what passed between the parties, either before the written instrument was made, or during the time that it was in a state of preparation, so as to add to or subtract from, or in any manner to vary or qualify, the written contract. The first issue directed is at variance with such legal principle. The pleadings do not make such a case as warrants that issue; for the respondents rely on the agreement contained in the memorandum, and they pray that agreement to be declared a covenant for perpetual renewal. It is impracticable to produce any parol evidence upon the subject-matters of either of the issues; and all the documentary evidence capable of being adduced having been before the Court below, that Court ought to have come to a decision upon the subject without involving the parties in the expense of the trial of issues at law. Nicol v. Vaughan, (a) Viscount Lorton v. Earl of Kingston. (b)

It would be extremely dangerous to submit these issues to a jury. According to the settled principles of a Court of Equity, it is only when the Court entertains a reasonable doubt as to the fact, and when it depends on evidence the effect of which can be better ascertained before a jury, that the Court for the information of its own conscience directs an issue as to such fact:

Short v. Lee; (c) whereas in this case, if a jury could be * 425 tempted * to find in the affirmative of the issues, in order to support a long possession, the conscience of the Court of Chancery could not act on a verdict so manifestly contrary to the truth of the case and the evidence in the cause.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wakefield, for the respondents. (d) — There was doubt enough to justify the Court to direct an issue to try whether the original lease contained a clause for perpetual renewal; or whether there was a previous agreement to that effect between the parties, and not inserted in the lease. It was to be collected from the proceedings and evidence in the cause of Nangle v. Smyth, in 1713–1716, that at or before the time of the execution of the lease dated the 24th May, 1672, which was long before the passing of the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries in Ireland, it was agreed between Pakenham (the lessor), and Bartholomew Cooper (the lessee), that Pakenham should grant to Cooper, his heirs and assigns, a lease for lives renewable for ever, of the lands and premises in the lease mentioned; that was stated in the bill, and not denied in the answer. The first issue directed by the decree was a proper issue to be tried by a jury, to ascertain that point. It appeared from the evidence in that cause, and from the evidence in this cause, that there is reasonable ground to presume that, independent of the memorandum admitted to be on the lease of 1672,—whereby it was agreed between the parties thereto, “that on the renewing or inserting of any life or lives, there should be paid by the lessee, his heirs or assigns, the sum of 16*l*. 16*s*. 4*d*.,” —there was contained in that lease some clause, covenant, or agreement, * relat- * 426 ing to the renewal of it to the said lessee, his heirs and assigns; and therefore the second issue directed by the decree was a proper issue.

The loss of the tenant’s part of the original lease, and of the renewal under the decree of the Court of Chancery in 1719, was proved in the Court below, but the landlord’s parts of those respective instruments were not produced by him, although he was called on by notice in the cause to produce them. The landlord’s parts of the several subsequent renewals were produced by him, but no account or explanation was given of the non-production of the lease of 1672 and the renewal of 1719. Under these circumstances, the Court, if not justified in presuming, as the respondents contended, that the original lease did contain a covenant for perpetual renewal, was, at all events, warranted in directing that fact to be submitted to a jury for investigation and inquiry. Assuming that the Court ought not to have decided in favour of the respondents, as was contended on their part, upon the presumption of the contents of an instrument not produced, yet the question of the existence of a covenant for renewal was, as a matter of fact, a proper one to be submitted to a jury.

The principle on which the Courts of Equity direct issues is not as stated on the behalf of the appellants. In Norman v. Morrell, (a) an issue was directed as to the amount of a legacy; a doubt arising on a figure only. In Burkett v. Randall, (b) the bill prayed a conveyance on the ground of an equitable title in a testator, originating in an agreement which the answer denied, but which was supported by evidence of ownership; an issue was directed to try whether the testator was beneficially entitled at his death. In the case of * Collins v. Sawrey, (c) * 427 this House held that the Court below did right in sending an issue to a jury, though the whole of the evidence was written evidence, and the question depended on the construction of that evidence. Under the circumstances of the present case, where there were seven successive renewals of the lease by successive

* 430 contents thereof, save the recitals thereof contained * in the said indenture of the 25th day of December, 1768, herein after mentioned ; but which recitals your suppliants submit are conclusive evidence of the contents thereof, for the reasons herein after set forth." Then, in a subsequent part, the bill states that " the last-mentioned indenture of renewal contains full recitals of the several indentures herein before set forth, or mentioned, and herein before stated to have been burned or destroyed," which includes the lease of 1672, " and having been executed by Thomas Smyth, the third, who was seised of the inheritance, &c., and under whom Thomas Smyth, the defendant, claims title, your suppliants submit that Thomas Smyth (the defendant) is bound and estopped by the recitals contained in the last-mentioned indenture of renewal." Then the bill prays " that the covenant for renewal contained in the said original lease may be decreed to have been a covenant for perpetual renewal."

It is impossible to read that bill and put any other construction on it than this, that that which appears in the renewed lease of December, 1768, is a copy of that which is contained in the lease of 1672. We have not got the deed of 1672 ; it was burned or destroyed ; but we state that we know what it contains, because the deed of December, 1768, contains all the recitals and statements in that deed ; and then, having got that covenant from the deed of 1768, the bill prays that the covenant contained in the original lease, alleged to be identical with that which is stated in the renewed lease of 1768, may be declared to be a covenant for perpetual renewal. The whole case of the plaintiff is put on the construction of that covenant, which is stated by the plaintiff to be identified and ascertained by the renewed lease of 1768. Well, that case fails : it is not attempted

* 431 at the bar to be * argued that that covenant is a covenant for perpetual renewal, or that it gives the plaintiff any title to the relief which he claims by this bill. The issues tendered by the bill are as to the construction of the covenant. But what have the issues directed by the Court to do with the construction of the covenant ? They have nothing to do with the construction of the covenant ; they find out a case for the plaintiff dehors the bill.

Then it occurred to me, certainly, that if the bill had assumed a different shape, and had stated that the deed was lost, but through the dealings between the parties an inference ought to be drawn that that deed contained a covenant for perpetual renewal, and brought forward evidence for the affirmative of that proposition, that a large and reasonable inquiry might have been open to the plaintiff, which might have justified the inquiries directed by those issues. But when we look at the earlier history of this transaction, and at what passed in the year 1713, when the original lease existed, when the parties had it to produce, when they were as much interested in making the most of that lease as at the present moment, it is quite clear there is no room for any presumption that the deed itself, then in possession of the parties, did contain any other covenant but that which is contained in the renewed lease of 1768. The complaint is not of any covenant that is contained in the original lease, but the bill prays for relief on the ground of some mistake or error made by the person employed to prepare that lease, and asks for relief on the ground of that supposed error. Why, there was no error in the covenant for renewal, which is all the plaintiff asks for: instead of that, he states that which appears in the renewed lease of 1768, and asks for relief on * the ground of that not * 432 being properly adapted to the purpose the parties had in view. That shows that no further investigation, nor any other form of suit, could possibly enable the plaintiff to obtain that relief which he asks; and the person who prepared this bill had good reason for not opening a door for further inquiry, knowing that the proceedings of 1713 would show that there was no other ground on which the plaintiff's case could by possibility succeed.

No doubt, after possession has been held for so long a time, and parties have supposed they have a title which they have not, Courts of Justice are anxious to take care that no conclusion may be drawn inconsistently with the original right of the parties; and where the dealing presupposes that there are grounds of title which are not then capable of being proved, they would give the party every opportunity of proving the history of that title. Such, however, is not the title now set up by the plaintiff; and I think it would be improperly encouraging litigation to allow the plaintiff to file a bill which he will not be able to sustain. If he has any other ground of equity, or a case generally which enables him to make a new title to new relief, under those circumstances the dismissal of this bill will not prejudice him. I think it much fairer, considering the circumstances of the transaction, not to hold out any hope to the plaintiff of proceeding in a case which, according to the rules of practice, he would be precluded from proceeding with by the dismissal of his bill. I therefore propose to your Lordships that this decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I agree with what my noble and * 433 learned friend has stated in the opinion he has given * as the result of this case, in every particular. It has been said that certain inattention, or negligence, or slovenliness, as was stated in one part of the observations at the bar, has been found to prevail in other parts of the United Kingdom in the drawing of pleadings, and that on that account your Lordships ought to apply a rule to cases coming from that part of the kingdom different from the rule you apply to cases coming from nearer home. I should say, if there were such negligence or slovenli-ness (which I very much doubt), that would be an exceedingly dangerous course for your Lordships to take; for it would be the means of perpetuating that negligence, or at least slovenliness, which, it is suggested, there exists. I do not believe it exists;
 but if it does exist, your Lordships, by having one rule of pleading for Ireland and another for Westminster Hall, would undoubtedly perpetuate it. But I see no evidence whatever of this negligence in the present case. I see nothing whatever of that defect in the present pleadings. The defect is not in the draughtsman, but in the party; not in the bill, but in the case. The bill appears to me to meet the facts of the case, and no doubt it is unfortunate to the party that it must be so framed; but the case being defective in that essential particular which has been pointed out by my noble and learned friend, the bill is defective in that particular, as the case, as the facts upon which the draughtsman had to proceed, were defective; and therefore cannot be now remedied.

My Lords, a doubt appeared to exist at one moment in my noble and learned friend's mind, as in my own, whether we ought not to dismiss this bill without prejudice, so as to enable the party to file another; but I think the real answer to that is, that looking at the proceedings of 1713, that the lease was in existence
 * 434 * and was before the draughtsman who prepared that bill which was disposed of by Lord MIDDLETON, there is no evidence here, from the frame of that bill, of what the contents of the lease then before the draughtsman were. I do not say whether that bill would be evidence between the parties in the present suit, supposing an action was sent to be tried at law. I do not argue that at all ; but in the discretion which this Court has to exercise, as to whether it will encourage another suit or not, it is very material to consider whether there is any possibility, when you look at the bill, of the lease being now produced and found to contain the clause it is alleged to have contained, namely, the covenant for perpetual renewal. Is it possible to conceive that there should be a lease in existence with that covenant, when you see the way in which that bill of 1713 is framed, with the lease lying before the draughtsman at the time ? So far from saying there is a covenant for perpetual renewal in that bill, he says there were various covenants in the bill ; that it was agreed between the parties at and before the time of executing that lease, — it was understood and agreed between them, — that there should be a perpetual renewal, as more plainly appears by this clause, namely, the 16*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* clause. Now, if there had been a covenant for perpetual renewal, it would not have more plainly appeared by that clause, but it would most plainly have appeared by the covenant of renewal itself. It is clear that there was no such covenant, or the draughtsman would not have had recourse to that form of stating his case, or to that kind of evidence by which he was to support it. Then he states the reason why that sixteen-guinea clause was so framed, and was not a covenant for a perpetual renewal ; namely, the unskilfulness of the conveyancer who prepared the * lease. * 435 It is clear, in my opinion, that your Lordships have the strongest reason to suppose — the strongest reason that can be imagined — that in the lease itself, if it had not been unfortunately destroyed, there would have been found no covenant for a perpetual renewal, excepting that clause respecting the sixteen guineas, the amount of the fine.

I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend that this decree ought to be reversed, and the original bill dismissed, with costs below.

It was ordered, accordingly, that the order complained of by the appeal be reversed, and that the respondents' bill be dismissed out of the Court below, with costs ; and that the cause be remitted, &c.

• 436 • EARL OF ALDBOROUGH v. TRYE AND OTHERS.

Expectant Heir. Post-obit Securities. Rule of Value. Voluntary Deed. Practice.

A., being tenant in tail of large estates expectant on the death of his father, in consideration of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* advanced to him by O., charged the estates with 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.*, to be paid only in the event of surviving his father, who was about eighty years of age, A. being about forty-three; and he granted to R., his agent in these transactions, in consideration of his services, an annuity charged on the same estates. R. assigned the annuity to O. for valuable consideration. O. filed a bill against A., after his father's death, to enforce these securities; and A. filed a cross-bill to set them aside, charging that O. and R. took advantage of his distress, and that no adequate consideration was given him for the post-obit securities, and no consideration for the annuity; and at the hearing he gave evidence that the consideration for the two sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* was not the full value according to the tables and calculations of actuaries. O. gave no evidence of value.

Held, that the Court, in the absence of evidence to enable it to decide the question, exercised a proper discretion in directing the Master to inquire what, at the time of the transaction, was the fair market-price of the two sums so secured to be paid, regard being had to the ages of A. and of his father, and to the circumstances of the estates and A.'s interest in them.

A person seeking the benefit of a dealing with an heir expectant for his expectancies, must show that he gave him an adequate consideration, which is the fair market-price at the time of dealing, and not the value according to the calculations of actuaries on the tables.¹ (Gowland v. De Faria explained; Infra, pp. 457-461.)

Jur. § 336 et seq. The purchase of a reversion from an expectant heir will be set aside in equity, unless the purchaser, having the burden of proof, shows that the transaction was entered into in good faith, and that the sale was for full value. Bradshaw v. Salter, Salter v. Bradshaw, 26 Beav. 161; 5 Jur. n. s. 831; St. Albyn

The rule that a fair price is to be given, is sufficient protection to heirs expectant or reversioners ; but the rule of full value would not be any protection, as in that case they could not deal with their expectancies or sell their interest at all. (Infra, pp. 457, 465.)

A sale by public auction is within the proper rule, on the plain principle that the sum which the thing will fetch is the sum which it is worth. (Infra, p. 460.)

A party comes too late to complain of a decree after joining in the inquiry directed by it, and the result is against him ; and he is not entitled to question the Master's report after it is confirmed, having taken no exceptions.² (Infra, pp. 455, 456.)

If a person grants a voluntary deed, enabling the grantee to raise money on it from a third person, the grantor cannot get back or set aside the deed without paying what was advanced on it without fraud.³ (Infra, p. 463.)

The application of the rule was not prevented, (1) by the fact that the transaction was a charge and not a sale ; nor (2) that the expectant heir was a person of mature age ; nor (3) that he perfectly understood the nature and extent of the transaction ; nor (4) was it necessary for the heir to show that he was in pecuniary distress at the time. Bromley v. Smith, 26 Beav. 644. It is now fully established, that, in calculating the value of the reversionary interest, the Court will be guided not by the tables, but by the market price, and, in the case of real estate, its nature, position, and other particulars ought to be considered as affecting the value of the interest sold. 1 Lead. The rule above stated in regard to setting aside sales of reversionary interest for inadequacy of consideration, has been recently changed in England, by 31 Vic. c. 4, by which it was enacted, that no purchase made bonâ fide, and without fraud or unfair dealing, of any reversionary interest in real or personal estate, shall be hereafter opened or set aside merely on the ground of under-value. ³ Where a sale is set aside on account of the inadequacy of the consideration, or of any other matter which renders it fraudulent only by construction of law, it is upon the principle of redemption, and the conveyance will stand as a security for the principal and interest. 1 Story Eq. Jur. § 344 ; Boyd v.

June 2, 4, 15.

THE appellant is the only son of Benjamin, late Earl of * 437 Aldborough, who was one of the younger sons of * John, formerly Earl of Aldborough, and succeeded to the earldom in 1823, in consequence of the death of his elder brothers without leaving male issue. Earl John, the appellant's grandfather, died in 1802, having by his will, dated the 13th of December, 1772, devised various towns and lands of great extent and value, in the counties of Limerick, Tipperary, Dublin, Wexford, Wicklow, and Kildare, to certain uses, under which, in the events which happened previously to the year 1824, Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, was in that year tenant for life of all those estates, with remainder to the appellant in tail male.

Mason Gerard, Esq., uncle of the appellant's mother, died in 1784, having by his will, dated the 11th of March, 1782, given and devised all his real and personal estates, of what nature and kind soever, in trust (after payment of his debts and legacies, which have been long since paid) to apply one moiety of the net produce thereof to his sister, Sarah Burton, for her life, and after her decease, to the use of the said Benjamin Stratford, afterwards Earl of Aldborough, for his life; and as to the other moiety thereof, to the use of the said Benjamin for his life; and as to the whole of such real and personal estates, after the death of Benjamin, to the use of his first and other sons by Martha his wife, severally and successively, in tail male. borough, was the appellant's mother: she was daughter of Sarah Burton, who died before the year 1824.

In the year 1825, when the transactions with Mr. John Harvey Ollney (after mentioned), which form the subject of this appeal, commenced, Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, was seventy-nine years of age; * the appellant, then Viscount * 438 Amiens, was about forty-two. The properties in which he was then interested in remainder were subject to some encumbrances, but they produced to his father a clear rental of 8000*l.* a year. He had an allowance from his father of only 500*l.* a year; and having no other income for the support of himself and family, he was under great pressure and difficulties, and confined within the rules of the King's Bench prison for debt.

In those circumstances the appellant entered into a treaty with Mr. Ollney for raising a sum of 6000*l.*; and for the immediate advance of that sum, he agreed to give a security on the estates comprised in the wills before recited, and his own personal security, for 12,000*l.*, payable after his father's death, in the event of his surviving his father. Accordingly, by an indenture dated the 21st of December, 1825, and made between the appellant, by his description of Viscount Amiens, of the one part, and John Harvey Ollney, of the other part, the appellant, in consideration of 6000*l.*, covenanted that in case he should be living at the time of the decease of Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, his father, he, the appellant, his heirs, executors, or administrators, would, within three months next after the decease of the said earl, pay Ollney, his executors or administrators, the sum of 12,000*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain. And by this indenture the appellant demised unto J. H. Ollney, all those several towns, lands, and hereditaments, situate in the several counties before mentioned in Ireland, and all other lands, tenements, and hereditaments comprised in and devised by the said wills of John, Earl of Aldborough, and Mason Gerard; and all other * lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatsoever, in Ire- * 439 land, of or to which the appellant was seised or entitled at law or in equity, or otherwise howsoever, in possession, reversion, or remainder; to hold unto J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of ninety-nine years without impeachment of waste, in trust for Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, during so much of that term as he should live; and after his decease, in trust for the person or persons for the time being entitled to the said towns, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in remainder expectant on the determination of that term, in case the appellant should depart this life in the lifetime of the said earl, or if the appellant should survive him, then until default should be made in payment of the sum of 12,000*l.*; and in case of such default, then that Ollney, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should, at any time thereafter, and without the necessity of any further authority or concurrence of the appellant, by sale or mortgage levy and raise the sum of 12,000*l.*, or so much thereof as should remain unpaid, with interest, to be computed from the end of three months next after the decease of the said earl, together with all incidental costs and charges.

The indenture contained a covenant by the appellant to levy fines; and also, in case he should survive the earl his father, to suffer common recoveries of the said lands and hereditaments; and it was thereby agreed and declared, that the fines and recoveries should operate and enure to the use of J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the said term, upon the trusts before expressed.

Fines were accordingly levied of the said lands by the *440 appellant, in the Court of Common Pleas in *Ireland; and the payment contingently, as before stated, of the said sum of 12,000*l.*, was further secured by the appellant's bond, executed by him as part of the same transaction.

The appellant having received the above 6000*l.*—with considerable deductious under the designation of costs, premium, and commission,—was soon afterwards released from confinement. Being again pressed by difficulties, and in urgent distress, he was obliged again to raise money; and, accordingly, through the agency of Mr. Lucius Hooke Robinson, by whose agency he had raised the 6000*l.*, it was arranged that the appellant, in consideration of 10,000*l.*, should grant another post-obit security to J. H. Ollney for 20,000*l.*, to be paid on the like events. Accordingly, by another indenture, dated the 27th of July, 1827, the appellant, in consideration of the sum of 10,000*l.* therein alleged to be paid to him by Ollney, covenanted, that in case he should be living at the time of the decease of the said earl his father, he, the appellant, his heirs, executors, or administrators, would, within three months next after such decease, pay unto Ollney, his executors, or administrators, the sum of 20,000*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain. And it was thereby agreed and declared, that the powers given to him and them over the said lands and hereditaments by the before stated indenture of the 21st

December, 1825, might be exercised for securing the payment of the 20,000*l.* with interest from the time the same should become payable, as well as the payment of the said 12,000*l.* and interest. The payment contingently, as aforesaid, of the sum of 20,000*l.* was further secured by the appellant's bond executed at the same time.

* As part of the same transaction, the appellant also * 441 executed an indenture, dated the 28th of July, 1827, expressed to be made between him and Lucius Hooke Robinson, of Charlotte Street, Bloomsbury, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, whereby the appellant, in consideration of services done for him by Robinson, granted unto him, his executors, administrators, and assigns, an annuity of 200*l.* charged upon the said lands and hereditaments, for the term of ninety-nine years, to commence from the death of Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, if the appellant should be then living, and fully to be completed and ended if Robinson should so long live, and to be paid by equal quarterly payments; the first payment to be made at the expiration of three calendar months after the decease of the said earl, if the appellant should survive him. And by the same indenture the appellant demised unto Robinson all those lands in the several counties before-mentioned in Ireland, and all other the lands comprised in and devised by the wills of John, Earl of Aldborough, and Mason Gerard; and all and singular other the towns, lands, and hereditaments whatsoever in Ireland, of or to which the appellant was then seised or entitled in possession, reversion, or remainder; to hold unto Robinson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of one hundred years, without impeachment of waste, upon certain trusts, for securing the said annuity. And by another indenture of the same date, Robinson was appointed receiver over all the estates after the death of the appellant's father.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 2d and 3d of July, 1828, the release being of seven parts, and expressed to be made between Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, of the first part; the appellant, of the * second part; James Mont- * 442 gomery Blair, Robert Saunders, the Rev. John Christopher Lloyd, and others, of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh parts; and by common recoveries suffered in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, in pursuance of an agreement contained in the indenture of release, the lands and hereditaments devised by the wills of John, Earl of Aldborough, and Mason Gerard, were discharged from the estate tail of the appellant therein, and all remainders thereupon expectant, and were limited and assured by the appellant and his father to the use that the said J. M. Blair, his executors and administrators, might, during the joint lives of Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, and of the appellant, receive, upon certain trusts in that indenture contained, a yearly rent-charge of 700*l.* out of the said lands and hereditaments; and subject thereto, to the use that, after the decease of the said Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, the said R. Saunders and J. C. Lloyd should receive upon the trusts therein mentioned a yearly rent-charge of 700*l.* out of the said lands and hereditaments; and subject to this last mentioned yearly rent-charge, to such uses as Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, and the appellant, should by deed jointly appoint; and in default of and until such appointment, to the use of the said Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste, and after his decease to the use of the appellant, his heirs and assigns for ever.

In the year 1833 the appellant applied to Mr. Ollney for a further sum, which the latter agreed to advance upon further security; and accordingly by indentures of lease and release, dated the 1st and 2d of March, 1833, the release expressed to be made between the appellant of the first part, J. H. Ollney of the

* 443 King * of the third part, the appellant covenanted with Ollney, that, in consideration of 5000*l.* alleged to be paid to him by Ollney, he would, on the 2d of August then next, pay unto Ollney, his executors, administrators or assigns, the sum of 5000*l.*, with interest for the same after the rate of 6*l.* per cent per annum; and the appellant conveyed unto the said Margaret Powell and W. C. King, and their heirs, all those the lands and hereditaments in the said several counties of Ireland, and all other the lands and hereditaments devised by the wills of John, Earl of Aldborough, and Mason Gerard; and all other lands and hereditaments in Ireland of or to which the appellant was then seised or entitled in possession, reversion or remainder; to hold to the use of Margaret Powell and W. C. King, their heirs and assigns, for ever, subject to the life-estate of Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, and to the said indentures of the 21st of December, 1825, and 27th of July, 1827, and the said annuity of 700*l.* limited to R. Saunders and C. Lloyd; nevertheless, in case the said sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.*, secured by the said indentures, should either never become payable, or should, together with all interest, have been fully paid at the expiration of six calendar months next after the decease of Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, and in case the said 5000*l.*, and all interest thereon, should have been fully paid within six calendar months after the decease of the said earl, then in trust for the appellant in fee; and in case such several sums, or any part thereof, or any interest thereon, should be unpaid at the end of six calendar months next after the decease of the said earl, then upon trust to sell and dispose of the said lands and hereditaments, or any part thereof; and out * of the moneys to arise from such sale * 444 or sales, and out of the rents and profits which should arise from and after the death of the said earl, in the first place to pay all expenses of sale; and in the next place to pay unto J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, or assigns, all such principal moneys and interest as aforesaid, and the ultimate surplus, which should remain, unto the appellant, his executors, administrators, or assigns.

By an indenture dated the 4th of March, 1833, made between the said L. H. Robinson and J. H. Ollney, Robinson, in consideration of 750*l.*, assigned to Ollney, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the annuity of 200*l.* granted by the deed of 28th of July, 1827, and the lands and hereditaments thereby demised to Robinson as aforesaid.

Benjamin, Earl of Aldborough, died in July 1833, leaving the appellant (who succeeded to the earldom) surviving; whereupon Mr. Ollney became entitled to the several sums secured by the said recited indentures.

In Michaelmas term, 1833, J. H. Ollney filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the appellant and others, thereby stating the said securities executed to him by the appellant, and the said deeds whereby the annuity of 200*l.* was granted to Robinson and assigned to Ollney; and the bill prayed that an account might be taken of what was due to Ollney for principal and interest in respect of the said three several sums of 12,000*l.*, 20,000*l.*, and 5000*l.*, and in respect of the said annuity; and also of all incumbrances affecting the said lands and premises prior to his demands; and that, in default of payment of the sums which should be found due on such account, the appellant might be barred and for ever foreclosed of * and * 445 from all benefit and equity of redemption, of and in the towns, lands, tenements, and hereditaments respectively charged with the said principal sums and interest, and that the same might be sold by and under the direction of the Court for the residue of such terms, or such other period as the Court should think proper; and that out of the proceeds of such sales the sum which should be found due to J. H. Ollney, upon taking the accounts, and such charges (if any) as the Court should consider to be properly payable thereout, might be paid and satisfied, and that the residue of such proceeds, or a competent part thereof, might be properly secured for the purpose of answering the accruing payments of the annuity of 200*l.*; and that in the mean time a receiver might be appointed of the rents, and be directed to apply the same towards satisfaction of the sums due and to become due to Ollney.

In March, 1835, the appellant put in his answer, whereby he admitted the material facts stated in the bill, but alleged that in the years 1810, 1812, 1814, and 1816, he charged the said lands and hereditaments with annuities amounting to upwards of 1324*l.*, payable during the lives of himself and of other persons, in the event of his surviving his father, and with divers principal sums of money, amounting to upwards of 40,000*l.*, payable in the like event; and he alleged that at the time when J. H. Ollney paid him the said sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* he was in great pecuniary distress, and was thereby induced to submit to unreasonable terms; and that L. H. Robinson was employed by Ollney, and not by the appellant, in negotiating the said transactions; and that the indenture of the 21st of December, 1825, was prepared by Mr. W. R. King, the solicitor of Ollney, and was executed by the appellant in prison, without consulting any

* 446 *solicitor; and that the said indenture was not in conformity to the agreement between the parties, for that the appellant had agreed to pay the sum of 12,000*l.* within twelve, and not within three months, after the death of his father, if he survived him; and that the appellant, on the execution of the said indenture, paid to L. H. Robinson 600*l.* as a bonus, with the knowledge of Ollney; and that the indenture of the 27th of July, 1827, was also prepared by W. R. King, and was executed by the appellant while abroad, and without consulting any solicitor; and that on the execution of the last mentioned indenture, the appellant paid to Robinson 1000*l.* as a bonus, and also paid to W. R. King 500*l.* for his charges, exclusive of stamps and other costs out of pocket, and travelling expenses; and that the indenture of the 28th day of July, 1827, was prepared by W. R. King, with the privity of Ollney; and that by another deed the appellant appointed L. H. Robinson receiver of the rents of the said hereditaments, after the death of the appellant's father; and that in the year 1825 the appellant's father was upwards of eighty-three years of age, and was in a very infirm state of health, and that the appellant was then only forty-five years of age, and a very healthy person; and the appellant, by his answer, insisted that, on payment of the said sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.*, with interest from the times of the said advances, the indentures of the 21st of December, 1825, and the 27th of July, 1827, ought to be set aside, and that the indenture of the 28th July, 1827, ought to be set aside without payment by the appellant of any sum whatsoever. And the appellant alleged that, out of the said sum of 5000*l.*, he paid W. R. King 300*l.* for expenses; but he admitted that Ollney was entitled to the said sum of 500*l.*, secured by the indentures * of the 1st and 2d March, * 447 1833, with interest thereon from the time of the advance thereof; and the appellant submitted that, at the time of the said several transactions with J. H. Ollney, the appellant was in the situation of an expectant heir, dealing with his expectancies, and that advantage had been taken by Ollney and his agent of the situation of appellant, and of his necessities and embarrassments, and that appellant was entitled in equity to be relieved from the said bargains.

The appellant, on the 19th February, 1835, before putting in the foregoing answer, filed his cross-bill in the Irish Court of Chancery, against J. H. Ollney, Margaret Powell, and William Charles King, and thereby stated the original bill of J. H. Ollney; and also stated and charged the several matters contained in the appellant's said answer, or to that effect. And the appellant, by his cross-bill, prayed that the said indentures of the 21st of December, 1825, 27th and 28th of July, 1827, and his bonds to Ollney, bearing date the 21st of December, 1825, and 27th of July, 1827, might be set aside as fraudulent and void, and be delivered up to be cancelled, upon payment by the appellant of the principal sums actually and bonâ fide paid to him on the occasion of the execution of the said deeds, after deducting all such sums as the appellant, by fraud or imposition, was compelled to repay or allow to L. H. Robinson and W. R. King, at the desire and by the contrivance of J. H. Ollney, which principal sums, with interest thereon from the time they were respectively advanced, the appellant thereby undertook to pay: and that the said annuity deed of the 28th of July, 1827, might be set aside, and delivered up to be cancelled; and that an account might be taken of the sum due for principal and interest

* 448 on foot of the sums * actually and bond fide received by the appellant for his own use at the time of the said respective alleged advances, and also an account of the sum of 5000*l.* advanced to him on the 2d of March, 1833, with interest; and that the said several deeds and securities obtained by Ollney, if not altogether set aside, might be deemed to be securities only for the sum or sums of money which, upon the taking of the accounts, should appear due on the foot of said advances; and that upon payment thereof, Ollney, Margaret Powell, and W. C. King should be directed to release and convey to the appellant the several lands and premises so conveyed to them, freed from all incumbrances whatsoever made by them.

J. H. Ollney put in his answer to the cross-bill, and thereby insisted on his title to the whole relief prayed by his original bill. W. C. King and Margaret Powell likewise put in answers to the cross-bill. Margaret Powell subsequently died, and J. H. Ollney died in January, 1836, having made his will, and appointed the respondents his executors, who duly proved the same in the Prerogative Court in Ireland. The bill and cross-bill were revived soon afterwards, and both causes being at issue, witnesses were examined for the appellant and respondents.

The witnesses for the respondents proved the execution of the deeds before mentioned, and the payment of the sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* and 5000*l.* to the appellant, and of 750*l.* by Ollney to Robinson, and that Robinson was the agent of the appellant in those transactions.

The witnesses for the appellant proved his distress and embarrassments in 1825–28, and that his father was seventy-nine years of age in 1825, and himself only forty-two, and in good

* 449 health, and that, according to * the tables for calculating reversionary interests at the insurance offices, the sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* were not adequate prices for the contingent sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.*

The causes came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who by his decree, dated 7th of February, 1837, ordered and decreed that it should be referred to the Master to inquire and report whether, under all the circumstances, the sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.*, paid by John Harvey Ollney to the appellant, on the 21st of December, 1825, and the 27th of July, 1827, respectively, were the fair market-prices for the sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* secured to be paid to Ollney by the appellant at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned, taking into consideration the relative ages, at the time, of the appellant and his father, Benjamin O'Neale, then Earl of Aldborough, and the circumstances of the property whereon said sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* were intended to be secured, and the estate and interest of the appellant therein, and the other circumstances in the pleadings mentioned, relative to the transactions.

The respondents and the appellant proceeded before the Master under that decree, and all the proofs in the original and cross causes were there entered as read; and in addition thereto, the respondents examined six witnesses, actuaries, and auctioneers, who differed very much in regard to the question of market-price value of the 12,000*l.* and the 20,000*l.* The Master by his report, dated the 28th of March, 1838, found that the sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* paid by Ollney to the appellant, on the 21st of December, 1825, and the 27th of April, 1827, respectively, were the fair market-prices for said sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* secured to be paid to him by the appellant, at the times and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned.

* The causes came on to be heard upon the said report * 450 and merits and further directions, before the said Lord Chancellor, when his Lordship, by a decree dated the 26th of April, 1838, was pleased to order and decree that the said report should stand confirmed; and that the said two sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* secured by the said deeds, bearing date respectively the 21st of Dec., 1825, and 27th July, 1827, and interest thereon respectively at the rate of 5*l.* per cent per annum from the 10th of October, 1833, until paid, were charges on the lands and premises in the pleadings mentioned, and that the respondents were entitled thereto. And his Lordship further ordered and decreed that the respondents were also entitled to the sum of 5000*l.* secured by the said deed dated the 2d of March, 1833, with interest thereon at the rate of 6*l.* per cent per annum, to be computed from the 2d of March, 1833, until paid. And his Lordship declared that the respondents were not entitled to the said annuity of 200*l.* a year, granted to L. H. Robinson, and assigned to J. H. Ollney; but that the deeds granting and assigning the same were only to stand as a security for the sum of 750*l.*, being the consideration money paid by Ollney to Robinson for the purchase of the said annuity, with interest thereon from the 4th of March, 1833, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent per annum until paid; and his Lordship ordered that the bill in the original cause should stand dismissed without costs, so far as the same sought to establish the annuity. And his Lordship referred it to the said Master to take an account of what was due to the respondents for principal and interest in respect of the aforesaid several sums of 12,000*l.*, 20,000*l.*, 5000*l.*, and 750*l.*; and also to take an account

 * 451 estates of the appellant in the pleadings mentioned, * in which said accounts all just and fair allowances were to be given; and the Master was to be at liberty to advertise for all persons having or claiming to have any such prior encumbrances as aforesaid, to come in and prove the same before him. And his Lordship further ordered that the respondents should have their costs as plaintiffs in the first cause, and as defendants in the second cause, including the costs of the reference under the decree of the 7th of February, 1837, as against the appellant, and the lands and premises in the pleadings mentioned.

The appellant, considering himself aggrieved by the decree of the 7th of February, 1837, the report of the 28th of March, 1838, and by the decree of the 26th of April, 1838, appealed therefrom respectively.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Knight Bruce, for the appellant.— Upon the principles by which Courts of Equity are governed, it was incumbent on the respondents, in order to support the two post-obit transactions, to have proved, at the hearing of the causes in 1837, that the value had been paid by their testator, the purchaser of the two post-obits, at the times when he became the purchaser. Peacock v. Evans, (a) Gowland v. De Faria, (b) Davis v. The Duke of Marlborough, (c) Lord Portmore v. Taylor. (d) Not only did the respondents fail to do this, but it was proved against them by the appellant distinctly, by uncontradicted evidence, that the value had not been paid on either occasion; and therefore relief ought to have been given to the appellant, at the original hearing, according to the prayer of his cross-bill, without further inquiry.

Inadequate as the purchase-moneys for these securities
 * 452 * were, there were several very large deductions from them in payments to Mr. King, the solicitor, and to Mr. Robinson. In the appellant's pressing difficulties, he was unable to resist the demands of those persons; and as to the securities themselves, they were not what he agreed on, and he executed them without professional advice.

On the supposition that it was proper to direct any inquiry at the original hearing, the inquiries directed by the decree then made were not such as the nature and circumstances of the case required or rendered proper. Whether that decree was right or wrong, the Master's report was erroneous, and not warranted by the evidence before him.

The decrees have not done justice to the appellant, either as to the costs of the suits, or as to the annuity of 200*l.*; as to which there was no just ground upon which to charge the appellant, as he is by the last decree charged, with the 750*l.* alleged to have been paid by Ollney to Robinson.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Jacob, for the respondents. — The decrees and report are consistent with the evidence, by which it was clearly shown that the two sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* were paid by Mr. Ollney to the appellant, and that those sums were, under all the circumstances affecting the appellant and his reversionary interest at the time, fair and ample considerations for the contingent sums secured by him to Mr. Ollney. The appellant was fully competent to bind himself by the deeds, which he deliberately executed, and no improper advantage was taken of him. Robinson was his own agent.

There was no dispute as to the 5000*l.*, the consideration for the indentures of the 1st and 2d March, *1833. That *453 sum was bond fide paid by Mr. Ollney to the appellant; and the provisions contained in the indenture of the 2d of March, 1833, were such as he had reasonably a right to require; and unless the same had been inserted, he would not have made the advance of 5000*l.*

The sum of 750*l.* paid by Mr. Ollney to Robinson as the consideration for the deed of assignment of the 4th March, 1833, was actually and bond fide paid; and if any grounds had existed, as between the appellant and Robinson, for impeaching the annuity of 200*l.*, Ollney had no notice of it. The transaction is, at all events, valid and unimpeachable to the extent of the sum of 750*l.* and interest. If the appellant considered himself aggrieved by the original decree directing the inquiries by the Master, the decree of February, 1837, he ought to have appealed against it without delay ; and if he considered the report of the Master improper, he ought to have taken exceptions : the report not having been excepted to, is conclusive against the appellant.

[They cited, in addition to the cases referred to in the reply, and stated in the Lord Chancellor's judgment, on the point of adequacy of consideration, Moth v. Atwood, (a) and Whichcote v. Bramston, (b) on the same point, and on the conclusiveness of the Master's report when not excepted to.]

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. — The rule as to adequacy of value was undoubtedly relaxed by Chief Baron Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER, in Headen v. Rosher, (c) in respect of the sale of reversions. He had laid it down more correctly in Ryle v. Swindells. (d) The protection * which the Court gives to expectant heirs in the disposal of their expectancies remains unchanged. Inadequate as the stipulated considerations for the sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* were, they were paid with large deductions under the description of costs, commission, and gratuities to Mr. King, the solicitor, and to Mr. Robinson.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — In this case I was desirous, before I stated to your Lordships any opinion I had formed on the arguments, to have an opportunity of looking into the pleadings, particularly with respect to the annuity of 200*l.* The cause came on upon a bill and cross-bill ; the object of the cross-bill being to set aside certain post-obit securities, given by the present Lord Aldborough, during the lifetime of his father. When the cause came to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, a reference was made to the Master to inquire, "Whether, under all the circumstances, the sum of 6000*l.* paid by J. H. Ollney to the now Earl of Aldborough, was a fair market-price for the sum of 12,000*l.* secured to Ollney at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned, taking into consideration the relative ages, at the time, of the said Earl of Aldborough, and his father, Benjamin O'Neale, then Earl of Aldborough, and the circumstances of the property whereon the said sum of 12,000*l.* was intended to be secured, and the estate and interest of the defendant, the Earl of Aldborough, therein, and the other circumstances in the pleadings mentioned relative to the said transaction." There was a similar inquiry directed in respect of the sum of 10,000*l*.

Upon this reference, on the 7th of February, 1837, * the * 455 Master made his report, by which he found that under all the circumstances the sum of 6000*l*. paid by Ollney on the 21st of December, 1825, was a fair market-price for the sum of 12,000*l*., secured to be paid to Ollney at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned. There was a similar finding with respect to the sum of 10,000*l*. No exceptions were taken to this report. It was at one time supposed that there was some informality in the manner in which the report was confirmed. That supposition was removed, and there appears now to be no irregularity in the mode in which that report was dealt with upon the decree for further directions. The case, therefore, stands upon the report not complained of, establishing the fact that, with regard to those two sums, the sums paid by Ollney were, under all the circumstances of the case, fair prices for the sums secured by Lord Aldborough, in his then situation of expectant heir.

My Lords, two grounds of objection have been taken to the course adopted by the Court of Chancery in Ireland. The first is, that the Master's finding did not justify the decree upon further directions, by which the security was enforced against the estates charged with it. The other is that, however that might be, yet, upon the original decree, inasmuch as it was not then proved that the price given was a fair price, it was the duty of the Court to have granted the relief prayed by the cross-bill.

On the second ground of objection, I propose to state my opinion first ; and I think your Lordships will not be disposed to give much weight to that objection. The party takes the inquiry, and does not complain of the decree directing it till after the result of the inquiry is ascertained to be against him. Although * undoubtedly it is competent to him to complain * 456 of the original decree, it is not a complaint to which your Lordships will be very ready to listen. If he can show that there was any error in that decree, he is not precluded from stating his complaint ; but in a matter, which is purely matter of discretion, where the Court thinks it has not sufficient information to enable it to administer justice between the parties, it either directs an issue to a jury, or an inquiry by the Master, for the purpose of better ascertaining the facts: it did so here, and when your Lordships find, upon that inquiry, that the facts led to a conclusion against the plaintiff, your Lordships will not be much disposed to set aside the whole proceeding, because the Court exercised the discretion of directing that inquiry in order to ascertain the facts. I conceive it was quite competent to the Court, and that the Court exercised a very sound discretion in directing that inquiry. It appears to be established by several cases, that where a party deals with an expectant heir, the onus is upon him to show that he gave a fair price for that which he purchased. It does not from that proposition follow that he is bound to establish it in a different way from that in which it is competent to any other suitor to establish any other fact upon which his cause rests; and if, when the cause comes to a hearing, the Court finds that it requires further inquiry to ascertain the facts necessary for the due decision of the case, that is a matter so entirely in the discretion of the Court, that a complaint resting upon that ground is not one to which your Lordships would very readily yield.

Now I think I shall in a few words satisfy your Lordships, that there was no evidence in this case to enable the Court
* 457 satisfactorily to dispose of the * question between the parties. The Court, therefore, directed an inquiry, and the result of that inquiry is what I have stated. That, however, leaves entirely open the question, whether the result of the inquiry by the Master entitled the party, claiming the benefit of the security, to a decree to enforce it, or whether it would have entitled the party who was seeking to have that transaction set aside, to have a decree for that purpose.

In order to support the proposition set up on the part of Lord Aldborough, who complains of these securities, and seeks to have them set aside, it was argued, that in the case of Gowland v. De Faria (a) the proposition had been established. There are two propositions, one of which was established, and the other supposed to be established, in that case. The one said to be established was that, in a transaction with an expectant heir, it was necessary for the party seeking the benefit of that transaction to show that he gave a fair price: but that proposition has been the subject of much observation undoubtedly since that decision took place, and it has been considered as interfering a good deal with that proper discretion, which persons, who are capable, according to the law of this country, of disposing of their property, ought to be at liberty to exercise. At the same time, it does establish a rule, which has the effect of protecting persons who are, generally speaking, very much in need of protection. Of the policy of that rule it is not my purpose to say any thing; that rule has been established in the case of Gowland v. De Faria, and has been recognized since.

But another proposition has been supposed to be established by that case, which is, that in transactions * of this * 458 sort, the Court has only to look at the value of the reversionary interest calculated according to the tables; that is to say, how much of the value of the property is to be deducted on account of its being a postponed interest,—postponed by the chance of the duration of another's life,—and that that is capable of being reduced by calculation to what is considered a fair reduction with reference to the duration of the life on which it is dependent. I do not find any such proposition established by Sir WILLIAM GRANT in that case. Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER, in the case of Headen v. Rosher, (a) and Lord LYNTHURST, in the case of Potts v. Curtis, (b) entertained the same opinion: and upon looking at the language of Sir WILLIAM GRANT, it does appear to me that that rule is not at all to be extracted from it. In that case there was no evidence but that of the actuaries, and the evidence of the actuaries proved that the sum given was not the marketable value of the reversion. Sir WILLIAM GRANT, in observing on the case, states the evidence before him, namely, that of the actuaries, and says there is no other evidence in the case; and he then proceeds upon that evidence, there being no other. Now, the only observation I will make upon that case is, that one may suppose it would have been a more wholesome course to have adopted,—seeing that the evidence was only the evidence of the actuaries, and the Court being of opinion that that was not evidence which ought to be conclusive in a case of that description between these parties,—I say it would seem to have been better to have adopted some course for the purpose of ascertaining more correctly the value, in the sense in which that term is to be used in * inquiries of that kind. Sir * 459 WILLIAM GRANT, however, did not adopt that course, and he decided it upon the only evidence he had, that only evidence being to the effect that an inadequate consideration had been given. It is, therefore, not an expression of opinion by Sir WILLIAM GRANT that that is a rule that ought to be adopted. It is only a dealing with that case with reference to its own particular circumstances. That rule has been disapproved of by subsequent decisions of the highest authority. It was disapproved of by Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER, in a judgment, the reasons of which are very conclusive to show the soundness of the conclusion at which he arrived. (a) It was also objected to and disapproved of by Lord LYNDHURST, in the case to which I have referred: (b) and if your Lordships consider what the effect of that rule would be, how inapplicable it is to the great mass of cases, how little calculated it is to lead to a right conclusion, and how much it must interfere with the right of disposing of property, I am sure your Lordships will not hesitate in preferring the rule which has been established in the subsequent cases, to that which has been supposed to have been established in the case of Gowland v. De Faria. It is sufficient to say that the establishment of that rule would make it impossible for an expectant heir to dispose of his interest at all. That, I apprehend, is quite a sufficient objection. It is a rule also, which, as a general rule, being calculated on the result of a great mass of cases, must apply with great injustice in a great variety of individual cases. The lives are supposed to be of average value, but the life in question may be an

(b) 1 Younge, 543.

 * 460 extraordinarily good, or an extraordinarily *bad one; which is likely to last beyond the usual time, or the contrary. How then can it be right to establish a rule not applicable to the particular case, but applying to a mass of cases collected together, and to make that rule govern an individual case, to which it may not at all apply?

My Lords, I will not go further into my reasons for not adhering to that supposed rule. The matter having been very fully and very ably discussed by Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER and by Lord LYNDHURST, it appears unnecessary further to discuss it here, than to say that I entirely concur in the reasons of those two very learned Judges, and I do not think that the rule supposed to be extracted from Gowland v. De Faria is a rule which ought to be laid down. Then, if that be so, in what position does the present case stand? Taking the report as establishing the fact, — the cross bill having for its object to set aside these transactions, and it being established as a fact that these transactions are fair and proper transactions, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case, — I will only observe that the cases of Shelley v. Nash, (a) and Baker v. Bentt, (b) although they are not expressly to the same point, yet they establish this proposition, that the market-price is the thing to be looked at; for if the market-price is not the thing to be looked at, how is it established that a sale by auction is within the rule, or sale by auction is a means of ascertaining the market-price? It is a means of ascertaining as nearly as it can be ascertained, that the sum which the thing will fetch in the market is the sum which the thing is worth; and therefore negatives the imputation of fraud.

(b) Potts v. Curtis, 1 Younge, 543.

This case, therefore, stands upon the fact being * estab- * 461
lished that that sum which was given was the fair market-price: now, taking that as a fact which is established, and which, therefore, constitutes a proposition fixed between the parties, that the party buying gave the fair market-price under all the circumstances; that that is the proposition your Lordships have to decide, and which the Court of Chancery in Ireland had to decide, it is impossible that the case on the part of the appellant can be maintained for a moment, unless the doctrine be established which is supposed to be extracted from Gowland v. De Faria. This transaction now cannot be any further questioned. It appears to me to be established that the fair market-price was given for these bonds and other securities, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case, to all the facts which are referred to in the pleadings, all of which were material in order to fix the price that was fair and proper for Mr. Ollney to give to Lord Aldborough under the circumstances. I apprehend, therefore, that as soon as it is established that the doctrine supposed to be extracted from Gowland v. De Faria is not the doctrine of a Court of Equity, and as soon as it appears that the parties are precluded from disputing the finding of the Master, the question is in substance disposed of as far as relates to these two sums of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.*

One other part of the case only remains, and that is a point upon which I was desirous of examining the pleadings, which unfortunately upon that, which is the only part of the case involving any difficulty, are not printed in the papers. There was an annuity given, and a deed, not of the same date, but alleged to have been part of the same transaction, dated on the day after the grant of one of these securities. It is an annuity given to Mr. Robinson; and at a subsequent period, Mr.

(a) 3 Madd. 232.

(b) 1 Russ. & My. 224.

* 462 Ollney, the grantee of the other security, * is alleged to have purchased from Mr. Robinson this annuity for 750*l*.

The case made by the cross-bill is that it was a mere fiction, in order to give an appearance of validity to the transaction which did not in fact belong to it; that Mr. Robinson was only a trustee or agent for Mr. Ollney; that it was intended as an additional benefit to Mr. Ollney. The cross-bill stated in substance, that Mr. Robinson was the agent and attorney for Mr. Ollney, not for Lord Aldborough, and that his name was used for the purpose of securing this benefit to Mr. Ollney, and that the 750*l*. either was not paid at all, or was only colorably paid. That case has entirely failed; it is established that Mr. Robinson was the agent for Lord Aldborough; and it is established that the annuity was granted for Mr. Robinson's benefit in the first instance, and that Mr. Ollney afterwards paid 750*l*. to Mr. Robinson. Now the cross-bill does not impeach the transaction as a transaction in which an attorney has secured, improperly, a benefit to himself from his client; it does not attack it upon that ground at all. The grounds upon which it is impeached, and upon which it is sought to take the benefit of that purchase from Mr. Ollney, have entirely failed. I may assume that this is not affected at all with fraud, but that it was a voluntary annuity, because that is admitted by the other party; that is to say, voluntary so far that there was no money consideration paid for it. Whether it was earned by any services we do not know, but we know that it was not the subject of a money consideration, nor of purchase, between Mr. Robinson and Lord Aldborough. That was a transaction in 1828. Five years afterwards, in 1833 (nothing in the mean time being done for the purpose of questioning the security, it being a security under the hand of Lord Aldborough), Mr. Ollney purchased it, and

* 463 paid * 750*l*. for it; and the decree does confer this benefit upon Lord Aldborough, that it sets aside the transaction, but it requires him to pay the 750*l*. which had been paid by Mr. Ollney, with interest; and as against him, the decree is to operate by setting aside the annuity which he had purchased.

Now, when we consider that the cross-bill does not attack the annuity upon any other ground than want of consideration, except that imputed combination between Mr. Robinson and Mr. Ollney which is not established in fact, but which is disproved, I think that Lord Aldborough has got as much benefit from the Court of Equity in Ireland as he could reasonably expect, because he has the benefit of that transaction being set aside. He has not got the benefit of that transaction being set aside without repaying the money actually paid by Mr. Ollney for the purchase; and I apprehend that even if the bill had impeached the transaction in a different and more correct mode than this, he never could have had ground upon the facts, as they stand here, to have got any decree to set aside that transaction without repaying the party what had been actually paid. If a man puts into the hands of another the means of obtaining money from a third person, he never can be able to get a decree to get rid of that transaction, arising out of the security which he has intrusted to another, and of which he, the party complaining, was the author, without first repaying the money thus obtained.

That has been established in the case of voluntary deeds. In the case of George v. Milbanke,^(a) Lord ELDON established this, that even as against creditors, where the party had been the author of a voluntary deed, and that voluntary deed had been used by the *holder of it for the purpose of either *464 raising money upon it, or for sale, that even a creditor in the case of bankruptcy could not get it back without repaying the money that had been paid for it:¹ but here the application is made by the author of this, which is a voluntary deed altogether, to deprive the party of the benefit he is to derive under it. Now, a voluntary deed is not impeachable upon those grounds upon which we know that many transactions between man and man are set aside. Here the author of a voluntary security comes into a Court of Equity, and asks the Court to set aside the transaction against the party who has purchased the benefit conferred by it, without paying him that which he has paid himself. I think that the equity which the Court of Chancery in Ireland has administered in that respect is perfectly correct, and that the way in which the appellant has put his case is not sustainable against the decree, against which he has come to your Lordships' bar to complain.

Under all these circumstances, it appears to me that the Court of Chancery was quite justified in the decrees which it has made, and that the appellant has failed in making out his case to your Lordships. I should propose, therefore, to your Lordships to affirm the decrees below, with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I entirely agree with the view which my noble and learned friend has taken in both parts of this case ; the latter part being the only part about which any doubt could exist. I also agree with him that Lord Aldborough has had quite as much benefit as he could have expected in the Court below. With respect to what has been said of the case of Gowland v. De Faria, and the doctrine supposed to be laid

* 465 down in that case, two questions might arise : * the first is, whether the doctrine really exists in that case, which has been supposed there to exist. Upon that point I have some doubt ; but if that doctrine is justly imputed to the case of Gowland v. De Faria, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in the view which he takes, and which was taken by Lord LYNDHURST in the case of Potts v. Curtis, that that doctrine, if it exists at all in that case, is now to be considered as overruled. It certainly never could have been the intention of the rule, with respect to expectant heirs dealing with a purchaser, that they should not have the power of dealing at all with their reversion. The rule laid down by the Courts has certainly made that dealing very difficult ; it has discouraged that dealing, for the purpose of protecting an expectant heir ; it has made that discouragement very great indeed ; but unless it is intended to say that the practical object of the rule was what undoubtedly in effect it would be, were the doctrine supposed to exist in Gowland v. De Faria, still maintained, unless it is meant to say that they shall practically never dispose of their reversion at all, it appears to me clearly impossible to maintain that supposed doctrine. I think in many cases such a rule would be any thing rather than a protection to an expectant heir. Upon the whole, therefore, I entirely agree with the view taken by my noble and learned friend. The matter never, indeed, admitted of any considerable doubt ; it was only with respect to the point I first mentioned, and which was last dealt with by my noble and learned friend, that the case stood over for consideration.

The appeal was dismissed, and the decrees complained of were affirmed, with costs.

Discovery. Pleading. Parties. Demurrer. Foreign Sovereign.

A bill of discovery in aid of a defence to an action cannot be sustained against a person who is not a party to the record at law, although charged in the bill to be solely interested in the subject of the action.¹

Bills filed by or against underwriters, as they pray some relief, do not form an exception to the rule : but if to a bill of discovery in aid of a defence to an action brought on a policy of insurance by the agent alone his principal is made a defendant, the latter may demur, although he is exclusively interested in the subject of the action.

Bills of discovery are permitted for the purpose of obtaining from the adversary at law a discovery of matters, which, being admitted by him, may aid the defence to the action, but not for the purpose of obtaining evidence; accordingly a bill of discovery does not lie against a person who may be a witness for the defendant in the action.²

A loan raised in 1833, for Don Miguel, as King of Portugal, for the use of his government, consisted partly of bills of exchange, in two parts, drawn upon bankers in London, who accepted the first parts in the course of their business for a customer. The second parts, having been remitted to the treasury of Portugal, indorsed to the treasurer of the royal treasury there, on account of the loan, came, after the dethronement of Don Miguel, into the possession of Queen Donna Maria, and were by her orders indorsed by the treasurer to Soares in London, with instructions to recover the amount. An action having been brought by Soares on the bills, against the acceptors, they filed a bill of discovery, in aid of their defence, against him and the Queen of Portugal, charging that she was interested in the bills of exchange.

Held, by the Lords (reversing an order of the Court of Exchequer), that, as the Queen of Portugal was not a party to the record at law, she was not a proper party to the bill of discovery.³

February 21, 22, 27, 1837. July 2, 1840.

THIS was an appeal against an order of the Court of Exchequer, overruling the appellant's demurrer to a bill of discovery
 * 467 filed against her and Manoel Joaquim * Soares, by the respondents, in aid of their defence to an action brought against them by Soares to recover the proceeds of certain bills of exchange.

The bill, which was filed in 1835, stated, among other things, that the respondents carried on, in copartnership together, the business of bankers in London in the year 1833, and ever since: that from the year 1829, and throughout the first six months of 1833, Don Miguel was de facto King of Portugal, and exercised by himself and his agents all the functions of government in that country: that in the early part of 1833, Don Miguel and his government had occasion to raise a loan for the exigencies of the same government; and Messrs. Outrequin & Jauge, bankers in Paris, entered into an agreement with him and his government for raising such loan in Paris, and for remitting the same to the treasurer of the royal treasury in Portugal, appointed by and acting under the authority of Don Miguel and his government, to be applied by such treasurer for their use and service: that Outrequin and Jauge, between the 1st of March and the 30th of June, 1833, subscribed and advanced, and procured to be subscribed and advanced by various other parties in Paris and elsewhere, considerable sums of money by bills of exchange or otherwise, for the use or on account of Don Miguel and his government, upon the security of certain scrip or bonds issued by Don Miguel and his government; and that they remitted a great part of the amount so raised and subscribed to the said treasurer so appointed as aforesaid, in bills of exchange, among which were six bills accepted by these respondents: that from March to July, 1833, Don Pedro, Duke of Braganza, was engaged in an attempt, by means of foreign auxiliaries, to expel Don Miguel from
 * 468 the * throne of Portugal, and to establish in his stead Donna Maria da Gloria, the appellant; and that the object of the said loan was to furnish Don Miguel with the means of resisting such invasion, and of maintaining his government: that the bills so remitted on account of the said loan were remitted to Joaquim Fernandez Conto, and received by him as the treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal, appointed by Don Miguel: that Baron D'Est, of Paris, drew upon the respondents the six several bills before mentioned, for the sums of 650*l.*, 450*l.*, 550*l.*, 750*l.*, 450*l.*, and 550*l.* respectively, all dated in June, 1833, and payable ninety days after their respective dates, to the order of Outrequin & Jauge: that Baron D'Est, according to the custom of merchants, made each of the said bills in two parts, and by the second of such parts respectively required the respondents to pay the amount to Outrequin & Jauge, the first parts not being paid: that both parts of the said bills were delivered by Baron D'Est to Outrequin & Jauge, and the first parts were remitted by them to their agents in London, Messrs. Gower, Nephews, & Co., who received the same with directions to present them for acceptance, and to hold them when accepted for the holders or indorsees of the second parts: that the first parts of such bills were duly presented to and accepted by the respondents, who were not subscribers to the said loan, but accepted the said bills in the course of their business as bankers, on the account and by the directions of one Edward Richardson, who kept an account with them as bankers, and that they had not any interest in the said bills save as such acceptors on behalf of Richardson, and that in filing this bill of discovery these respondents acted merely as they were advised they were bound * to do as the agents and by the * 469 directions of Richardson, who, as the party beneficially interested, had the sole management of the action at law in aid of the defence, to which the discovery was sought, and of this suit.

The bill further stated that Outrequin & Jauge indorsed each of the second parts of the said bills as follows: "Pay to the order of the Treasurer-General of the Royal Treasury of Portugal, value in account of the negotiation of the royal loan of Portugal;" and the bills so indorsed were transmitted to the office of the royal treasury of Portugal; and the same were received by the said J. F. Conto, who exercised the functions of treasurer under the authority of Don Miguel and his government, and never was and never acted as the treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal, except under such authority, and had no power to dispose of or negotiate any of the said bills, except under the directions of Don Miguel or his government.

The bill next stated that Don Miguel, in consequence of the misfortunes which attended his armies and fleet, and the approach of a hostile army, abandoned Lisbon on the night of the 23d of July, 1833; and Donna Maria da Gloria was proclaimed Queen of Portugal, under the title of "Donna Maria the Second;" and that Don Pedro and his adherents, acting on her behalf, took possession of Lisbon, and assumed and exercised the functions of government; but that such government was entirely distinct from, and founded upon the destruction of, the government of Don Miguel: that Don Pedro and his adherents took possession, on behalf of the appellant, of the second parts of the said six bills of exchange, among many other similar bills which were in the royal treasury at Lisbon, and caused them to be indorsed

London, for the purpose of recovering the amount thereof; and such indorsements purported to be signed by J. F. Conto, and were dated the 7th of August, 1833, which was after Conto had ceased to be treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal, on behalf of Don Miguel: that such indorsements, if made by Conto, were made by him without authority, and in fraud and violation of the duties which devolved upon him as the agent of Don Miguel, entrusted with such securities: that the loan so raised, and the bonds or scrip issued by Don Miguel and his government, were not recognized by the appellant or her government; but, on the contrary, that they declared the same to be void and not binding on the kingdom of Portugal; and that neither the appellant nor any person on her behalf had given or agreed to give any valuable consideration for the said six bills of exchange: that the possession of the second parts of the said bills was obtained by the appellant or the persons acting on her behalf by fraud, accident, or violence, and that they did not, nor did any of them, thereby acquire any beneficial interest in or title to the said bills: that as soon as Outrequin & Jauge discovered that the said bills of exchange had fallen into the hands of the appellant and the persons acting on her behalf, they gave instructions to Gower, Nephews, & Co., not to deliver up the first parts of them, and to resist all claims to them on the part of the appellant or her government, or any person claiming title through them, and none of these bills were presented for payment when they respectively arrived at maturity.

The bill then stated that, besides the said bills of exchange, another bill, in two parts, dated the 2d of * June, 1833, and payable in ninety days after date, was drawn by Baron D'Est upon the respondents, the first part of which was remitted to Gower, Nephews, & Co., who procured the same to be accepted by the respondents; and the second part was, like the former bills, remitted to Lisbon, where it was indorsed by Conto to Soares, who by some means obtained possession of the first part, and presented the same for payment to the respondents: that to such application the respondents gave the following answer: "This bill, being by the indorsement of Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge made payable, not to an individual, but to a public officer, whose name does not appear; and circumstances having transpired which give the acceptors reason to doubt whether the person who has taken upon himself to indorse it is the person intended by Messrs. Outrequin & Jauge, the acceptors, though ready and willing to pay the amount, require, before doing so, satisfactory evidence of the right of Conto to indorse this bill as the treasurer-general of Portugal, mentioned in Messrs. Outrequin & Jauge's indorsement:" that thereupon Soares instituted proceedings in the Tribunal of Commerce at Paris against the Baron D'Est and Outrequin & Jauge, to recover the amount of the said bills, and that tribunal found that Soares was not a bond fide holder of the bills, and gave judgment against him accordingly. And the bill further stated that, nevertheless, on the 19th of June, 1835, the appellant and her agents caused an action to be commenced in the name of Soares against the respondents, in the Court of King's Bench, Westminster, to recover the amount of the said six bills of exchange: that Soares pretended that he was a holder of the said bills for valuable consideration, and meant to insist in his * said action on his right to recover * 472 in that character; whereas he was a mere agent of the appellant or her government, and had no property or interest in the said bills, or any of them; and as evidence thereof, the bill stated certain proceedings in a suit instituted in the Court of Chancery by Soares against the said Messrs. Gower, Nephews, & Co. The bill proceeded to make a number of charges in support of that allegation, and that the appellant had personal knowledge of many of the circumstances stated; and it prayed for a discovery of the several matters charged in the bill, in aid of the respondents' defence to the action, and for commissions to examine the respondents' witnesses at Lisbon, Paris, and elsewhere; and that in the mean time the appellant and Soares, and their agents, and the agents of each of them, might be restrained by injunction from continuing or commencing further proceedings at law against the respondents.

Soares put in an answer to the bill, admitting that he, personally, had no property in the said bills of exchange, and did not give any consideration for them, but that he had been directed by the appellant's government to receive the proceeds of them, and remit the same to the treasury at Lisbon; and concluding by submitting that the appellant was improperly joined as a defendant to the suit, inasmuch as she was not a party to the action.

The appellant not having appeared to the bill, the respondents obtained an order for making service of subpœna on Soares, and his attorney in the action, good service on her. (a) An appearance was then entered for her Majesty, and a demurrer on * 473 her * behalf was put in to the bill, on two grounds: 1st.

That she was improperly joined as a defendant to the bill as she was not a party to the action at law; 2d. That such of the matters as were well pleaded in the bill, if admitted to be true, would not constitute a valid defence to the action at law.

The demurrer was argued before Lord ABINGER, C.B., on the 15th of December, 1835, and was overruled by his Lordship's order, dated the 19th of January, 1836. (b)

The appeal was against that order.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Roupell, for the appellant. — According to the principles and practice of Courts of Equity, bills for discovery, in aid of, or in defence to, actions at law, cannot be maintained except by and against the parties to the record at law. That is the general rule, established by a long succession of decisions; from Fenton v. Hughes (c) to Irving v. Thompson. (d) In the case of Glyn v. Soares, (e) which was a bill of discovery filed in the Court of Chancery by the present respondents and Mr. Richardson against the appellant and Soares, the Master of the Rolls held that as Richardson was not a party to the action for the defence to which the discovery was sought, he was improperly joined as coplaintiff in the bill, and was not entitled to the discovery, although he was the party chiefly interested. This is the converse of that case; and there the Master of the Rolls said, (g) “The making the Queen of Portugal a defendant cannot possibly be correct in any view * 474 consistent with the object for which * the bill professes to be filed;” but his Honour did not think it necessary, in that stage of the case, to express any opinion on the question whether the Queen of Portugal could demur, the misjoinder of Richardson appearing to him to be sufficient to sustain the demurrer to that bill. The Lord Chief Baron, however, in the judgment, which is the subject of this appeal, holds that her Majesty cannot demur; and his Lordship, after referring to a great number of cases, seems to infer from them, that where an action is brought by agents, the principal may, and has a right to be made a party to a bill of discovery. His Lordship was properly very cautious in laying down a general rule, for which there certainly is neither principle nor authority. He states the main points of the case of Few v. Guppy, (a) in which the defendant to an action at law filed a bill of discovery against the plaintiff at law, who, in his answer, referred to certain documents. A motion made for the production of those documents was refused by the Vice-Chancellor, on the ground that the defendant, being a trustee of the documents for the benefit of persons who were not parties to the suit, ought not to be compelled to produce them in their absence. Lord Chancellor LYNDHURST, on appeal, ordered production; declaring, at the same time, that the cestui que trusts could not be made parties to the bill of discovery, as they were not parties to the action. It was somewhat surprising that Lord ABINGER did not pay more attention to that declaration of Lord LYNDHURST, or to the declarations of the Master of the Rolls to the same effect in Glyn v. Soares. It appears, from the general practice of Courts * of Equity, and from the dicta * 475 of eminent Judges, that in no case can a bill of discovery be maintained against a party whose name is not on the record of the action at law. The practice which has prevailed, in underwriting cases, of making the assured parties defendants to a bill, when the action is brought in the name of the broker, supposing such practice to have been originally well founded, depends upon the peculiarities of those particular actions, and is not to be relied upon as furnishing general rules. When or how that practice originated, it is impossible to ascertain; it is certainly opposed to general principles, and there is no case to be found in which the point was discussed.

It might have arisen from the desire of the Courts of Equity to prevent multiplicity of suits, as bills of discovery have for their object to restrain actions at law, which the broker and the assured might respectively maintain; and the latter could not be restrained unless made a defendant to the bill of discovery, although he might not be a party to the broker's action, his name only being, by the Act 19 Geo. 2, c. 27, required to be on the record. The exception from the general practice, however, is confined to underwriting cases, and ought not to be extended. Bills of discovery generally stand on peculiar grounds, and have this further distinction from bills for relief, that a person who may be a witness cannot be joined in a bill of discovery, though he may in a bill for relief. Fenton v. Hughes, (a) Dummer v.

The Corporation of Chippenham. (b) If the Queen of Portugal were in this country, the respondents might * 476 certainly put her into the witness-box as a witness in the action against them.

The cases of Balch v. Wastall, (c) Wych v. Meal, (d) Moodalay v. Morton, (e) and Angerstein v. Wentworth, (g) cited by Lord ABINGER in his judgment, do not support it; while all the other cases referred to are directly opposed to it. The case of The Bishop of London v. Fytche, (h) was supposed to be an exception to the general rule, but it has been found, on investigation of that case in the registrar's book, that the clerk was not a defendant to the bill. That case, therefore, as well as the observations of Lord ELDON in Fenton v. Hughes, of Lord LYNTHURST in Guppy v. Few, and of the late Lord Chancellor, when he was Master of the Rolls, in Glyn v. Soares, are all opposed to the Lord Chief Baron's decision in this case.

On the supposition that the demurrer will be sustained on the first ground, it is unnecessary to urge the second, as to the materiality of the discovery sought by the bill. It is not denied by the bill that the respondents received the value of the bills of exchange accepted by them, but they say the money so received was for the use of Don Miguel's government; and the bill contains numerous allegations on that head. But it is not material to the question here to inquire into the rights of Don Miguel or Donna Maria to the throne of Portugal; the maxim being, that the recognized government for the time being is the lawful government. In Glyn v. Soares, (i) the Master of the Rolls truly observes, "that all the statements in the bill about the con- * 477 test for the throne and * crown of Portugal must be, in any view of the case, wholly immaterial. The Courts of this country know nothing of the contests of foreign powers, as to who is or who is not to be sovereign of a foreign state. The Courts only know those who are from time to time recognized by this country as sovereigns. There has been no recognition in this country, nor is it so stated in this bill, of the individual Don Miguel as sovereign of Portugal (he was acknowledged as regent during the Queen's minority); and yet the whole equity attempted to be raised in the bill is as to whether Don Miguel is or is not to be considered the sovereign of Portugal. All the statements on the face of this bill are utterly immaterial with reference to the only matter at issue in the action. It is a case, therefore, in which we cannot but suspect that some irregular and collateral advantage was expected to be derived from making the Queen of Portugal a party to this record."

The next ground of demurrer is, that a foreign sovereign, who does not voluntarily submit to the jurisdiction of our Courts, cannot be brought before them by any yet known form of process. According to that principle, the Queen of Portugal, a sovereign power, not being a party suing in the action at law, has not submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, and cannot be made amenable to the process of that Court. The bill does not show that she has any legal title to a beneficial interest in the bills of exchange — the subject of the action — or in the proceeds of them. The bill alleges that she has an interest, but the facts stated do not support that allegation. Neither does it appear by the bill that Soares is her agent. The joinder of both as parties in this suit is forbidden by all * the principles of * 478 pleading. As far as the facts relative to the indorsement of the bills of exchange to Soares are well pleaded, they show that Soares is the legal indorsee of the true owner; and as such, as against the acceptors, is solely entitled to recover the value of them.

Mr. Knight and Mr. J. Russell, for the respondents. — It must be admitted on all sides that this is a most dishonest defence set up by her Most Faithful Majesty, who has not a shadow of right to the proceeds of these bills. They were never indorsed to her, and if they were indorsed to the other defendant, it was by compulsion and duress. Is it not then essential to the respondents' defence to the action brought on these bills, that there should be a complete discovery of the matters and documents stated in the bill, and of which it prays discovery? It is idle to say that the Queen of Portugal's answer to these inquiries would not be material to the defence of her agent's action. There are cases from a remote period, showing that where a party brings an action in his own name, but in reality for another person, the answer, the admissions, and declarations of the latter are evidence for the defendant to the action. Hanson v. Parker, (a) Bauerman v. Radenius, (b) The King v. The Inhabitants of Hardwick, (c) Bell v. Ansley, (d) The King v. The Inhabitants of Whitley Lower, (e) Smith v. Lyon, (g) and Dowden v. Fowle. (h) If, then, as appears from those cases, and others cited in Phillips's book on Evidence, (i) in illustration of the rule that * "admissions are evidence in favour of the other side, whether made by the real party on the record, or by the party who is really interested in the suit, though not named on the record," any answer of the appellant would be admissible for the respondents in their defence to the action, where is the rule or authority preventing them from filing a bill for the purpose of obtaining her answer? The right to institute a suit in our Courts against a foreign sovereign has never been questioned. King of Spain v. Hullett. (k) There is no more privilege for a foreign sovereign than for his subjects. Any foreigner may be made a party to a suit here, if he has an interest in the subject of it. It is another question whether process can be enforced against a person residing out of the jurisdiction. If Soares had honestly answered that he had no interest in the bills, there would be an end of this suit. Then the action should be brought, if brought at all, in the name of the appellant. But there is no rule or case against filing a bill of discovery in aid of a defence to any action against a person who is not a party to the action. Lord REDESDALE, in his Treatise on Equity Pleadings, enumerates (l) ten different ways in which the interference of Courts of Equity is to be exercised: "2. Where the Courts of ordinary jurisdiction are made instruments of injustice. 3. Where the principles of law by which the ordinary Courts are guided give no right, but, upon the principles of universal justice, the interference of the judicial power is necessary to prevent a wrong, and the positive law is silent; and it may be collected that Courts of Equity, without deciding on the rights of parties, administer *to the ends of justice by *480 assuming a jurisdiction ;” and further, “ 9. That Courts of Equity, without pronouncing any judgment which may affect the rights of parties, extend their jurisdiction to compel a discovery, or obtain evidence which may assist the decision of other Courts.” And again, in a subsequent part, (a) he repeats the ninth object of the Court’s interference thus: “ To administer to the ends of justice, without pronouncing any judgment which may affect any rights, the Courts of Equity in many cases compel a discovery which may enable other Courts to decide on the subject.” The present case is within the scope of this description of the objects of Courts of Equity, whose duty it would be, if no precedent existed for this bill, to make one, as Lord TALBOT did in the case of Wych v. Meal, (b) saying, “ This is a thing of consequence, which I do not remember to have been ever judicially determined ; but so far is plain, that the plaintiff is entitled to, and ought to have, a discovery of the matters charged in the bill.” But there are precedents ; in actions in policies of insurance, a bill of discovery may be filed against the person really interested, though not a party to the action ; and these cases are not exceptions to any rule, for it is the duty of Courts of Equity to interfere for the prevention of injustice in the Courts of law, according to the particular circumstances of each case. Lord ELDON’S reasoning in Fenton v. Hughes (c) shows that there was no general rule, for if there was, he would not fail to notice it, and so dispose of the case. The decision in that case is not questioned here ; it lays down no new rule, but holds to the established practice that Bate, being no more than a witness, *ought *481 not to be made a defendant to the bill. No such rule of pleading as is now alleged was mentioned in the cases of Cartwright v. Green, (d) and the Corporation of London v. Levy, (e) and they have no bearing on this case. Clearly neither Lord ELDON nor Lord REDESDALE was aware of this rule. The mention of such a rule is nowhere found, except in Mr. Hare’s statement of Lord LYNTHURST’S observations in Few v. Guppy ; and the expressions there ascribed to his Lordship, if they were used by him, were certainly not called for by the case before him. There are many cases besides those of underwriters, in which bills of discovery may be filed against the parties substantially interested, although they sue and are sued by some public officer; such as corporations, joint-stock companies, and commissioners of roads or other public works; and in a recent case, such a bill was sustained against a landlord, in a suit for tithes against his tenants. Day v. Drake. (a) A similar practice prevails in ejectment causes; and in bills against assignees, discovery may be prayed against the bankrupt. It was urged that the Queen of Portugal may be examined as a witness in the cause, and therefore the cases referred to forbid the making her a defendant to a bill of discovery. But it is not so clear that even if she were in this country she could be examined; being a party interested, she could not be compelled to give evidence against herself. Fenn v. Granger, (b) The King v. The Inhabitants of Woburn, (c) And to send a commission to examine witnesses in Portugal would be useless, as the appellant would not only refuse * 482 to be examined herself, * but would also prevent the execution of the commission altogether. The action is brought by her agent here; she has the whole interest in the subject; she has such important documents in her possession, and such knowledge of the matter, as that disclosures by her would make a complete defence to the action. She cannot be examined here or abroad against her interest; unless, therefore, effect is given to the prayer of discovery in this bill, there must be a complete failure of justice. The case of the respondents rests on these three points: 1st, That without a complete discovery of the matters as to which discovery and commissions to examine witnesses are prayed by their bill, and of the documents mentioned in the bill, the questions raised in the action against them cannot be fairly tried. 2dly, That they cannot have such complete discovery and such production of documents as they are entitled to, unless the appellant be made a defendant to their suit; and 3dly, That according to the principles and practice of our Courts of Equity, they are entitled to make her a defendant, and to have from her all the discovery which the bill prays.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. — There is no authority for the position laid down on behalf of the respondents, that a party who has an interest in the subject-matter of an action, may be made a defendant to a bill of discovery in aid of the defence to the action, if not a party to the record. The passages referred to in

LORD REDESDALE'S work do not sustain that position; neither do the cases of Cartwright v. Green and Day v. Drake. Except insurance cases, there is no instance of a bill of discovery in aid of a defence to an action, against a person who is not a party to the action. If the rule * was not strictly so, there * 483 would be innumerable instances of such bills. The decisions and observations of the Lord Chancellor, when Master of the Rolls, in Glyn v. Soares, put an end to the respondents' case on this appeal, both upon the practice of our Courts of Equity and upon the merits of the case. Messrs. Glyn, or their principal, Mr. Richardson, received the value of the bills of exchange, to which they have no more right than the Queen of Portugal. She is required to answer the various allegations in their bill as to transactions which occurred in her childhood, and of which she cannot have any knowledge. It was absurd to make her a party to the bill, if she was not made a party for the sole purpose of delay; she did not appeal from the order for making service of subpoena on Soares good service on her, because she had not appeared to the bill, and could not have appealed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — As this case raises questions of great importance as to the practice of Courts of Equity, your Lordships will agree with me to postpone it for consideration.

Lords WYNFORD and BROUGHAM concurred.

July 2, 1840.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, this case comes before us on a demurrer to a bill of discovery, filed by the respondents, who were the acceptors of certain bills of exchange. The holders of those bills having brought an action on them, a bill of discovery was filed, which undoubtedly the defendants to the action had a right to file against those who were pursuing them at law; but in addition to those who were pursuing * them at law, * 484 they made another person, the Queen of Portugal, a party defendant to their bill. How the Queen of Portugal became a party to the cause in the Court below, and what immediate process was served upon her, is not now under our consideration: she was, by virtue of certain orders, which have not been the subject of appeal, made a party by substituted service; and it became necessary, therefore, for those who had to protect the interests of that foreign potentate to take such proceedings as became necessary in consequence of the orders of the Court of Exchequer. The Queen of Portugal demurred to the bill of discovery, and that demurrer was argued before the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, and overruled. From the order overruling the demurrer, an appeal was brought to this House. Unfortunately a considerable length of time has elapsed since this appeal was argued; but I only refer to that, to guard against any supposition that the delay has arisen from any doubt being entertained, at least by me, of the proper judgment to be pronounced.

The plaintiffs in equity, the acceptors of the bill of exchange, state that they are merely acting as bankers; and there is no reason to suppose that they have any benefit in the subject-matter. But looking at the case as it affects the commercial interests of the country, one cannot fail to observe that, as they are acceptors of certain bills of exchange, of which the plaintiff at law is the holder; if that which has been done by the Court of Exchequer in overruling this demurrer, is to be considered the law of the land, one does not see how any holder of bills of exchange can ever hereafter compel the acceptor to pay: because if the

* 485 acceptor could make any foreign * potentate a party defendant to a bill of discovery, the plaintiff at law will not be at liberty to proceed until that foreign potentate puts in an answer to that bill. It is plain that in such a state of things the holder of the bills of exchange will encounter difficulties which it is not very advisable to permit.

The bill states that the party suing at law, the holder of the bills of exchange, is the mere agent for the Queen of Portugal; and upon a demurrer, that statement, of course, must be taken as an allegation founded on truth. The bill therefore raises the question which has been decided in the Court of Exchequer, and the proposition there laid down appears to me very fairly to state the point which your Lordships have now to decide. It was laid down by the Lord Chief Baron that, in his opinion, where a party interested is charged in a bill of discovery and called upon to disclose, he is bound to do so, and that a Court of Equity will compel him to do so, although he is not a party to the record at law: those are the terms in which the proposition is laid down. Now, I have the misfortune to differ from the proposition so laid down, and I think your Lordships will be of opinion, on reference to the authorities, that the rule of Courts of Equity is precisely the reverse. This decision in the Court of Exchequer, which we are now considering, has given rise to several cases in Chancery, which have made it my duty to consider the subject; and although it is one as to which, during an experience of more than thirty-five years in the Court of Chancery, I have not entertained any doubt, or ever heard any suggested, I have thought it my duty to examine all the cases upon the subject; and I propose, as shortly as possible, to submit to your Lordships the result of that examination.

* The question is, whether a bill of discovery can be sup- * 486 ported against persons interested in the subject of the action at law, but not parties to the record? Bills of discovery in aid of the defence to an action are permitted for the purpose of obtaining from the antagonist at law the discovery of matter, which, being admitted by him, may aid the defence; and not for the purpose of procuring evidence. It is now nearly forty years since Lord ELDON, in Fenton v. Hughes, (a) allowed the demurrer of the defendant Bate to a bill of discovery, which (according to the statement of the bill by the present Vice-Chancellor in Irving v. Thompson, (b)) alleged that he, Bate, was interested in the success of the action, and was to be entitled to all or some part of the money to be recovered thereby, and that he would be liable to pay all or some part of the costs, in case Hughes, the plaintiff in the action, should not recover. Lord ELDON observed that Bate could not be a witness for the plaintiff at law, on account of his interest, but that the defendant might examine him, and that the superior advantages of discovery by answer, particularly as to the production of papers, was not sufficient to make an exception to the rule that a bill of discovery will not lie against a mere witness.

In 1803, in the case of The Mayor of London v. Levy, (c) and in 1808, in Le Texier v. The Margravine of Anspach, (d), Lord ELDON laid down the rule in the same way. In 1813, Sir THOMAS PLUMER acted upon this rule in Powell v. Yeatts (as stated by the Vice-Chancellor in Irving v. Thompson), as he did in the same year in Whitworth v. Davis. (e) Lord LYNTHURST, in * Tooth v. The Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, (g) and in * 487 Few v. Guppy, (h) on appeals from the Vice-Chancellor, recognized and acted upon the case of Fenton v. Hughes. In 1835, in the case of Glyn v. Soares, (i) at the Rolls, I considered the rule as clearly settled ; and in 1839, the Vice-Chancellor, in Irving v. Thompson, reviewed all the cases and acted upon the rule ; and in the present year, in the case of Kerr v. Rew, (a) I thought myself bound by the pendency of this case to look into all the authorities, and I found no ground for doubting the rule as I had always understood it ; and therefore I allowed a demurrer by a party made a defendant to a bill of discovery by underwriters, upon an allegation that an action upon a policy brought in the name of another as agent was in fact brought for the benefit of the party demurring, and that he was exclusively interested in the subject-matter of the suit.

* It was, indeed, assumed in the Court below, that in cases of actions upon policies, it was the common practice to make the owners defendants to bills of discovery, although they are not parties to the record at law. What may have been the recent practice of the Exchequer I am not very conversant with ; but I am very confident that if there be any such practice in that Court, it is of very recent date, and certainly at variance with the practice of the Court of Chancery, as the cases of Irving v. Thompson, and Kerr v. Rew, prove. At the time when I was familiar with what was going on in the Court of Exchequer, it was not usual to file bills of discovery in such cases ; they all prayed relief. I have looked through many precedents, which, from the names attached to them, must cover a period not

* 488 * much short of a century, and I find but one which does not pray relief. The case of Vandam v. Munro, (b) as reported, would appear to have been a bill of discovery, and if so, it would be an instance of a bill of discovery filed against the assured, not parties to the action ; but considering what the general practice was, it was most probably a bill praying relief. Some cases, however, were referred to by the Lord Chief Baron as establishing a contrary doctrine, and some observations of Lord HARDWICKE, in Plummer v. May, (c) were relied upon : but it is obvious that the bill in that case prayed relief, Lord HARDWICKE saying that there were charges in it which, if proved, would entitle the plaintiff to a decree against the defendant for an account. The Bishop of London v. Fytche (d) was also relied upon as an instance in which a bill of discovery was filed against a defendant who was not a party to the action. I have had the registrar's book searched, and it appears under date of the 13th of June, 1780, at folio 506 of that book, that the report in Brown in that respect is erroneous, and that Eyre, the clerk, was not a party to the bill of discovery. Dummer v. The Corporation of Chippenham (a) has also been referred to, but Lord ELDON's observations (b) only showed that in his opinion the principle of permitting a plaintiff in a suit against a corporation to seek discovery from an officer of the corporation might be extended to individual members. Batch v. Wastall (c) appears to be a bill for relief and not for discovery only, and the object was to make assets in the hands of the defendant liable to the plaintiff's judgment. The cases of officers of corporations stand on principles * entirely peculiar to themselves, and * 489 have obviously no application to the present case.¹ Angerstein v. Wentworth (d) does not prove much, but as far as it goes, it is an authority in favour of the demurrer.

Thus all the cases which have been supposed to support the doctrine upon which the judgment of the Court below proceeded, when examined into, are proved to want those circumstances which, from the mistake of the reporters, have been supposed to make them authorities for that purpose. A proposition was suggested which is, I believe, quite new; namely, that a bill of discovery may be filed against any one whose admissions may be used for the defendant at law. This proposition I conceive to be wholly untenable; and what affords the most certain answer to it is, that in Fenton v. Hughes, (e) the declarations of Bate (assuming the facts to be as stated in the bill and admitted by the demurrer) would have been admissible in favour of the plaintiff in the bill of discovery. It is true that examining a person as a witness, who has important papers in his possession, is far less effectual than obtaining his answer to a bill of discovery; but this was fully considered by Lord ELDON in Fenton v. Hughes, and yet he held that this consideration, though well founded in fact, did not justify the filing of a bill against a person who might be examined as a witness. The demurring party might in this case be examined as a witness for the plaintiffs to the bill of discovery, the defendants at law; as may the assured, not a party to the record, for the underwriter, as stated by Lord ABINGER in his judgment on this case. The case of the lessor of the

* 490 plaintiff in ejectment * being compelled to answer a bill of discovery is no authority against the rule, for he is considered in all respects as a party to the record, which the assured is not, and accordingly may be examined as a witness ; and therefore, if your Lordships were to sanction the principle upon which the judgment of the Court below has proceeded, a very mischievous innovation would be made in the rules and practice of Courts of Equity as to compelling discovery ; and an inquisitorial power would be established, by which persons not parties to any litigation might be compelled, in a contest between others, to discover the secrets of their own affairs, upon an allegation, which could not perhaps be denied, that they had some interest in the subject-matter of a litigation between others ; and as, if the defendant at law be entitled to the discovery in aid of his defence, the action cannot be permitted to proceed till such discovery be obtained, an easy expedient would be afforded of defeating the enforcement of legal rights by action at law, by filing bills of discovery against persons not parties to the record and out of the jurisdiction, upon an allegation of their being interested in the subject-matter of the action. Of the possibility of such an abuse the present case furnishes a striking example. The rules of Courts of Equity, as they have hitherto existed, cannot lead to such an abuse ; and I trust that your Lordships will maintain those rules, and thereby prevent the recurrence of such injustice in future. I therefore move that the judgment of the Court below be reversed, and the demurrer allowed.

LORD LYNTHURST.—It is unnecessary for me to go through the cases which have been referred to ; it is sufficient for
 * 491 me to say that I entirely concur in the * opinion which has been now pronounced upon this case. I consider the decision in Fenton v. Hughes as a decision precisely in point upon the present occasion. It was suggested that Bate had no interest ; but the record has been searched, and the registrar's notes of the case have been examined, and it appears that he had a direct interest ; that it was so asserted upon the record that Bate was to share a part of the money that was to be recovered ; and was liable, or undertook, to pay the whole or part of the costs. The decision in that case has been acted upon from the time when it was decided to the present time. It was acted upon in two instances by Lord ELDON, who considered that case with great care and attention at the time. It has been confirmed by the case of

Powell v. Yeatts, about which the Master of the Rolls, Sir THOMAS PLUMER, at first doubted; but when the facts of Fenton v. Hughes were distinctly brought to his attention he confirmed the judgment in that case, and acted upon it in the decision he pronounced in Powell v. Yeatts. The same point came before the Court during the time I held the Great Seal; I considered the law as settled by the case of Fenton v. Hughes, and acted upon it in the cases referred to. (a) Since that time it has come before the Court in two or three instances during the time of the present Vice-Chancellor, who pronounced a most elaborate judgment in the case of Irving v. Thompson on this very point; the judgment being, I believe, the more elaborate in consequence of the decision from which this is an appeal. The decision which is now appealed from was founded on a misapprehension of the case of Fenton v. Hughes as to the facts of that case, and * there is undoubtedly something ambiguous and vague in * 492 the report, in consequence of which the Vice-Chancellor got the original brief containing the facts and containing the bill, in which the facts are such as my noble and learned friend has stated, and such as I have mentioned.

There was another case which has been relied upon, which was considered as an authority for the judgment in this case, — I mean the case of The Bishop of London v. Fytche; that was founded upon the apprehension that Eyre was one of the defendants on that record, whereas, upon examining the record, it appears that Fytche was the only defendant. It appears to me that that is not an authority to oppose to the authority of Fenton v. Hughes. I repeat what I before said, that any person looking to the judgment of Lord ELDON in that case will see that he considered the case with his usual attention, and that in pronouncing the judgment he must be considered as pronouncing no new law, but that which had been even at that time considered as the rule of Court, as it has been ever since. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment ought to be reversed.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Agreeing, as I do, with my noble and learned friends who have addressed your Lordships, I shall not trouble your Lordships further than by expressing my entire concurrence in the opinion expressed by them. I agree entirely as to the cause for postponing this judgment, which was principally for the purpose of having those cases looked into, upon which it was said that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer had been founded. The case of Fenton v. Hughes was a good deal commented upon at the bar in the course of the argument, as also the * case of The Bishop of London v. Fytche.

There is no doubt that the errors which have prevailed in the reports of those cases, and the great vagueness of the report of the case of Fenton v. Hughes, have given rise to this decision in the Court of Exchequer. The manifest error in the case of The Bishop of London v. Fytche, and I think another error, which appears in the report of some third case, gave rise to considerable discussion and to some doubt at the hearing; and, according to my recollection, it was principally with a view of having this mistake and difference with respect to the cases examined, that the postponement of this judgment has taken place. It appears now very satisfactorily, from the full inquiry into all those cases in the late case of Irving v. Thompson before the Vice-Chancellor, that those cases have been either mistaken or misrepresented, and that from those circumstances the error in this judgment of the Court of Exchequer has arisen.

LORD LYNTHURST.—I believe the third case to which my noble and learned friend alludes is not a single case, but I believe it is that class of decisions supposed to have existed in insurance cases. It would be desirable to ascertain whether those were bills of discovery or bills for relief. Upon examination it may turn out that the whole course of proceeding in those cases was not in the nature of bills for discovery, but bills for relief; and I apprehend, therefore, what is supposed to be the modern practice arises from misapprehension of the form of those bills.

LORD WYNFORD.—I rise to address your Lordships with considerable reluctance, because I am bound to state to your * 494 Lordships that I agree in opinion with the * noble and learned Judge who decided this case in the Court below, and I have the misfortune to differ from my noble and learned friends who have given their opinions upon this occasion. I never heard before of any of the cases referred to being misreported, except the case of The Bishop of London v. Fytche. It was certainly stated at the time of the hearing here of this case, that there was a mistake in that report, inasmuch as a person of the name of Eyre, who was supposed to have been a party in that suit, was not a party; but with respect to any mistake or misreport in the case of Fenton v. Hughes, I never heard of any.

[LORD BROUGHAM.—I did not say that it was misreported, but that there was an uncertainty with respect to the facts of that case, which has since been cleared up.]

I was not aware that there was any uncertainty even as to the facts; and as the facts are stated in the report, which we had to refer to at the time this case was under consideration, it appeared to me then, as it appears now, that it was a very strong authority against the opinion which my noble and learned friend has this day pronounced.

Your Lordships are not in possession of any of the circumstances of this case, or you would at once perceive that grosser injustice never was worked in any cause than will be worked in this, if your Lordships pronounce the judgment which it is recommended to you to pronounce. It is fit that your Lordships should be put in possession of some of these facts, and should know how some of these facts have been dealt with in another country. I have been in the habit of thinking that our laws were the wisest in the world; that they were better administered in this than in any other country. I shall be bound to confess, after the judgment which I am afraid will be pronounced *in this case to-day, that they man- * 495 age things better in France. While we have been sleeping over this cause they have in France got at the facts, and in France they have decided according to the justice of the cause. They have disposed of the Queen of Portugal and her agents in that country, as I hoped your Lordships would have been enabled in this country to dispose of her Majesty and of Mr. Soares, her agent in this country. My noble and learned friend on the woolsack has stated, that if your Lordships uphold the judgment of my noble and learned friend the Lord Chief Baron, commercial people, holders of bills of exchange, will be in a fearful situation, because it would only be necessary to make some prince in Europe or America,—fortunately for the purpose of this cause, though unfortunately for other purposes, there is but one prince in America who can be made a party to any such cause,—that, by making any foreign prince a party to the cause, the action may be tied up, and no holder of a bill of exchange can ever recover upon it. There is a very short answer to that argument: How can that be done, when it is stated, as it is in this cause, that the Queen of Portugal is the sole party to the cause, and has the sole interest, and that Mr. Soares, the person whose name appears upon the record, is her agent; a fact which is admitted? Can it be said that, if you decide that such a person is bound to make a disclosure, you would be opening a door for the filing of bills, calling upon any sovereign of Europe or of America to answer to the bill? That allegation, I conceive, cannot be supported. I confess I am a little surprised that my noble and learned friend, who has so general and accurate a knowledge in matters of equity, should have had recourse to such an argument as that which he

* 496 has * used. I found my observations in this cause upon this simple allegation, that the Queen of Portugal, who refuses to answer, is the sole person who can know any thing of the facts; that the Queen of Portugal, who refuses to answer, is the sole person who has any interest in the cause; for my noble and learned friend has admitted that what is charged in this bill, if not denied, must be taken to be true. It is charged in the bill, and it is not denied, that Mr. Soares had admitted that he has no interest whatever in this cause; that the only party upon the record, who has the whole interest in this cause, is the Queen of Portugal, who refuses to make any disclosure; and by refusing to make any disclosure will obtain a sum of money from the merchants of this country, to which she has not the slightest pretence of right. A fouler fraud,—if I may use such a word as applicable to parties in the situation in which these are,—a fouler fraud was never committed upon the merchants of this country than will be committed if this judgment shall pass, as I am very much afraid it will pass.

What are the facts of the case? Some time about the year 1829 the government of Portugal was de facto in the hands of Don Miguel. He negotiated a loan with two persons in France of the names of Outrequin and Jauge, and bonds were given to those two persons, which bonds were to be delivered in the form of scrip to the different persons who contributed to that loan. The loan was to be raised by bills drawn upon persons in England and in France; bills exactly under the same circumstances with those in the present case. The decision in the Court of France, which has disposed of the Queen of Portugal, is a direct decision upon this very point now under consideration.

on merchants in England and France. The bills upon England were indorsed by a person of the name of Conto, then a member of the Court of Portugal; they were transmitted to this country, and were presented for acceptance to the present respondents. Those bills were to be given to the person who was the indorsee of the second set of bills. At this time Don Miguel was de facto the governor of Portugal; by him this loan was raised: he was in the mean time dismissed from the throne of Portugal, turned out as an usurper, and Donna Maria was placed in his stead. The first act of Donna Maria was to repudiate the loan of Don Miguel. Perhaps she was right in that: she said that Don Miguel was an usurper, and therefore the bonds he had given and the loan he had raised were not binding upon the kingdom of Portugal, and would not be paid. So far she was right: but if it was right to say that the bonds were invalid, it was also right to remit the bills to those who had given them for the purpose of raising that loan. But although the loan was declared void, it was not thought proper by the council of Portugal to remit the bills. The council of Portugal, after Don Miguel had left that country, sent for Mr. Conto, — who had been actually dismissed from his situation, to which he had been appointed by Don Miguel, and who never held any situation of that kind under Donna Maria, — and he was compelled against his inclination, for he had some scruples of honesty about him, to indorse these bills to Mr. Soares, in order that Soares might recover the money for those bills in this country, and remit it to Donna Maria, who had repudiated the loan, and who had therefore no more pretension of right to touch those bills than any of your Lordships. Immediately upon this, Don Miguel gave notice to * the acceptors of the bills not * 498 to pay them to Soares, and not to accept them on account of Soares. Outrequin & Jauge gave also the same notice not to pay the bills, because they said Soares was endeavoring to recover a sum of money for the Queen of Portugal which she had no right to, having repudiated the loan, and having declared that the bonds were void.

Now, under these circumstances, can any one allow, on any pretence, the Queen of Portugal, who is the real party in this cause, to recover in the action upon bills of exchange, the consideration of which she herself by her own act has repudiated? I state, and it cannot be denied, that it would be an act of gross injustice; and I should be very sorry if, in consequence of any supposed technical rules of Courts of Equity, your Lordships were to be made parties to such injustice. This is a case of so much importance, not only with respect to the parties, but with respect to the administration of justice in general, that I, for one, with all my respect for the Court of Chancery, would rather that it should be abolished, than that this cause should be decided in the manner in which it is proposed to be. If we cannot do better here than they do in France, if we cannot get at the facts and decide upon the justice of the case, but are tied up by these absurd forms, for which no reason has been attempted to be given by my noble and learned friends, it would be better that we should have no Court of Chancery at all than one so fettered.

[His Lordship, in answers to interlocutory observations from Lord LYNDHURST, observed: My noble and learned friend says, "They did not examine the Queen of Portugal in the proceedings in France, to which I referred." We do not propose to examine the Queen of Portugal here. I know we cannot
 * 499 examine her * here, but we can gain some information as to who the persons are who may be examined here. We may do that which is asked for by this bill; we may have a commission sent, not only to Portugal but to France, to examine the only persons who can know any thing of the facts connected with the cause. My noble and learned friend again says, "We do not decide that a commission may not issue." I know that; but who can issue that commission, unless the Queen of Portugal will, through some minister of hers, kindly inform us who are the persons to whom the commission is to be sent, and from whom the information is to be obtained? We are kept entirely in the dark upon this subject; and by keeping us so, the Queen of Portugal will get into her pocket money to which she has no more right than she has for taking the money of your Lordships.]

But it is said there is a distinct rule in the Court of Chancery which prevents this being done. I am bound to suppose that there is such a rule, as my noble and learned friends have so stated it. And I am also bound to suppose that all the reporters must be mistaken: but if the reporters are not mistaken, there is no such rule in the Court of Chancery. If there is such a rule in any Court of Equity in this country, I beg to say that in a vast number of cases it is absolutely impossible that justice can be got at. Suppose a bill of exchange obtained in the most fraudulent manner, under circumstances of disgusting fraud, the man who gets hold of that bill will never bring an action on it himself; he will hand it over to some person; put an indorsement on it, get half a dozen indorsements put upon it, if in consequence of that he cannot be called upon to answer and disclose all the circumstances. I am aware that if you have all * those indorsees, you may examine them as witnesses in * 500 the cause; but you cannot get at the man by whom the bill has been first passed, and whose name did not appear upon the back of the bill.

It is of very little use to get hold of any facts in Court, unless you have a knowledge of those facts beforehand, in order to use them advantageously at the time of the trial. My noble and learned friend has admitted that a bill of discovery is much better in many cases than the examination of a witness. In the examination of a witness the answers may come upon you by surprise, but by means of a bill of discovery you have the whole examination in your possession, and have an opportunity of thinking of it before it is used in Court; and you not only know how the information is to be used when it is obtained, but you find out the means by which other matters can be examined in a Court of Justice, which it is impossible you could know any thing about or be aware of, if the parties were not to be called upon to give evidence upon them before they come to a Court of Justice.

I will take the liberty of stating that it does not appear to me that Lord REDESDALE, one of the most eminent men who ever practised in a Court of Equity, was ever aware of any such rule as that which is now suggested. It is stated in his Treatise on Pleading, that a bill of discovery must state the matter touching which a discovery is sought, the interest of the plaintiff and defendant in the subject, and the right of the first to require the discovery from the other. Further, in the same book Lord REDESDALE states that bills have been filed to impeach deeds on the ground of fraud. Now here, not only no such rule as this, which is relied upon in this case for the * purpose of de- * 501 feating the merchants of England, and putting their money into the pocket of the Queen of Portugal, is advanced, but the direct contrary is stated by Lord REDESDALE; for what he states is equivalent to that. He says, "Where bills have been filed to impeach deeds on the ground of fraud, attorneys who have prepared the deed, and other persons, have been made defendants for the purpose of obtaining a full discovery." (a) Those were bills of mere discovery, and in such bills attorneys, who cannot be parties to the cause, and other persons, certainly not meaning other parties to the cause, may be made witnesses for the purpose of getting at a full disclosure of the fraud, or any thing of that nature. If you are to be tied down to an examination merely of persons whose names are upon the record, I am sure, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, frauds will escape, as fraud of the grossest kind will unquestionably escape in the case now under discussion. Lord REDESDALE says, in another passage of his Treatise, "As the object of the Court in compelling a discovery is either to enable itself or some other Court to decide on matters in dispute between the parties, the discovery sought must be material either to the relief prayed by the bill, or to some other suit actually instituted, or capable of being instituted." (b) Now I should think your Lordships will admit that this light never broke in upon Lord REDESDALE, or he would not have written that part of his Treatise respecting bills of discovery, if such a rule had occurred to him. His book is the best I can find, and is the admitted text-book on this subject.

Your Lordships will find that in the case of *Wych v. * 502 Meal*, (c) Lord TALBOT ordered the secretary of the * East India Company to put in an answer, because the Company would not answer on oath; and he said, though the answer might not be read against the company, yet it might be of use to direct the plaintiff how to draw his interrogatories. There is not a word said by Lord TALBOT in that case applicable to this distinction; and we do not look into cases merely to find exactly the same facts, or to find parties exactly under the same circumstances; but we look into cases to discover general principles. I say this case establishes the principle laid down by Lord REDESDALE, that the Court will grant a discovery where it is necessary for the purposes of justice, the parties seeking it having an interest in obtaining it from the party for whom it is sought. My noble and learned friends have mentioned this case of the secretary of the East India Company, but have not, upon principle, attempted to distinguish it from the present case. The secretary to the East India Company was no party to the record, but he was examined in the cause, because the parties to the cause could not be compelled to make a disclosure upon oath.

If the Queen of Portugal cannot be made a party, and cannot be obliged to make a discovery, or to state who her officers are, or give us any means by which we can find out the circumstances under which she obtained these bills, or afford us any opportunity whatever of investigating the transaction; if she can get this money into her hands, allowing the record of the Court of Equity in this country to charge her without denial on her part, that will occasion one of the grossest frauds that was ever committed in any country.

I do not recollect whether any objection was made to the accuracy of the report of Plummer v. May. A bill was filed in that case by an heir-at-law against * witnesses. * 503 The demurrer put in by one of them was overruled on the ground that the demurrer admitted every thing that was well pleaded; and there was an express allegation in the bill that the defendant pretended to some right or interest under the will. The Queen of Portugal stands in a very different situation from the witnesses: she not only has an interest in the subject of this suit, but she has the whole and entire interest, and all which is now doing is doing for her. If my noble and learned friends can prevail upon your Lordships to overturn this judgment, the Queen of Portugal will obtain this money, which otherwise she will never get.

With respect to the case of Fenton v. Hughes, it is said that the judgment in that case is now discovered not to have been given on the grounds stated in the report of it by Vesey; but of that I know nothing. It appears that an action qui tam, brought in the name of the defendant, Hughes, at the instance of Bate, was the foundation of a bill with prayer of discovery, and against both defendants, and that the plaintiff might have the benefit of such discovery at the trial of the action. That does not look like a bill brought for relief, but for the purpose of obtaining facts to be used in defence to an action at law, commenced in the name of the defendant, Hughes, only, and not Hughes and Bate. Bate demurred to the bill, on the ground that the plaintiff had not shown any right to call upon him in equity for discovery, and that he might be examined as a witness. The demurrer was allowed; on what ground? On the ground that Bate was a mere witness, having no interest. It was decided upon that ground according to the report, and I suppose that to be an accurate report. It must be a very inaccurate one if that is not the case; there is in * that report no notice taken of * 504 his not being a party in the cause. If this rule now alleged be the rule of Courts of Equity, would not Lord ELDON, who, we know, had a short way of disposing of causes without going through all the points, have said at once, "You cannot go on here; Bate is no party to the cause; there is an end of it." But Lord ELDON goes into the whole case, and decides it upon the ground that the party who called upon Bate had no interest

The case to which I am now about to allude is the decision of the noble and learned Judge, whose judgment is under review in this very case. I think that every word of it is entitled to attention, not only from the great authority of that noble and learned Judge, as regards matters of law, but also because, though he has not had so much experience in Courts of Equity as my noble and learned friends now present have had, yet he has heard more of what passes in causes in general than almost any man in the country, and certainly was one of the most distinguished advocates ever at the bar. Although he has not attended so much to the Courts of Equity, he has been called upon in the Courts of Common Law to attend to pleadings and answers in Courts of Equity. Lord ABINGER, giving judgment in this case, says, "The question is, whether a party suing is agent for another." That is the very point which has not been yet touched upon here. In this case Soares is the agent for the Queen of Portugal: qui facit per alium, facit per se: what the Queen of Portugal does by her agent, she does by herself, though her name is not upon the record. The name of Soares is upon the record in no other way than as agent for the Queen of Portugal. It would appear ridiculous to say, you shall not put the Queen of Portugal

 * 505 to answer, because her name * does not appear upon the record; though it is admitted that the person whose name did appear had no interest in the concern, and that her Majesty was solely interested. Lord ABINGER, after observing that Soares, proceeding in his own name, but really on behalf of the Queen of Portugal, ought to be restrained in his action, until the party for whom he acts puts in her answer to the bill of discovery, goes on to say, "Why not apply that principle to an act on brought on a bill of exchange, or other security?" I also say, why not? Is it possible, on principle, to distinguish these cases? It is known that most of the persons required to answer bills are not parties to the records in the actions; but they are the persons who can give the best information, and therefore they are required to give that information. That is the rule of common sense, and I trust it will not be prevented from operating by the technical rules of the Court of Chancery, even if I were obliged to confess, which I do not, that the authorities were all decidedly against me.

There is another case which I ought to mention, decided by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, — the case of Glyn v. Soares. (a) I find this passage in the judgment: "The acceptors have an undoubted right to have that fact ascertained; namely, whether the party holding the bills is or is not the person who derived title under the individual or the officer to whose order the bills were made payable; because upon the affirmative of that fact depends their authority to pay the bills which they have accepted, &c.; but beyond that they have no interest in the subject-matter. It cannot be material to them how Messrs.

* Outrequin & Jauge had the money in their hands; why * 506 it was they wished to remit it to Portugal, &c. This is not a bill for the purpose of administering equities between the parties; it is not a bill in which the question, who is entitled to the money? can be discussed; it is merely a bill to aid the defence of an action at law, and it cannot correctly or properly raise any question which is not material for that purpose." I entirely concur in these observations; you cannot go into any question which is not material for the purpose for which the bill is filed; that is, to get at evidence which is shown to be material for the purpose of defeating an action unjustly brought against the person who filed the bill.

On these grounds, I feel it to be my duty to support the judgment which my noble and learned friend, the Chief Baron, has pronounced in this case; and after having heard the opinions which my noble and learned friends have stated to your Lordships, I take them to proceed upon a mere technical ground, for which there is no pretence in my humble judgment; and if that which they have expressed is declared to be the law, if I continue my attendance in Parliament, I shall bring in a bill to try whether I can prevail on the House to get rid of a law which must be pregnant with so much mischief, and which will tend to inflict so much injury upon the country. I have felt this a very painful duty; I have stated the judgment which, in my opinion, you ought to give; and feeling decided in my opinion, I could not reconcile it to my conscience not to come here and to state to

Sir FELIX BOOTH, Bart., and the other Directors of the LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, and GEORGE POLLARD, the Manager of the Bank	} Appellants.
The GOVERNOR and COMPANY of the BANK of ENGLAND
	} Respondents.

Bank of England — its exclusive Privileges. Acts of Parliament — Construction.

A partnership consisting of more than six persons, carrying on the business of bankers in or within sixty-five miles of London, cannot, without violating the Acts of Parliament respecting the Bank of England, accept, in the course of such business, a bill of exchange payable at less than six months from the time of acceptance.

Whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly, cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance.

A London Joint-stock Bank, consisting of more than six partners, entered into an agreement with a bank in Canada, that G. P., manager of the London Joint-stock Bank, but not a partner therein, should accept bills drawn on him by the Canada bank, payable at less than six months from the acceptance thereof; and that the London Joint-stock Bank should provide funds for the due payment of such bills; the money transactions arising thereupon being, in the accounts between the two banks, to be treated as transactions between the said banks. Held, by the Lords (affirming the judgment of the Master of the Rolls) :—

1. That the acceptance of such bills, in execution of such agreement, was unlawful, regard being had to the Acts in force respecting the Bank of England.
2. That such acceptances would not be lawful, even if the London Joint-stock Bank, at the time of the acceptances, had in hand funds on account of the bank in Canada equal to the amount of the bills so accepted.
3. That the acceptances of such bills would not be lawful if the London Joint-stock Bank had not, at the time of the acceptances, any funds in hand belonging to the bank in Canada, but the bills were accepted on the credit of a contract by that bank to remit funds to meet such acceptances before the bills became payable.
4. That the Bank of England might maintain an action against the London Joint-stock Bank, founded on such transactions.

Practice.

It is improper to print in the Appeal Cases, or Appendix, the interrogatories in a bill or other unnecessary matter.

If the second counsel for an appellant cannot attend in his turn, the House will hear him afterwards in reply to the respondent's counsel, but will confine him strictly to the reply.

July 7, 9, 20

THE appellant, George Pollard, is the manager of, but not a partner in, the London Joint-stock Bank, * which is * 510 a copartnership, consisting of more than six persons, carrying on the business of bankers in the city of London. The other appellants are partners in and directors of that company. In July, 1836, they issued a prospectus, explanatory of the objects of the company, stating, among other things, that their capital would be 3,000,000*l.*, in 60,000 shares of 50*l.* each; that the company would transact all the various branches of business legitimately belonging to banking concerns and to general agency in the money market, under the superintendence of a chairman, deputy-chairman, and board of directors; that the directors would cause a deed of settlement to be prepared in conformity with the Acts of Parliament relating to joint-stock banks, &c. A second prospectus, issued in October of the same year, stated that the bank would open in their temporary offices on Monday, the 21st of November then next, and the directors invited the attention of the public to the mode in which the business would be conducted, viz.: "Accounts of parties, properly introduced, will be received agreeably to the present custom of London bankers, with this advantage, that interest will be allowed on current accounts and on deposits. Sums of money will be received on deposits, at such rate of interest and for such periods as may be agreed upon, reference being had to the state of the money market. The agency of joint-stock and other country and foreign banks will be undertaken upon such terms as may be agreed upon," &c. Other prospectuses were issued afterwards in the same year and in 1837, further enlarging on the objects of the institution, and on the advantages to be derived from it.

The company commenced business in November, 1836, and shortly after advertised that they were ready to act as the London agents of foreign banks. Application * was con- * 511 sequently made to them by a bank, carrying on business at Kingston, in Upper Canada, called the Commercial Bank, to know the terms upon which they would undertake their agency in London. The application was by letter, dated the 14th of March, 1837, addressed by Mr. Harper, the cashier of the Commercial Bank, to the appellant, George Pollard. The following is an extract: "In consequence of having seen, in a London newspaper, an advertisement by your bank, dated the 21st November last, stating its wish to become the agent for foreign banks, I am directed by the board of this institution to address you on that subject. Messrs. T. Wilson & Co. have been our agents since February, 1833; from which time to the 31st December last, we have remitted to them, in drafts and specie, 382,373*l.* sterling, the commission paid them, 1,911*l.* 17*s.*, and interest on account current, 765*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*” “ Their commission is half per cent on the debtor side of the account, charging and allowing 4*l.* per cent interest. They engage to accept drafts of the president to the extent of 40,000*l.* sterling beyond the effects which may be in their hands; it being understood that such drafts shall in all cases be covered by remittances within 60 days from the period of their issue, the usual time for drafts on London being 60 days’ sight. I beg further to add, that it is probable this bank may wish the credit extended from 40,000*l.* to 60,000*l.* sterling, on which to draw in case of need, when our new capital is paid in.”

On the 26th of April, 1837, the London Joint-stock Bank wrote to the respondents the following letter: —

“ Gentlemen, — Having received from a transatlantic
* 512 chartered bank the offer of their agency, which * would involve the necessity of this bank accepting their drafts payable at a shorter date than six months, the directors of this bank are desirous of knowing whether the directors of the Bank of England would interpose any difficulty in the way of this bank accepting such drafts.

“ I have the honour, &c., GEORGE TAYLER, Chairman.”

The secretary of the Bank of England wrote to the London Joint-stock Bank the following letter in reply: —

“ Bank of England, 27th April, 1837.

“ Sir, — I am desired to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th inst. addressed to the Governor and Court of Directors of the Bank of England, in which you ask whether the directors of the Bank of England would interpose any difficulty in the way of the London Joint-stock Bank accepting drafts payable at a shorter date than six months: and in reply I have to state that such acceptances would be an infraction of the privileges of the Bank of England, and, as respects the public, would be illegal and void, and consequently could not be permitted by this corporation.

On the 6th of May, 1837, the board of directors of the London Joint-stock Bank resolved as follows: "That a communication be made to the Kingston bank, stating the directors' readiness to accept their account on the following conditions: that their drafts to the extent of 40,000*l.* on the manager of this bank be accepted by him in his individual capacity; or * that, * 513 instead of drawing, they issue promissory notes payable at this bank: that half per cent commission be charged: that interest be charged at the rate of 5*l.* per cent per annum when this bank is under cash advance, and allowed at the rate of 4*l.* per cent when the balance is in their favour."

In pursuance of that resolution, Mr. Pollard wrote to the cashier of the Canada bank, a letter dated the 6th of May, 1837, from which the following are extracts: —

"London Joint-stock Bank, 6th May, 1837.

"I have to acknowledge the receipt of your favour under date of the 14th March, which has been laid before our board of directors, who have desired me to reply thereto. You are, perhaps, aware that by the charter of the Bank of England, no joint-stock bank can accept bills of exchange in London, or within sixty-five miles of it, at a less date than six months: at least such is the construction put upon the charter by the Court of Common Pleas and the Master of the Rolls. It suggested itself to our directors that some difficulty might arise in the way of accepting your agency from this circumstance; and they therefore applied to the Bank of England to know whether, under the circumstances in which the monetary concerns of the two countries were placed, they would avail themselves of the privilege they claim to prevent this bank accepting transatlantic bills at a short date. The directors of that institution have thought proper to give a negative answer to our proposal, and we much feared that the plan which had been adopted by us with great success, as far as English country banks were concerned, could not be extended to * America. Our plan is this: * 514 instead of their drawing bills requiring an acceptance, they issue promissory notes payable at the London Joint-stock Bank. Another mode of getting over the difficulty has been suggested; which is, that parties whose agency this bank might take, should draw upon me in the following form: 'To George Pollard, Esq., manager of the London Joint-stock Bank, London;' and that the due payment of my acceptances should be guaranteed by this bank.

“ Having now explained to you fully our position, it remains only for me to state that this bank, relying upon the statements contained in your letter, will be happy to undertake your agency upon the following terms: that this bank shall pay your promissory notes, drawn at three months’ date, to the extent of 40,000*l.*, upon the understanding that you remit us funds in cash or bills within sixty days from the period of this issue; or if you prefer it, I will accept your bills to a similar amount, at sixty days’ sight, with a like understanding. I mention 40,000*l.*, that being the advance you at present require; but should your transactions increase, we shall be happy to meet you with liberality on this point. The commission you name is considerably under the charge for transatlantic business; but as it is what you have been in the habit of paying, we of course cannot ask you to increase it.

“ With regard, however, to the interest charged and allowed you by your present agents, we do not feel that it is a correct principle to charge and allow the same rate. The mode we should propose to adopt (and it is the general rule in banking transactions), is to make a difference of 1*l.* per cent in the rate, according to the value of money. For the present,
 * 515 * while money is so scarce, we should propose to charge you 5*l.* per cent upon the amount we may be in advance to you, and to allow you 4*l.* Should money decrease in value, we should charge 4*l.* and allow 3*l.* per cent, or charge 3*l.* and allow 2*l.*, according to the current rate of the market; and I consider that on an average you would be considerable gainers by the change. The slight difference between the terms proposed by you, and those to which our directors are willing to accede, leaves me no doubt that a connection will be formed between us, which I trust will long continue to our mutual advantage.”

In reply to this letter, the cashier of the Canada bank addressed to Mr. Pollard a letter, dated 21st June, 1837, from which the following are extracts:—

“ M. D., Kingston, 21st June, 1837.

“ Sir, — Your favour of the 6th ultimo has come to hand, the contents of which having been submitted to the board, I am directed to inform you that the explanations relative to the principles on which your institution conducts its business has met the approbation of the board of this bank, and has had its influence in deciding them to close with your offer on the terms expressed in your letter, viz., that of making a difference of 1l. per cent on the charge of interest, debiting this bank at the rate current in your city for the half years ending 30th June and 31st of December, on your advances, and crediting us at 1l. per cent less on balances in our favour in your hands; your charge of commission being one-half per centum. The board are perfectly satisfied with the credit of 40,000l. at present; and it will only be when the commerce of the country takes a more favourable * turn, and that our capital is increased, that we will * 516 take advantage of your offer to augment it.

“The board have also taken into consideration both the modes you propose for valuing on you so as not to come within the power of the Act in favour of the Bank of England, and prefer that of drawing on you as manager at sixty days’ sight, being the dates at which bills are commonly negotiated, and which the public would prefer. Such being their decision, please send me a guarantee of your bank to protect the drafts of the president of this institution.

“I remain, &c., J. A. HARPER, Cashier.”

This letter was submitted to a board of directors of the London Joint-stock Bank, held on the 26th of July, 1837, when the following resolution was come to:—

“A letter, dated 21st June, from the Kingston Commercial Bank, U. C., having been received, it was resolved, that in conformity with the request of the Kingston Commercial Bank of the Midland District, Upper Canada, a letter be written to the president and directors of said bank, enclosing two of the printed forms of agreement, signed by the trustees of this bank, with the following additional words: ‘And that the said London Joint-stock Bank will provide on your behalf the necessary funds to pay at maturity all such bills as may be drawn by the said bank upon, and accepted by, Mr. George Pollard, manager of the said London Joint-stock Bank, such bills being accepted by him in his individual capacity:’ with a request that the president and directors will return one of such agreements signed by them.”

In pursuance of that resolution, the secretary of the London Joint-stock Bank wrote to the Canada bank * a * 517 was thereupon drawn up as for non-acceptance, but the bank subsequently received the amount of the bill minus the discount. Mr. Pollard wrote to the cashier of the Canada bank a letter, dated the 6th of October, 1837, which, after referring to what had taken place, stated as follows: "I beg to suggest that it may altogether be obviated by your hereafter omitting the word

'manager,' addressing your drafts to 'George Pollard, * 520 Esq., at the * London Joint-stock Bank, London.'" This having been agreed to by the Commercial Bank, the word "manager," in the bills subsequently drawn, was dispensed with. The form of the acceptance of the bills was also altered by introducing the word "payable" before the word "at;" so that the subsequent acceptances stood thus: "Accepted, payable at the London Joint-stock Bank. — GEORGE POLLARD."

On the 26th of October, 1837, the solicitors to the Bank of England wrote to the directors of the London Joint-stock Bank a letter, of which the following is a copy: —

"Gentlemen, — The attention of the governors and directors of the Bank of England has been drawn to bills of exchange which have recently appeared drawn by a bank in Upper Canada, for which it appears you act as London agents, upon your manager, and accepted at your office. The bank are advised that the acceptance of such bills, having less than six months to run, is a violation of their exclusive privilege: and we request to know whether it is intended to persist in the practice, as in that case we are instructed to take immediate proceedings to obtain an injunction from a Court of Equity.

"We are, &c., FRESHFIELD & SON."

In reply, the said solicitors received from the directors of the London Joint-stock Bank the following letter, dated the 2d of November, 1837, signed by their secretary: —

"London Joint-stock Bank, 2d Nov. 1837.

"Gentlemen, — Your letter of the 26th ult., addressed to the directors of this bank, was laid before the board yesterday; * 521 and, in reply thereto, I am instructed to * state that the directors deny that any practice has been adopted by the London Joint-stock Bank which is a violation of the exclusive privilege of the Bank of England; the London Joint-stock Bank never having accepted, nor directed nor authorized their manager, or any other person, to accept any bills of exchange having less than six months to run. I am, &c.,

“To Messrs. Freshfield & Son.

MICHAEL BOYLE.”

In November, 1837, the respondents filed their bill in Chancery against the appellants, stating the Act of 5 & 6 Will. & M., c. 20, establishing the Bank of England; and the Acts of 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 30; 6 Anne, c. 22; 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 28; 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98; all granting and securing to it certain exclusive privileges; (a) and that by the last mentioned Act, it was, among other things, enacted, that during the continuance of the said privileges no other body corporate, society, or company, or persons united or to be united in partnership, exceeding six persons, should issue, in or within sixty-five miles of London, any bill of exchange or promissory note, &c., for payment of money on demand, &c.; but still, that any body politic or corporate, or society, or company, or partnership, although consisting of more than six persons, might carry on the trade or business of banking in or within sixty-five miles of London; provided such body, &c., did not borrow, owe, or take up, in England, any sum or sums of money on their bills or notes, payable on demand, or at any less time than six months from the borrowing thereof, &c.

The bill then stated the establishment of the London Joint-stock Bank by deed of partnership, in 1836, * and * 522 set forth extracts from the various prospectuses issued by the directors, and their correspondence with the Commercial Bank of Kingston in Canada, and with the respondents, to the effect before stated; and after charging that the said agreement and transactions between the appellants and the Commercial Bank of Canada were violations of the rights and privileges of the respondents, the bill prayed for an account of all bills of exchange and promissory notes accepted or caused to be accepted by the appellants on behalf of their partnership, payable at less than six months from acceptance thereof, and particularly of all such bills and notes drawn upon the appellants' company and accepted by the appellant, George Pollard, in the form in which the said bill, dated the 25th of July, 1837, was accepted, and payable at less time than six months from acceptance thereof; and also an account of the gains and profits made by such acceptances, &c. ; and that it might be decreed that the accepting, or causing to be accepted by George Pollard the said bill of exchange, in the manner aforesaid, was a fraud upon the respondents ; and that the appellants might be restrained from accepting or causing to be accepted, for or on behalf of the London Joint-stock Bank, any bill of exchange or promissory note payable at less than six months from the acceptance thereof ; and from accepting or causing to be accepted by George Pollard, or any agent of theirs, in the form in which the said bill of the 25th of July, 1837, was accepted, any bills of exchange or promissory notes drawn upon the said company, payable at less time than six months from acceptance thereof ; and that all the appellants might be restrained from in any manner borrowing, owing, or taking up in England, for or on behalf of the said Joint-

(a) The material parts of these Acts are set forth in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, 2 Keen, 328 and 367, so frequently referred to in the arguments and judgment in this case.

 * 523 stock Company, any sums of money on bills or * notes of the company payable on demand, or at less time than six months from the borrowing thereof.

The appellant, George Pollard, put in his answer to the bill in February, 1838 ; and the appellants, the directors, put in their joint answer in the month of March following. Both answers submitted that the acceptance by Pollard of the bills of the Commercial Bank of Canada was not a violation of the exclusive privileges secured to the respondents by the said Acts of Parliament.

As soon as these answers were put in, the respondents moved, before the Master of the Rolls, for an injunction against the appellants, upon notice, in the terms of the prayer of the bill.

Lord LANGDALE, M. R., by an order, dated the 16th of June, 1838, granted the injunction “ to restrain the partnership called the London Joint-stock Bank, and every partner therein, and the appellant, George Pollard, and every clerk of the said partnership, from accepting or causing to be accepted, in the name of the said partnership or of George Pollard, &c., in the course of their banking transactions, any bill of exchange payable on demand, or at any time less than six months from the acceptance thereof.”

That was the order now appealed from. The appeal was argued in the presence of the Judges. (a)

between the parties as to the facts of the case. The deed of partnership, and the prospectuses which were put forth by the appellants before and after they opened their bank, indicated a bank of * deposit and not of issue. The only by- * 524 laws made under the powers contained in the deed were two resolutions, by the first of which, passed in November, 1836, the directors, to whom the deed of settlement gave the entire and exclusive management and superintendence, appointed the appellant, George Pollard, "manager of the bank, exclusively to indorse all such bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other negotiable securities, and to draw such checks in the name or on account of the company, or the trustees thereof, as may be necessary in the usual course of business." By the second by-law, made in April, 1837, it was resolved, "that no bill or note be issued for a less amount than 100l.; that the amount of bills or notes, with the above reservation, be divided into such sums as will meet the wishes of depositors, to cover the amount of their deposit and interest, the depositors paying for the stamps; that all bills be accepted by the manager, signed by the depositors as drawn, entered by the clerk, &c.; that all notes be signed by the manager, and entered by a clerk, &c.; that after such signatures and entry, all bills and notes for issue shall be laid before the chairman, who shall examine if the signatures are proper," &c. In conformity with this resolution, forms of deposit, notes and bills, and deposit receipts, were printed. Neither the deed of settlement nor any resolution or by-law conferred any other power on the directors, or any other officer of the company, to sign, or authorized any person to sign any bills or notes, or other negotiable securities; and no deposit note or bill has been filled up for a less sum than 100l., or made payable at a shorter period than six months from the issuing thereof. The deposit receipts are not negotiable, or capable of transfer or assignment by indorsement or delivery.

* The correspondence set forth in the printed cases * 525 shows that the transactions, of which the respondents complain, had their inception in the desire of the bank in Canada to avail themselves of the agency, in this country, of the London Joint-stock Bank. The proposition was made by the Canada bank, and was entertained by the appellants without any desire to interfere with the exclusive privileges of the Bank of England. Two modes of agency were open to the foreign bank,—either to issue their promissory notes payable at the appellants' bank in London,—a mode generally adopted,—or to issue their bills drawn on their London agent. This latter course was preferred, and the question is, whether the transactions so carried on are a violation of the privileges secured by Acts of Parliament to the Bank of England; and a more important question to the commercial interests of this country has never been brought before the House.

By the contract between the foreign and London banks, the London bank engages that its funds shall be liable for all balances of accounts due to the foreign bank, and that it shall provide the necessary funds to pay all bills that may be drawn by the foreign bank “upon and accepted by George Pollard, manager of the said London Joint-stock Bank.” There is no illegality on the face of that contract; it is not an infringement of any privilege of the Bank of England. The bills of exchange accepted by Pollard, in pursuance of that contract, were his own acceptances, and not the bills or acceptances of the London Joint-stock Bank. The particular bill set forth in the pleadings, having come to the hands of the respondents, was presented by them to Pollard for his acceptance; and, not satisfied with * 526 the form in * which he accepted it, they sent it back to him to alter his acceptance,—with a view, no doubt, of having some ground of complaint against the London bank: and because Pollard refused to make the required alteration, though he offered to discount the bill, they got it protested for non-acceptance, preferring to have a bad bill rather than the money. They afterwards demanded and received the amount of the bill, minus the discount; and then remitted the protest to their correspondents in Canada, for the purpose of damaging the credit of the London Joint-stock Bank. The whole proceeding was most discreditable to the respondents, and showed the motives by which they were actuated against the appellants.

By that proceeding, the respondents deprived themselves of all right to the protection of a Court of Equity, in respect of that bill and acceptance. A Court of Equity will not relieve a party who has not only acquiesced in, but instigated, the act of which he complains. The respondents, instead of refusing to take the bill, as they might, bring it to the London bank, and try to get that act accomplished, for preventing which they afterwards apply for an injunction.

acting themselves as agents for their correspondents in Canada? If you rely on acquiescence, you must make out a case of acquiescence, showing knowledge.]

It is not open to the respondents, after obtaining the individual acceptance of Pollard, to complain that it was not his acceptance, but the acceptance of the London Joint-stock Bank. The respondents have now no ground of complaint, because, even before the respondents filed their bill in Chancery, the Canada bank ceased to address bills of exchange *to * 527 Pollard, and he ceased to accept such bills in the form of which the respondents complain.

The argument in the Court below, on the part of the respondents, was, that although the acceptances were by Pollard in his own name, the London Joint-stock Bank, consisting of more than six persons in partnership in London, borrowed, owed, and took up money on the bills so accepted, and payable at less time than six months from the acceptance; and they relied upon a clause first introduced into the miscellaneous Act of the 6th of Anne, c. 22, and copied with some addition into subsequent Acts, and lastly into the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98, by which, after reciting that doubts had arisen as to the construction of the said Acts, and as to the extent of such exclusive privilege, and that it was expedient that all such doubts should be removed, it was declared and enacted, "that any body politic or corporate, or society, or company, or partnership, although consisting of more than six persons, might carry on the trade or business of banking in London, or within sixty-five miles thereof; provided that such body politic, &c., did not borrow, owe, or take up, in England, any sum or sums of money on their bills or notes, payable on demand, or at less time than six months from the borrowing thereof, during the continuance of the privilege granted by that Act to the governor and company of the Bank of England," &c. All the clauses in that and in the preceding Acts, securing privileges to the Bank of England, are set out in the respondents' bill, which is printed at length in the appellants' appendix, even the interrogatories.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — It was extremely improper to print the interrogatories, overloading the appendix with unnecessary matter.]

* They were printed because some comment was made * 528

in the Court below on the alleged insufficiency of the answers to them.

The general scope of those Acts, down to the 7th of Will. 4, c. 46, was to secure to the Bank of England a monopoly of the paper currency of the country. The mischief which they purported to prevent was the danger of a great number of persons without property uniting together in partnership and obtaining from individuals large sums of money, with which they might deal as bankers. "The great grievance," as Lord Chief Justice TINDAL said, (a) in delivering the judgment of the Court in The Bank of England v. Anderson, "to which the statute of Anne intended to apply a remedy, was that of other corporations and large numbers of persons united in partnership, contrary to the intent of the statute of Will. 3, 'presuming to deal as a bank,' that is, as a bank of circulation and issue; for merely dealing as a bank of deposit could scarcely 'affect the credit of the Bank of England,' the security of which is the object mentioned in the title of the Act," &c. It was, however, found that much greater mischief arose from the monopoly of the Bank of England; and accordingly the privileges granted to that bank by the former Acts were, by the Act of 7 Will. 4, c. 46, confined to London, and to a circle of sixty-five miles round London. Upon the renewal of the Bank of England charter, in 1833, all the Acts respecting it were consolidated and explained by the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98, under the provisions of which the London Joint-stock Bank was established; and the whole question now between that bank and the Bank of England turns on the construction to be put on * 529 the * several sections of that Act, particularly on the proviso before cited. The construction put on the words of that proviso "borrow, owe, and take up," in the Courts below, both in this case and in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, (b) was that the word "owe" was put in apposition to the word "borrow," the meaning of the word "borrow" to be taken from the word "owe." This House, instead of adopting that construction, will, it is hoped and submitted, reverse it, and hold that the meaning is, that there must be an "owing," in the nature of a "borrowing and taking up sums of money." If one accepts a bill, he "owes," becomes liable to pay; but he does not thereby "borrow and take up" money. The mischief guarded against by the Act of 6 Anne, c. 22, into which the clause was first introduced, was the taking up money by large companies, as appeared from the recitals therein. A construction is not to be put on the words that must force them out of their natural meaning. When the respondents issue a 5*l.* note, they borrow, owe, and take up the amount on the face of the note. If a person having to send money to France or Ireland applies for a bank post-bill, the bank gives the bill and receives the amount; which is a "borrowing, owing, and taking up" so much as it so receives for its post-bill. The London Joint-stock Bank never borrowed, owed, or took up any money in England, on the bills of exchange sent by the Canada bank. They were not their bills.

(a) 2 Keen, 373; 3 Bing. N. C. 655.

(b) 2 Keen, 328; 3 Bing. N. C. 589.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Do you rely on the distinctions between this case and the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson? I put the question to you because the fifth reason annexed to your case is, "Because, even if the acceptance of the said bill of the * 25th of July, 1837, and the like accept- * 530 ances of the like bills, were and are the acceptances of the London Joint-stock Bank, such acceptances are not in violation of the privilege of the respondents."]

The decision in The Bank of England v. Anderson may be assumed to be correct; but it does not govern this case, which is materially and in many circumstances distinguished from that case. The bill in that case was an inland bill drawn by a customer and partner, having himself a bank of issue within sixty-five miles of London; it was accepted by the London and Westminster Bank's manager, by procuration of the trustees, making that bank liable on the face of the bill; and those trustees, who were the London bankers and agents of the drawer, by so accepting the bill, borrowed a sum of money in London; the accepting a bill of exchange constituting in all cases a "borrowing and taking up" money. The appellants do not contend to the contrary of that view of the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, but they submit that the distinctions between that case and their own case must lead to different conclusions of law. The bill in this case was a foreign bill, not likely to come in formidable competition with the paper currency of the Bank of England. It was addressed to an individual, and accepted by him, that individual being undoubtedly the manager of the appellants' bank, but not a shareholder. The appellants also were bound to pay that bill, but they were so bound as agents for the foreign bank by contract, and not liable as acceptors of the bill to every holder of it. The holder of the bill could not sue the London Joint-stock Bank for the amount.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — Is it a fact in this case that at the time of the acceptance of the bills there were in the London bank assets of the Canada bank?]

* 531 * There is nothing express on the subject in the bill or answers, but the inference from the arrangement between the two banks is that there were not assets. If a person is not drawer or acceptor of a bill, it is no bill of his; he may be liable on contract or on guarantee to pay, but he is not liable on the bill. Pollard, the acceptor, was liable on this bill. Thomas v. Bishop, (a) Leadbitter v. Farrow. (b) Lord ELLENBOROUGH, in the latter case, said, "Is it not the universal rule that a man who puts his name to a bill of exchange thereby makes himself personally liable, unless he states on the face of the bill that he subscribes it for another, or by procuration of another, which are words of exclusion?" In Emly v. Lye, (c) where one of two partners drew bills of exchange in his own name, and procured them to be discounted, he alone, and not the partnership, was liable to be sued on the bills, although the proceeds went to the partnership account: for "the bills," as Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, "considering the transaction as a discount between the parties, are his only." The cases of Jackson v. Hudson (d) and Bramah v. Roberts (e) are to the same effect; so that even if Pollard was a partner of this bank, having no authority to accept bills on behalf of the partnership, he alone would have been liable to the holder of this bill.

The appellants do not desire to have this question put on a mere technical point; but contend on broad principles that the intent of the Acts of Parliament, on which the respondents rely, being to prevent large partnerships from issuing a paper currency in competition with the Bank of England, was not violated

* 532 * nor fraudulently evaded by the transaction between the appellants and the Canada bank. They admit that they desired to avoid and escape and keep clear of the prohibitions of those Acts, so as not to come within their scope; and they submit that they are entitled to resort to any lawful contrivance to keep themselves out of them. To evade what is forbidden is lawful, if the evasion is not itself an infringement of the law; and no Court of Law or Equity can prevent it. The nature of the arrangement shows that the appellants took great pains not to do any thing that was prohibited by the letter or spirit of the law.

In the judgment pronounced by the Master of the Rolls, his Lordship omitted some very important considerations in the case, and misapprehended some of the facts. He says, "Pollard is a mere agent, without any personal interest," &c.; and comes to the conclusion that the directors of the London Joint-stock Bank "owe money on the bills," and that the bills may be properly called "their bills;" (a) that "they owe or become liable to pay the sum due on the bills;" that "the existence of this obligation or liability must be recognized;" that "they are answerable to the drawers:" but still his Lordship says, "I do not, however, think it necessary to give any opinion upon the question whether the London Joint-stock Bank can be sued directly upon such bills as these or not." This being the main question, it is surprising that his Lordship declines to give any opinion on it.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The injunction was granted on the ground that Pollard accepted the bills on behalf of and as the agent of the partnership.]

It is not contended that Pollard did not suppose he * was acting on behalf of the partnership in accepting the * 533 bills; he was willing to make himself liable on the bills, knowing that the partnership would provide the payment. The question is, does his acceptance of the bills, on that understanding, make these bills the bills of the partnership, of which, be it recollected, he was not a member?

[Mr. Kindersley, after concluding his argument, said: It is extremely desirable that the appellants should have the benefit of Sir William Follett's assistance: he is with me, (b) but is at present engaged in an important case elsewhere. The House will, perhaps, hear him after the counsel for the respondents.

(a) 2 Keen, 494, 495.

(b) And Mr. Willcock also.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—He may have the reply. (a) We have done that in several cases.]

Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Pemberton (with whom was Mr. G. Richards), for the respondents. — It may be assumed that the case of the The Bank of England v. Anderson, in which the Court of Common Pleas pronounced a solemn judgment, after hearing elaborate arguments, and which the Master of the Rolls decided after much deliberation, is to be held as settled law; the appeal which was presented to this House against it having been withdrawn. It is next to be considered that the reasons given for the judgment in that case, in both the Courts, comprehended the whole of the material circumstances of the present case: and that the acceptances of the bills in question, in this case, were the acts of the London Joint-stock Bank, by their agent, Pollard. If so, they are in violation of the express terms of the Acts of Parliament, particularly the last Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98, conferring exclusive privileges on the Bank of England; for which

* 534 privileges that body, from time to time, has paid * very valuable considerations. If the acceptances are not a violation of the letter of these Acts, they are a fraudulent evasion of them.

With respect to the allegation of acquiescence, the answer is, that the Bank of England received the particular bill in question directly from abroad in the usual course of business; sent it for acceptance, as all bankers or agents would; and their notary conceiving that the acceptance was not according to the tenor of the bill, took it back for a more formal acceptance, which being refused, he protested the bill. That protest was not sent to Canada, as alleged by the appellants.

It may be conceded that the drawee of a bill of exchange, and another whose name is not on it, cannot be coacceptors; but the other, though not an acceptor, may be a guarantee. The acceptance in this case was by the servant of the London bank; but suppose it was by John Styles, and the London bank merely guaranteed the payment of the bill when it came to maturity, would not a Judge leave it to the jury, in an action on the bill, to say whether the acceptance by the servant of the London bank, or by John Styles (though either may be himself liable on the bill), is not, in effect, the acceptance of the London bank?

(a) Vide post, p. 536. .

Trueman v. Loder. (a) The question would be, "Do you believe it was intended to bind the company by the name?" Pollard, in his answer, denies that this bill was accepted by him as the manager of the London Joint-stock Bank, or on their behalf, or on their credit, or for their benefit, but on behalf of himself, and for the benefit and on the credit of the Canada bank. But, from the course of dealing, it is clear that Pollard represents the joint-stock bank: he, by the deed of partnership, as the manager, has the exclusive power of signing, drawing, indorsing, and accepting all * bills of exchange, &c., in the name or on * 535 the account of the company; and no bill accepted by any other person is binding on the company. It is impossible to believe that the bill or bills in question were accepted by Pollard in his individual capacity. He has no separate funds to pay them; he carries on no business on his own account; he has no offices or clerks of his own; he is nothing but the clerk of the London Joint-stock Bank, at whose office the bills are left for acceptance, are accepted and paid. The funds to pay the bills are supplied by that bank, the books required for entries of these bills are kept by the clerks of that bank and belong to that bank, and not to Pollard; and all entries of advice of such bills being drawn, of their falling due, and of their being paid, are made by the clerk of the establishment. Pollard was not the person liable for payment to the drawers of the bills; the object of putting his name to them was to disguise the real nature of the transaction, and thereby to violate, if not the letter, at least the intent and spirit of the statutes.

[With respect to the construction of the words "borrow, owe, and take up," and of the other passages referred to in the statutes, the arguments were the same as those used, and the authorities also the same as those referred to, in the Courts below, in the two cases before referred to, The Bank of England v. Anderson, and The Same v. Booth; so fully reported by Mr. Keen and Mr. Bingham. One test of the liability of the London Joint-stock Bank, not introduced in the former argument, is now added; namely, could the Canada bank recall any funds of theirs in the hands of the London bank, while any one of these bills so accepted by Pollard was outstanding? Would not the London bank reply to such an application, "We are * liable on our * 536 agent's acceptance, and we 'owe' money on it; you cannot call on us to pay you back your money in our hands while that bill remains unpaid.” Wilson v. Barthrop (a) shows that Pollard would not have been liable on this bill. In all respects it was the bank’s bill.]

Sir William Follett, in reply. — This order cannot be sustained without changing the law; for legal principles, long established, are called in question by the arguments in support of the order; both the counsel for the respondents maintaining that the London Joint-stock Bank is liable on these bills, while the Master of the Rolls expressly declines to give any opinion on that question. For the purposes of the argument in this case, it has been and it must be assumed that the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson is the settled law, as far as it goes, on this subject. But it does not affect this appeal. The Judges of the Court of Common Pleas in that case confined their opinion to the particular question submitted to them, and declined to give any opinion upon other points raised in the argument. The order of the Master of the Rolls in this case would have the effect of preventing foreign trade altogether; for it holds, that the acceptance of a foreign bill of exchange by more than six persons, in or within sixty-five miles of London, would be a violation of the Bank Acts; consequently the acceptance of such bill by a joint-stock trading company would be a violation of them, — a result fatal to foreign trade. That was not the law of England before this decision was pronounced. Murray v. The East India Company, (b) Harvey v. Kay, (c) Dickinson v. Valpy, (d) Bramah v. Roberts. (e)

* 537 * The legal question to be submitted to the Judges in this case is, was there a “borrowing, owing, and taking up” money on those bills in England within six months from the time of acceptance, within the terms of the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98?

[On that question he urged the same arguments and authorities that were used by Mr. Kindersley. See also the same arguments for the defendants, in The Bank of England v. Anderson, 2 Keen, p. 407 et seq.; and for the appellants in the present case, in The Bank of England v. Booth, 2 Keen, p. 478 et seq. With respect to the right of a party to evade the prohibitions of a statute,

Thompson v. Brown, 3 Myl. & K. 32, was cited as a case in point, being a contrivance to evade the legacy duty, which was recognized as perfectly legal.]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, if any doubt was entertained with respect to the correctness of the decision in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, (a) this House would not proceed to adjudicate upon this case assuming that case to be the law, but would call upon the learned counsel to argue the case upon that ground, in order that your Lordships might come to a conclusion whether that was an accurate decision or not, having the advantage of the assistance of the learned Judges. But after examining that case, I certainly cannot bring myself to entertain any doubt with respect to the accuracy of the law there laid down; and I cannot conceive that the appellants have lost any thing by its being assumed, for the purpose of the argument, that that case was properly decided. Then if we are to take that case to be the law, the question * is how far the cir- * 538 cumstances of this case create any distinction, so as to make the rule of law which was applied to the circumstances in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson applicable to this case. And in proposing questions for the Judges, your Lordships' object will be to put them in such form as will draw from the learned Judges an opinion how far the difference of the circumstances in the two cases would affect the decision in point of law.

There are three circumstances relied upon as distinguishing this case from the case to which I have referred: the first is, that the bill of exchange that was accepted in that case was an inland bill of exchange; and in the present case it is a foreign bill of exchange. The next circumstance, and the most important one, no doubt, is the mode in which the acceptance of the bill in this case was made, not being made by the company, nor in the name of the company, but by George Pollard, under the circumstances that appear upon the face of these proceedings; and the third circumstance is, that in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, it was a fact stated, that at the time the company accepted the bill, they had funds in their hands equal to the amount for which the bill was accepted; whereas in this case the contract is not confined to the circumstance of the company in London having funds in hand, but it is part of the contract that they should accept bills, looking to the company in Canada remitting the money, though not in hand at the time, but in time to meet the acceptance when due.

With regard to the first point, I do not perceive how there can be any distinction between the two cases, arising from the circumstance of the bill being a foreign bill in the one case,
 * 539 and an inland bill in the * other. The object of the Acts of Parliament is to protect the Bank of England; and what the respondents had to guard against, and which they have endeavoured to guard against, is the credit attached to a paper circulation, within certain limits, arising from the credit of more than six persons being associated together within those limits: and, therefore, the circumstance that a transaction within the prescribed limits had its origin beyond the limits of this country, does not appear to me to affect the case. — [His Lordship then proposed, for the opinions of the Judges, four questions, which are stated in the answers given.]

The Judges desiring time to consider the questions, the further consideration of the case was postponed.

July 20.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—My Lords, the facts stated by your Lordships as the ground work of the questions proposed to her Majesty's Judges, are these: "The London Joint-stock Bank, under circumstances which would have made it illegal in them as a company, and a violation of the rights and privileges of the Bank of England, to have accepted and issued the bills herein after mentioned, if drawn upon them, enter into an agreement with a bank in Canada to procure bills drawn by such bank upon George Pollard, the manager of the London Joint-stock Bank, to be accepted by the said George Pollard, and to provide funds for the due payment of such bills, the money transactions arising therefrom being, in the accounts between the two banks, to be treated in all respects as transactions between the said two banks:" and the first question proposed by your Lordships on this state of facts is, "whether the acceptance of such bills
 * 540 by the said George Pollard, in execution of this * agreement is lawful, regard being had to the acts in force respecting the Bank of England?"

In answer to that question, I beg to state to your Lordships, that it is the unanimous opinion of those Judges who heard this case discussed at the bar of your Lordships' House, that, — assuming, according to the terms of that question, that the acceptance of such bills by the London Joint-stock Bank, if drawn directly on that company, would have been illegal and a violation of the rights and privileges of the Bank of England, — it appears to us to be a necessary consequence that the procurement by the London bank, that bills drawn upon George Pollard, their manager, shall be accepted by the said George Pollard, under the agreement above stated for the providing of funds for the due payment of such bills, must equally be a violation of the rights and privileges of the Bank of England ; upon the principle that whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly, cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance.

The exclusive privileges conferred on the Bank of England by Parliament are founded on a contract between that body and the public. For the original grant, and also for the renewal and confirmation of such privileges, the Bank of England has from time to time paid very large sums of money to the public ; and no member of that public can justify either doing, or procuring to be done, any act which, for the protection of such rights and privileges, has been forbidden by law. Now it is impossible not to see that the substantial parties to the transaction stated by your Lordships are the Canada bank and the London Joint-stock Bank ; and that the manager of the London bank, who lends his name, is a mere nominal * acceptor, whose name * 541 is used to cover the transaction. It is the London bank, not the manager, who is to pay the bill, and the Canada bank engages to remit funds for that purpose before the bill becomes due. By means of this transaction the London bank takes upon itself the duty of an acceptor ; that is, to pay the bill, not in default of the nominal acceptor, but in the first instance, in consideration of an arrangement that funds shall be remitted by the Canada bank (the drawers) for that purpose to them, the London bank.

The plain object and intent of the various statutes which have been passed for the protection of the Bank of England are, that the funds of a joint-stock banking company shall not be pledged for the payment of a bill issued within a limited distance from London, and having less than six months to run. Such a pledge given by the acceptance of a bill by such a company has already been decided, by the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, to be a violation of the rights and privileges of the Bank of England. But if the bill be accepted by a servant or nominee of the banking company, and they contract with the drawer that they, the company, will pay it, their funds are bound for the payment; the bill is circulated upon their credit, not upon that of their servant or nominee; for it is impossible to suppose for a moment that bills accepted in such form and under such circumstances can be circulated in London upon the individual credit of the nominal acceptor, or upon any other credit than that of the banking company, by whose procurement and direction, and for whose benefit, the acceptance is really given. The consequence of such a transaction is, that a competition is necessarily created * 542 between a paper currency circulating * upon the credit of the banking company, and the paper issued by the Bank of England, which is the very mischief intended to be prevented; for it is obvious that if the transaction is legal with respect to a bill at less than six months, it is equally so with respect to a bill at six days, or even at a shorter period.

It is contended, on the part of the London Joint-stock Bank, that they are authorized to take any course with impunity, which does not fall directly within the precise terms and letter of the prohibitory clauses, contained in the several Acts which secure the privileges of the Bank of England. It is to be recollected, however, that the clauses protecting those privileges are not merely prohibitory laws. The privilege granted to the Bank of England by Parliament is a positive right conferred upon that body for a valuable consideration, which the law will no more permit to be infringed by third persons without a responsibility, than it will a monopoly granted by letters-patent under the statute of James I. If, therefore, the acceptance of a bill by the London bank will be an infringement of such privilege, it cannot be less an infringement, if attended with the same injurious consequences to the Bank of England, to procure another person to accept the bill for the benefit of the London bank; though such acceptance be made in the name of their appointed nominee, whom they are bound to indemnify.

The second question proposed by your Lordships upon the above statement of facts, is this: "Whether the acceptance of such bills would be lawful, assuming that the London Joint-stock Bank at the time of such acceptances had funds in their hands, on account of the bank in Canada, equal to the amount * 543 of the bills * so accepted?" And if the answer given to the first question be correct, the acceptance by a person procured for that purpose by the London Joint-stock Bank must be considered in the same light as if the acceptance had been made by the banking company in its own name; and if that be so, the answer to the second question will be found in the opinion given by the Court of Common Pleas to the Master of the Rolls, upon a case stated to that Court, and confirmed by that noble and learned Judge in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson. (a) The opinion of the Court of Common Pleas upon this point was thus expressed: "The relation of debtor and creditor, created by the acceptance of the bill, appears to be considered by the legislature as equivalent to the actual borrowing of the money owed on the one hand and credited on the other." And the Master of the Rolls, when reviewing the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, says, (b) "From the time of borrowing, means, from the time of owing the money on the bills or notes referred to; or, in the case now under consideration, from the time of the acceptance."

The case of The Bank of England v. Anderson was very fully argued, and was much considered, both in the Court of Law and in the Court of Equity. From the latter Court an appeal might have been made to your Lordships' House: such an appeal, indeed, is said to have been at first made, but afterwards abandoned, and the decision of the Courts of Law and Equity was thereby acquiesced in. The authority of that case was not disputed in the argument at your Lordships' bar upon the present occasion; and we see no reason to doubt the propriety of the opinions therein expressed.

* The third question proposed in this: "Would the * 544 acceptance of such bills be lawful, assuming that the London Joint-stock Bank had not at the time of such acceptances any funds in hand belonging to the bank in Canada, but that such bills were accepted on the credit of a contract by such bank to remit sufficient funds to the London Joint-stock Bank to meet such acceptances before the time at which the bills would become payable?" And notwithstanding the difference in the state of facts adverted to in this question, it appears to us that the answer we must give to it is the same as that which we have already given to the second question. If a bill be accepted upon the undertaking of the drawer to supply funds for the payment of it, a mutual contract, of lending on the one hand, and borrowing on the other, is thereby created; and although the drawer may not fulfil his engagement by actually remitting the amount agreed upon before the acceptance, or even before the day on which the bill becomes due, the transaction is not the less a transaction of lending and borrowing to the amount of the money represented by the bill; which transaction takes effect as "a borrowing upon the bill" as soon as the bill is accepted. If, therefore, the bill be drawn under such an engagement as above mentioned, at less than six months from the date, it must necessarily be considered as a bill payable at less than six months from the borrowing of the money.

(a) 8 Bing. N. C. 589.

(b) 2 Keen, 865.

It is manifest that the introduction into the Acts of the word "borrowing," instead of "date," to express the time of the currency of the bill, was only resorted to for the purpose of preventing the issue of bills appearing to be drawn at longer periods than six months from the date, but in fact issued at periods * 545 when the bill would fall due within a shorter time * than six months from the issuing of them; and it is to be observed that bills or notes payable on demand are prohibited absolutely, without reference to any transaction of borrowing, upon which they have been issued. The word "borrowing" is only employed with respect to bills and notes payable at a future time in order to designate the period from which the six months are to be reckoned. A borrowing is assumed to exist as soon as the banking company begins to owe the money specified in the bill or note; that is, as soon as the acceptance or the note is put in circulation; and the expression "borrowing" is not used as descriptive of the consideration upon which the debt contracted by the bill or note is founded, but to denote the time from which the six months are to begin to run.

The last question proposed to us is this: "Could the Bank of England maintain any action against the London Joint-stock Bank, founded upon such transactions, under either of the states of circumstances above supposed?" (a) And in answer to this

(a) The Lord Chancellor, in proposing this fourth question, added: "Another question also which might be raised, and upon which we should have the opinion of the learned Judges, is, 'whether what has taken place is such a violation of the Acts of Parliament as would subject the parties to a prosecution, by way of indictment?' To meet those points, I propose to submit to the learned Judges a fourth question, in these words: 'Could the Bank of England maintain any action against the London Joint-stock Bank, founded upon such transactions? Or would any of the parties therein be liable to be personally proceeded against by way of indictment, under either of the states of circumstances above supposed?' That last question, which applies to the question, we are of opinion that an action might be maintained in either case. It has already been observed, in answer to your Lordships' first question, that the exclusive * privilege * 546 secured to the Bank of England by Parliament is in the nature of a right granted to them by contract for valuable consideration. In the possession of such right they are entitled to be protected, and any infringement of such right is a private injury to that body, for which they are enabled to seek redress by action at law. Whether the right so granted be directly assailed by an act of the London bank in its own name, or through the medium and intervention of another person acting at their request and by their procurement and for their benefit, if they do or cause to be done in effect (though under cover of doing something different) that which is forbidden to be done by the Act passed for the purpose of securing to the Bank of England the rights which they have contracted for, such banking company is, in our opinion, liable to be sued in an action on the case for an infringement of those rights. In actions for the infringement of patent rights, it is of constant recurrence that the gravamen is laid, not as a direct infringement, but as something amounting to a colourable evasion of the right secured to the party; and we think that the acts of the London Joint-stock Bank described in the foregoing questions put by your Lordships do amount to an infringement of the rights and privileges of the Bank of England.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, the magnitude of the interests involved in the appeal, upon which the Lord Chief Justice has given your Lordships the benefit of the unanimous opinions of the learned Judges, is such that I cannot regret that we have had their opinions, although it did not appear to me on the argument that any difficulty was likely to arise, which would have made it necessary to have taken * the opinions * 547 of the learned Judges, assuming that the law, as laid down in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, is good law; as to which I am very glad to find that the Lord Chief Justice has taken the opportunity of stating the opinion of the learned Judges.

There really can be no doubt as to the proper decision of the action and prosecution, merely states the same proposition in two ways; it would be better to confine the last question to the liability of the parties to an action" [and so confined, the question was left to the Judges].

present question ; because if these rights do belong to the Bank of England, established as they are and as they are asserted in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, it is quite impossible that those rights should be permitted to be destroyed by the arrangement which was resorted to in the present case. That appears to be the ground upon which the learned Judges have come to the opinion of which they have now given your Lordships the benefit. It is an opinion I entertained from the commencement of the argument ; and, under those circumstances, I move your Lordships that the order of the Court below be affirmed, with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I entirely agree in opinion on this case with my noble and learned friend ; indeed, I must say that I never have entertained any doubt upon this case, and more especially when it is placed upon the footing on which it is here put, that of adopting the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, and applying the principle there laid down to the facts of this case ; and the facts in this case do not appear to me any more than to my noble and learned friend, or the learned Judges, to be different.

We must in future consider that The Bank of England v. Anderson, though originally a decision of only one Court, has
* 548 now received the sanction of all * the learned Judges, of whose assistance your Lordships had the benefit in this case ; and the affirmance of the judgment in this case, is in fact an affirmance of the judgment in The Bank of England v. Anderson ; for the cases stand on precisely the same principle.

It was ordered that the appeal be dismissed, and the order therein complained of be affirmed, with costs.

Practice. Costs.

An appeal was called on in its regular course ; the appellant's counsel were not present, but he appeared in person. The House would not dismiss the appeal, but allowed it to stand over, and ordered the appellant to pay the costs of the day.¹

July 20.

A PREVIOUS case having been somewhat suddenly disposed of, this case was called on: no counsel appeared for the appellants.

Mr. Boteler, for the respondent, submitted that the appeal must be dismissed ; and as the appellants had put the respondent to the expense of appearing, it must be dismissed, with costs.

The Lord Chancellor at first intimated an intention of adopting that course.

Mr. Godson, for himself and the other appellants, submitted that that course ought not to be pursued here on account of the accidental absence of counsel, whom he had instructed in the regular manner, and who had been in the House during a part of the day, but had gone away in the belief that the preceding case would occupy a considerable time. He was himself present to support his appeal, but he prayed that he might not be called on to do so in the absence of his counsel, but that time might be given.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The appellant must pay the costs of the day ; but as he appears himself at the bar, and the delay is not attributable to his fault, I think that in justice to him the case ought to be postponed. (a) The respondent will be at liberty to make any application to the House that he may think fit.

Life Estate. Mortgage, Assignment of. Practice.

By a settlement made on the marriage of A., certain premises were assigned to trustees for his use for life, and power was also given to him "to raise by deed, mortgage, or any other writing, a sum of 1000*l.*, to be applied to any purpose that the said A. should please, but the same was not to be raised by way of sale of the said lands;" and A.'s wife had a jointure secured on these premises. A. raised the 1000*l.* by mortgage of the settled premises, and afterwards became bankrupt. His assignee sold his interest as such assignee in the settled premises to B., who also purchased the mortgage. A. afterwards died.

Held, that by this assignment of A.'s estate and interest in the premises, B. became entitled to hold the mortgage as a first charge upon the estate, as well after as before the death of A., and until, by payment of principal and interest, it should be satisfied.

The Court below having directed an inquiry into the value of the estate at the time of the assignment, and the amount of B.'s interest therein, this House reversed the order directing such inquiry, and, without making any order, remitted the case with the declaration of what were the nature and extent of B.'s rights, leaving it to the Court below to carry that declaration into effect.¹

In January, 1808, James O'Sullivan the elder was possessed of certain lands for the residue of a term of 999 years, and on that day executed a settlement of them on the marriage of his son, James O'Sullivan the younger, with the respondent, Honora O'Sullivan. The trustees of the settlement, John Keane and William Ferguson, were to hold the premises for the residue of the term on trust for James O'Sullivan the younger for life, and after his death to pay 100*l.* yearly to the said Honora O'Sullivan during her natural life for her jointure, and subject thereto, to the use of the issue male of the said James and Honora; and for want of such issue male, to their issue female, and for want of issue of their bodies, to the said J. O'Sullivan * as his * 551 absolute property. And it was by the indenture of settlement agreed that the said James O'Sullivan should be at liberty to raise by deed, mortgage, or any other writing, a sum of 1000*l*. to be applied to any purpose that he should please, in case the said marriage should take effect, but that the same was not to be raised by way of sale of the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments aforesaid.

This settlement was duly registered in 1809.

By indenture of mortgage, dated 24th of January, 1811, and made between the said James O'Sullivan the younger of the one part, and Quintin Hamilton, of Liverpool, of the other part, after reciting the said indenture of the 25th of January, 1808, and in particular the provisions thereof whereby it was stipulated that the said sum of 1000*l*. was not to be raised by sale of the said lands and premises; and also reciting that J. O'Sullivan, on the 1st of January then last, stood indebted to Quintin Hamilton, and the house trading under the firm of Hamilton, Crowden, & Co., of Liverpool, merchants, in a sum of 1500*l*. sterling, for money lent, advanced and paid by Quintin Hamilton and his house for the use of James O'Sullivan; and that, in order to secure the principal and interest then due, and all interest, &c., thereafter to grow due, he, the said J. O'Sullivan, had agreed with Hamilton, on behalf of the company, to assign to Hamilton the premises aforesaid, and all his estate, &c., therein by virtue of his marriage settlement or otherwise, and to assign and appoint to Hamilton, as a further and collateral security, the said sum of 1000*l*., which he had power to raise by virtue of the settlement, to be applied in part payment of the sum of 1500*l*. and the interest, &c., and also to pass his bond, with warrant of attorney for confessing judgment thereon, to Hamilton, * in the * 552 penal sum of 3000*l*., conditioned for the payment of the 1500*l*., with interest at 6*l*. per centum per annum, by way of further security:—It was by the indenture witnessed, that in pursuance of the said agreement, and to carry the same into effect, James O'Sullivan did grant and assign to Hamilton, his executors, &c., the said premises, subject to redemption, &c.; and that in order the better to secure the payment of the 1500*l*., and interest, &c., J. O'Sullivan, by virtue of the power and authority by the said settlement in him vested, did grant, charge, &c., by way of mortgage, the sum of 1000*l*. to Quintin Hamilton, his executors, administrators, and assigns, with such power and authority to him and them to raise and levy the same as were given and granted to James O'Sullivan by the said settlement, or in any other manner whatsoever; and when so raised and levied, to apply the same and every part thereof in and towards satisfaction and discharge of the said sum of 1500*l.*, and such interest, &c., as should at the time of such raising and levying thereof be due and owing, but subject to proviso of redemption. And it was by the said indenture provided and declared, that whensoever and as soon as the debt of 1500*l.*, and interest, &c., should by any means be discharged, then the said deed of mortgage, and also the bond and warrant therein mentioned, collateral therewith, should become absolutely void.

On the 1st of February, 1817, a commission of bankrupt was awarded and issued against the said James O'Sullivan, and he was duly declared a bankrupt; and Henry O'Sullivan, of Limerick, was appointed sole assignee, and the estate and effects were duly conveyed to him.

* 553 On the 11th November, 1817, Quintin Hamilton * presented his petition to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in the matter of the said bankruptcy, praying an account of the sum due to him on the foot of said mortgage, and that the mortgaged premises might be forthwith sold before the commissioners, for payment thereof; and praying further relief.

In this petition no mention was made of the fact that there was issue of the said marriage, by reason whereof James O'Sullivan had only a life-interest in the mortgaged premises; nor of the proviso which declared that the said sum of 1000*l.* should not be raised by sale of the said premises.

On the 21st of November, 1817, the Lord Chancellor made an order on the said petition, directing the commissioners to take the account prayed, and to sell the mortgaged premises; and also directing that all proper parties should join in executing a conveyance or conveyances thereof to the purchaser or purchasers, and that the petitioner should be paid out of the produce of such sale, in the first instance, such sum or sums of money as should appear to be due to him, together with the costs of that application and all future costs touching the same.

The commissioners having, in obedience to the order, taken the account directed, found that there was due to Hamilton, on the foot of his mortgage, for principal and interest, a sum of 796*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, up to and for the 31st day of December, 1816;

and the mortgaged premises having been set up on the 27th of April, 1818, for sale by public auction, at the Royal Exchange, in the city of Dublin, the appellant (who was himself a partner in the house of Robert Hamilton & Company, who were the solicitors of Quintin Hamilton, the mortgagee, and who, as such solicitors, procured the order to sell the said lands in the bankruptcy matter) * bid a sum of 850*l.* for the same, and * 554 was declared the purchaser thereof at that price.

The rental of the premises was at that time 263*l.* 13*s.* Irish currency. On the 7th of October, 1818, an assignment to the appellant, as purchaser, was duly executed by Henry O'Sullivan and Quintin Hamilton, according to their respective interests.

The appellant, shortly after the execution of the said deed of the 7th of October, 1818, entered into possession or receipt of the rents of the premises thereby assigned to him, and has ever since continued in such possession or receipt.

In August, 1836, James O'Sullivan died, leaving his eldest son, the respondent, who claims to be entitled to the premises under the marriage settlement of his father, and insists that the appellant's interest as assignee of the life-estate of James O'Sullivan determined on his death; and that such sum, if any, as he was entitled to, in respect of the said charge or sum of 1000*l.*, has been paid off by perception of the rents and profits of the said premises, and that the appellant was bound to have applied the said rents and profits for that purpose.

The respondent, James O'Sullivan, brought an ejectment in Hilary term, 1837; and in February, 1837, the appellant filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, in which he alleged that the proviso for redemption in the indenture of mortgage of the 24th January, 1811, contained, and all equity arising thereunder, had been for ever barred and foreclosed by the several proceedings had in the matter of the bankruptcy, and that all right, &c., to such proviso and equity of redemption, if any, became vested in Henry O'Sullivan, as assignee, and was by him legally and properly assigned to the appellant by the * indenture of the 7th October, 1818, and that the appel- * 555
lant was then entitled to have any estate which might be outstanding in the trustees, or in the respondent, James O'Sullivan, absolutely assigned to him; or that the appellant was entitled to the sum of 1000*l.*, and interest at 6*l.* per cent thereon since the time of the death of James O'Sullivan; and that the same was a good, valid, and subsisting charge affecting the prem-

* 558 * Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Wakefield, for the respondents. — It may be doubtful here whether the proceedings are not altogether void for want of parties, and whether the Court can proceed in the absence of the assignee. The question here is, what is the meaning of this power. It may be to give the bankrupt power to raise money to the amount of 1000*l.*, making the estate liable to the payment of it. That would be to make the estate a surety for the loan: but the estate was in the first instance to be liable to the widow's claim for jointure. The object of the jointure was to bar the widow's claim to dower; but it was also to secure to the widow for life a provision that was to become payable instantly on the death of the husband. To give the charge the effect now contended for, would be to defeat this object. There cannot be a sale of the premises under any circumstances; first, because it is expressly forbidden in the creation of the power itself, and next, because it would defeat the widow's right to jointure, which it was a primary object to preserve. The appointee of the 1000*l.* would of course have a right to the interest; but the manifest intention of the parties was, that the right to the jointure should precede any payment to be made under the power creating the charge of 1000*l.* Under all the circumstances, it is clear that the appellant is only in the situation of a mortgagee in possession. From the time of the death of the tenant for life the decree would simply be against the tenant in tail for the payment of the interest; but the terms of the power to create the mortgage not giving the power to sell in order to satisfy the mortgage, the mortgagee or his assignee can only be entitled to payment out of the rents of the estate, but cannot take the estate itself; and such payment itself

* 559 must be made * after, and be held dependent upon, the superior claim of the jointure.

LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, I do not feel that it is necessary to call upon the learned counsel for the appellant to reply. I think as the matter now stands there is an end of this inquiry. It is clear that the respondents in this case can have nothing to do with any question which they imagine may be raised as to the price paid as between the vendor and the person who has purchased this property. There was an assignment in 1818 of a reversionary interest which did not fall into possession till 1836. The tenant for life of the property in question had the power of raising 1000*l.* chargeable upon it. He did so; and though he was bound to keep down the interest, yet the debt was a charge on the estate. The tenant for life became bankrupt, and the party now plaintiff claims from the assignees of that bankrupt all the interest which they acquired under the bankruptcy, as well as the reversionary interest of the bankrupt himself; and from the person who was then in possession the benefit of that mortgage of 1000*l.*, as he had in fact bought the interests of both the parties; he therefore became entitled by his purchase to the estate for life of the bankrupt, and to whatever interest the bankrupt had created under this charge of 1000*l.* to be enjoyed by any body who had made it the subject of purchase, and which enjoyment he had a right to enforce against any subsequent charge. Whether he gave too little or whether he gave too much for the purchase of that 1000*l.* is a matter of perfect indifference to the respondents, the parties who now represent the inheritance. They are not persons who can be prejudiced by the purchaser having given an inadequate sum for it, or * pur- * 560 chased it under circumstances which would entitle a party really interested in that question to set it aside. The respondents have no right to come before the Court for any such purpose, and why should they? Nor is it necessary that the assignee of the bankrupt should be a party to that suit. What does it signify whether the assignee of the bankrupt has any thing to say against that transaction as a sale for less than the proper value? So long as it remains unimpeached on any other ground, the plaintiff is entitled to all the advantages which can be denied from that purchase. It is as if a party had purchased the right of a ground landlord, where it is clear that the tenant under him could not say, "you bought the farm or the estate at too low a price, and therefore I will not pay you the quit-rent." That really is the situation of these parties; and therefore the appellant having become entitled to whatever belonged to the tenant for life, whether incidentally or otherwise, there cannot be a question that he is entitled to recover it in respect of this purchase.

It remains, therefore, to be considered what title the appellant acquired to that 1000*l.* The settlement certainly is very inartificially framed, but I cannot conceive that there can be a doubt as to his having acquired an interest in that 1000*l.*, the power of creating which was under the settlement incident to the tenant for life, as appears from passages to be found in different parts of the deed. It is incident to the tenant for life, because it was a power to be executed by the tenant for life ; he was tenant for life with the power of raising by mortgage the sum of 1000*l.* out of the estate, and I do not see any ground on which it can be said that this was intended to be a restricted power, as the provision is that he shall be at liberty to raise by deed, mortgage, or by any other writing, the sum * of 1000*l.* to be applied to any purposes he shall please. This power to raise by mortgage 1000*l.* to be applied to any purposes he might please, was in addition to the value of the life-estate he acquired. The jointure of course would come into operation only after the expiration of the life-estate. It is not to be supposed to have been intended that if he raised the 1000*l.* the mortgagee was to be deprived of his interest, though the estate produced enough to raise that interest and also the 1000*l.* It is not consistent with the practice of your Lordships' House to declare so much as to give an opinion beyond the immediate question under discussion and necessary to be decided ; but as the question has been somewhat raised, I will say that I do not feel any doubt that that 1000*l.* when raised was to be a charge upon the estate from the period when it was raised, the interest to be paid by the tenant for life, and the party who lent the money to be the first person who had a charge upon the estate after the expiration of the tenancy for life.

My Lords, the Court below, under some misapprehension probably of the relative situation of these parties and their respective rights, has declined to make a decree for raising that 1000*l.* from the produce of the estate, and has directed an inquiry and report as to " what was the annual value of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments comprised in and conveyed to the appellant by the deed of assignment dated 7th October, 1818, at the time of the sale thereof to the appellant, and what was the value at such time of the life-interest of the said James O'Sullivan, the bankrupt, therein at the time of such sale, having regard to the situation thereof at that time with respect to the deeds of the 25th day of January, 1808." Now, it is obvious that the effect of that direction is erroneous ; it has no reference to what it is to be adjudicated between the plaintiff and * the defendant ; and whatever may be the result of that inquiry, whatever the Court may do upon it, it leaves the question between the plaintiff and the defendant where it was. That must have arisen from some misapprehension as to the situation in which those parties stood with regard to each other. It is clear, therefore, that that decree must be reversed. Your Lordships have before you a case in which the Court below, from a misapprehension of the course to be pursued, has directed an inquiry which does not touch any questions existing between the parties. It is the duty of this House, therefore, to remove that impediment by an assertion of the plaintiff's rights; and I apprehend that your Lordships, seeing that no decree has been made by the Court such as ought to have been made, that the real question has not been entertained, will think that the proper course will be to declare the right, and then to leave the mode in which that right is to be enforced to the judgment of the Court below. I apprehend the order of this House, consistently with the practice, will be to reverse the decree below, and to declare that the plaintiff is entitled, by virtue of the assignment of the 7th of October, 1818, to the benefit of the charge created by the deed of the 24th of January, 1811; and with this declaration remit the cause, leaving to the Court below to make such decree as may be just and consistent with that declaration. That declaration will establish the plaintiff's title to the charge; the mode in which it is to be raised, and the detail, will remain to be considered by the Court below, having the benefit of your Lordships' declaration as to the plaintiff's right, and leaving the question open as to other matters. I do not know very well how that question with regard to the jointure could be declared; at the same time I have not much doubt about it. It is raised in the pleadings, I think, by * the answer. Perhaps it might save the possi- * 563 bility of another appeal to declare the title, but there is a difficulty in doing it.

Mr. Knight Bruce suggested that there should be some words of exclusion to show what their Lordships considered the party really entitled to, and to mark their opinion that he was only entitled to interest from the time of the death. He also suggested, that if the words were "became entitled," instead of "is entitled," it might more clearly mark their Lordships' opinion, because the rents he had received, or which without his wilful default might have been received, since the time of the death, might by possibility absorb the charge altogether.

LORD CHANCELLOR. — That is a subject which can be disposed of only on a regular hearing, which has never been had. I apprehend the rule of the House to be this: that where the Court below has miscarried, the House of course reverses what is done, and makes a sufficient declaration to prevent that error being again committed, but does not interfere further. I apprehend the declaration I have stated, with the words "became entitled," instead of "is entitled," will be sufficient to meet the case. I therefore move your Lordships to reverse the decree, and declare that the plaintiff became entitled, by virtue of the assignment of the 7th of October, 1818, to the sum of 1000*l.*, under the deed of 24th January, 1811, in addition to the life-interest of the bankrupt, James O'Sullivan; and with this declaration, to remit the case to the Court below.

Ordered and declared accordingly.

JOHN THOMSON, Clerk to the General Commis-	} Appellant. sioners of Police in Edinburgh
JAMES MITCHELL	Respondent.

Public Officers. Practice. Costs.

The Edinburgh Police Act, 2 Will. 4, c. 87, does not make the commissioners responsible, through their collector, for the misconduct of one of the police constables.¹

Where an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was appealed against, and overruled in the Court of Session, but the decree of that Court was afterwards reversed in this House, the House gave the appellant the costs incurred by him in the Court of Session.

July 27, 28.

THIS was an appeal against a decree of the Court of Session, reversing in part an interlocutor of Lord FULLERTON, in an action in which the present respondent was pursuer, and the present appellant, Mr. James Stuart, and Eric Mackay, were defenders. The facts of the case were these: On the night of the 30th of November, 1836, Mitchell, accompanied by his wife, and a friend named Henderson, were going along North St. Andrew Street, in Edinburgh, when, as he stated, he fell by accident from the slippery state of the streets. Eric Mackay, one of the night-watch, came up and accused the whole party with being drunk and disorderly. A contention arose upon this, and Mackay having called others of the night-watch to his assistance, Mitchell and his wife, and Henderson, were all taken into custody. In going to the place of detention, Mitchell's leg was hurt,—as he alleged, in consequence of a blow given by Mackay's baton; but as Mackay alleged, in consequence of his falling to the ground through his drunken and excited state. Mitchell was taken to the infirmary, and was found to be permanently injured in the knee-joint. * He afterwards instituted a suit against the present * 565 appellant, clerk to the commissioners, James Stuart, superintendent of the Edinburgh police, and against Mackay, the watchman, by whom he alleged the assault to have been committed. He founded his suit on the Edinburgh Police Act, 2 Will. 4, c. 87, § 18. (a) The three defenders pleaded separately. Mr. Thomson pleaded, 1st, that the action was not sustainable against him as representing the commissioners, inasmuch as the act complained of was not alleged to have been done or ordered by them; 2d, that they were not liable for the acts of the inferior

(a) By which it is enacted, “that the said general commissioners may sue or be sued for any thing done or ordered by them in virtue of this Act, and for recovery of the penalties or forfeitures before mentioned, in the name of their clerk, collector, or treasurer, for the time being.” By the statute in question, the commissioners are authorized to assess the inhabitants, and apply the moneys raised for the purposes of the statutes; to appoint treasurers, clerks, and surveyors, being the officers employed in the financial department of the establishment; to fix generally the number of officers to be employed in every department; to make regulations relative to the lighting, cleaning, and watching of the streets of the city, and for abating nuisances, and removing obstructions on the same, by enacting and enforcing penalties. They have also the privilege of suing and being sued, in name of their clerk, for any thing done or ordered by them in the exercise of these powers, or performance of these duties. The appointment and dismissal of the officers of the police are regulated by the 3 Geo. 4, c. 78. The judge of police is nominated by statute, the superintendent is appointed by the lord provost of the city and sheriff-depute of the county of Edinburgh, or, in the event of their not agreeing as to a fit person, by the Lord Advocate for the time being. The lord provost and sheriff have full power at all times to remove the superintendent at their pleasure. The superintendent has the absolute power of appointing and removing at will the watchmen and other officers of the department acting under his orders; so that (§ 65) in as far as possible he may be made answerable for the conduct of these parties.

The present decree is therefore not warranted either by the precedents of the Court below, or by the high authority of this House.

No counsel appeared on the part of the respondent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — Your Lordships have not had
 * 569 the advantage of hearing counsel in support of the * decision of the Court below. I confess that at present I do not well see how that decision is to be maintained, nor how this case is to be distinguished from that of Duncan v. Findlater. But not having had the advantage of hearing counsel in support of the decree appealed against, I should wish, before advising your Lordships on this appeal, to look into the case, and to examine the arguments and the decision in the case that has been cited.

July 28.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, in this cause, which was heard before your Lordships yesterday, I have taken an opportunity of looking into the case, and also of referring to the report of the decision of this House in the case of Duncan v. Findlater, and it certainly does appear that the principle established by that decision applies in all respects to the present question. But there are in this case circumstances arising out of the provisions of the Police Acts which make it still more clear that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed. It appears, in the first place, that the watchman who actually committed the alleged injury was not appointed by the commissioners, against whose clerk the action is brought. Their duty certainly is to provide funds, but the individual who committed the injury was not in any sense their agent. There is also a difficulty arising from the 18th section of the Act, which provides that they shall only be sued in name of their clerk, unless in respect of some act done or ordered by them. These are the circumstances which distinguish this case, even if the judgment below were not met by the * 570 judgment in Duncan v. Findlater. I find that the * circumstance of this case having been heard ex parte, is not attributable, as was stated from the bar, to that judgment of this House last session; for I find, in the observations I made to this House on that occasion, that I had my attention drawn to the dependence of the present case, and being informed that this case would raise the same question, I inquired how that matter stood, thinking it probable that the House might feel it right to have this case heard before deciding Duncan v. Findlater; but I then found that the present case had been set down ex parte, and therefore it was not to be expected the House would derive much information from the discussion of it. It was set down ex parte, therefore, before the parties were aware what course the House would adopt in the case of Duncan v. Findlater. I have much satisfaction in finding that the decision this House has come to has the sanction of Lord MONCRIEFF, who expressed a similar opinion to that entertained in this House at a period before the question was first discussed at your Lordships' bar; for I find that in January, 1836, Lord MONCRIEFF, in the case of the commissioners of police, at the suit of Smith, founded on by the appellant, pronounced a decree consistent with the principle adopted by your Lordships in Duncan v. Findlater; and in this case itself Lord FULLERTON expressed a similar opinion. There was not, therefore, that unanimity among the Judges in the Court of Session which might seem to exist when the case was disposed of by the Inner House; for we have the authority of those two learned Judges who, at periods before this question was discussed in this House, had expressed opinions contrary to that of the Inner House, and in conformity with the principle ultimately sanctioned in this House. I shall therefore advise your

* Lordships to reverse the judgment of the Court of * 571 Session.

Decree reversed.

The Attorney-General. — The Inner House reserved the question of costs. The appellants do not ask for the costs of the appeal, but they are at least entitled to the costs of the appeal from the Lord Ordinary to the Inner House, wherein they were supporting a judgment which this House has now declared to be correct.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — This House ought now to make such an order as the Inner House would have made had its decision been well founded in principle.

Bond. Land-tax Collector. Surety. Pleading. Practice.

The bond given by a collector and his sureties to the commissioners of land and assessed taxes under the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, is broken if the taxes collected in any one year are not duly paid up by the collector to the account of that year.

The breach of the condition of the bond is equally complete, and the sureties are equally liable, though all the moneys collected in the year for which they are sureties should be in fact paid in, if any part of them should be appropriated by the collector, and received by the commissioners, in satisfaction of the arrears of a former year.

Such appropriation of part of the moneys of one year to the payment of the arrears of a former year, will not prevent the commissioners from maintaining an action on the bond against the sureties for the year in which the money collected has been so misappropriated.¹

The commissioners may come upon the sureties after they have sold the lands and goods of the collector, but the seizure and sale of his lands and goods is a condition precedent to their right of action against the sureties, and they are not entitled to require notice of such lands and goods in order to perform the condition.

The plea of the defendant (a surety in the bond) averred that the collector had lands and goods, of which the commissioners had notice, and that they did not seize and sell. The replication was, that the collector had no property subject to seizure and sale, of which the commissioners had notice; the rejoinder was, that the collector had lands and goods which might have been seized and sold, but were not modo et forma, as alleged by the plaintiffs, concluding to the country. The rejoinder did not say any thing of notice. The verdict was, that the collector had lands and goods which might have been seized and sold, but that the commissioners had no notice of the collector's lands, but had reasonable grounds for believing that he had goods.

Held, that there could be no judgment for the defendant on these pleadings, nor any judgment for the plaintiffs, non obstante veredicto, but only a venire de novo.

The Court below, in which an action is brought, may award a repleader; but a Court of Error cannot award it.

June 27, 1837. July 28, 1840.

THE defendants in error, together with one Collins (since deceased), were the obligees in a joint and * several bond * 573 given to them as commissioners of land and assessed taxes for the Tower division, in the county of Middlesex, by the plaintiff in error, one of the sureties of Richard Bigg, a collector of the assessed taxes for the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, for one year, ending the 5th day of April, 1829. They brought their action in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, to recover of the defendant (now the plaintiff in error) the sum of 699*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*, being moneys received by Bigg as such collector, and not paid or accounted for by him pursuant to the Acts of Parliament relating to those duties.

The following pleas were put on the record:—

First.—Non est factum, on which issue was joined.

Second.—Performance on the part of Bigg, the collector. To this plea the plaintiffs, in their replication, assigned several breaches, the third of which was, that Bigg had not duly paid over to the Receiver-General the moneys received by him as collector of the assessed taxes, in respect of the rates and assess-that the misfeasance happened during the second term, and not during the first. See Rochester v. Randall, 105 Mass. 295; Myers v. United States, 1 McLean, 493; Farrar v. United States, 5 Peters (U. S.), 373.

ments mentioned in the condition ; viz., for the year 1828, ending the 5th day of April, 1829. On this an issue was taken by the defendant in his rejoinder.

Third. — That the bond was obtained by a fraudulent representation by the plaintiffs, or others in collusion with them, that Bigg had well and faithfully collected all sums of money which he under and on account of former appointments was authorized and required to collect, and had well and truly paid and accounted for the same ; whereas said Bigg was indebted in a large sum of money for moneys received by him under former appointments, and had not paid or accounted for the same, by which false
 * 574 representation * the defendant was induced to execute the bond.

The fourth plea imputed fraud generally. Issues were taken on the third and fourth pleas.

The fifth plea alleged that Bigg, previous to bringing the action, and after he had made default in payment of the moneys collected, was possessed of and entitled to divers lands, goods, and chattels, of great value, as of his own property, within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which the defendants in error had notice, and which lands, goods, and chattels might have been seized and sold in pursuance of the directions and powers given to the commissioners, but which continued unsold. To this plea the plaintiffs replied, that after Bigg had collected and received the assessments, and had neglected to pay the moneys so collected and received, he had no lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners which they could seize and sell, of which they had notice, and that all the goods and chattels of Bigg within their jurisdiction, of which they had notice, were seized and sold under a warrant of the commissioners, and applied towards the satisfaction of the sums collected, and there remained a large sum unpaid, and there were not any other goods and chattels of Bigg of which they had notice. The defendant rejoined, that Bigg had divers lands, goods, and chattels within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, which might and ought to have been discovered and found, but which were not seized and sold, and tendered an issue thereon, in which defendants in error joined.

The sixth was a similar plea to the preceding, except
 * 575 alleging possession by Bigg of goods and * chattels only.

Replication and rejoinder similar to the last.

The seventh plea alleged that Bigg was possessed of goods and chattels of great value within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, which they might have seized and sold, and which were sufficient to satisfy all the debts and deficiencies of Bigg. The replication and rejoinder to this plea were similar to the preceding. The 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th pleas in like manner set up the laches of the commissioners as an answer to the action. Issues were taken thereon. The 13th and 14th pleas, which denied that the commissioners were damnified, except by their own wrong, were demurred to, and judgment given for the demurrer.

The action came on for trial at the Guildhall of the city of London, before Mr. Justice ALDERSON, at the sittings after Trinity term, 1831, when the execution of the bond by Mr. Gwynne was admitted. Evidence was then given on behalf of the commissioners; and the following facts were found by the jury, in reply to questions in writing submitted to them by the learned Judge:

First. That Richard Bigg paid over to the Receiver-General all the sums received by him for the assessments for the year 1828-9.

Second. That he did not pay all those sums to the service of the year 1828-9, and that the sum of 2,430*l.* was paid to the service of that year, and 693*l.* to that of former years.

Third. That Richard Bigg had lands or houses, after the default, of the value of 121*l.*, which could have been seized or sold.

Fourth. That he had goods in like manner, of * the value * 576 of 200*l.*, at the time of default, which could have been seized and sold.

Fifth. That the commissioners had not notice of the possession of houses or lands on the part of Richard Bigg, but that they had reasonable grounds for believing that he possessed household goods at the time of the default.

Sixth. That he absconded.

Seventh. That no fraudulent misrepresentation was made to Dr. Gwynne by the commissioners to induce him to execute the bond.

The facts were afterwards turned into a special case, which was argued before the Court of Common Pleas. The Court thought the provisions of the Act requiring the commissioners to examine Bigg, and hasten the payments, was directory only, and therefore that such conduct was not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's recovery, and accordingly directed judgment to be entered up for the plaintiffs, on the issues raised on the 8th lector, and had before then made default. Enough was collected by Bigg, and paid in by him during that year, to exempt the plaintiff from any liability in respect of his bond; and Bigg could not, by paying in, nor could the commissioners, by receiving payment of sums collected in that year, but assigned by the direction of Bigg to the account of a different year, impose upon the surety a liability which he had never undertaken to incur. Without knowledge of a previous default on the part of Bigg being proved against the surety, he cannot be held liable for such default. Now, the money collected in the year for which the plaintiff in error was surety has been actually paid, but the commissioners have thought fit to receive it as paid for the service of a former year. They had no right, by a proceeding of this sort, to fix on the surety this liability. Peppin v. Cooper (a) shows that a bond given under this Act is a bond given in respect of an annual office. That was a case on this very statute, and there it was held that the office of collector was an annual office; and, therefore, when a bond, after reciting the appointment of H. W. to be collector under the Tax Act, was conditioned by him for the due collection of the rates and duties at all times thereafter, that bond was duly complied with by the due collection of the rates for one year. Such being the construction of the Act, it is clear that the surety was only bound to see that the money was collected for the year for which his bond was given. It

* 580 was so collected here, and the amount * collected was duly paid over. The surety, then, is not to be made liable by the acts of the commissioners for a longer period or to a different extent than he contemplated, or than the statute itself contemplated. The collector and commissioners cannot, by agreeing to do a wrongful act, make the surety himself liable. This wrongful appropriation cannot alter the rights of third parties. The doctrine laid down by the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, when this case was under their consideration, cannot be supported. It was there said, (b) with respect to the issue raised on the second plea, "This involves the main question between the parties, namely, whether the payment by Bigg to the Receiver-General of all the sums received by him for assessments for the year 1828-29, but the not paying in all these sums for the service of that year, but, on the contrary, the paying in of the sum of 693*l.*, part thereof, expressly to the service of former years, during which he had been collector, was a satisfaction of the condition of the bond; and we think such a payment is not a 'duly paying over to the Receiver-General' within the meaning of the condition. The two Acts so often referred to evidently contemplate that the money granted by assessments in a given year shall be paid for the service of that year, and no other." But the answer to these observations is, that Bigg had no right to make, nor had the commissioners any right to assent to, this appropriation of the money of one year to the satisfaction of what was due for a former year. The parish was liable to be reassessed for the money due at the moment when the plaintiff in error became surety. In the judgment in the Court of Common Pleas (a) this * hardship upon the parish was referred to, * 581 and it was argued as if the parish was to be protected by the bond from this liability to a reassessment for the money not duly paid. But that liability existed before the plaintiff in error became surety; it existed in respect of the past year, and he became surety for the year succeeding that in which the default had been committed. He was not bound to take on himself the liability of the parish, whose authorities should have taken care to see that the money collected was duly paid over. The plaintiff in error did not enter into the bond to indemnify the parish for the past year, but to guarantee the due collection and payment of the rates for the year then to come. That condition of the bond has been duly fulfilled. Again, if the commissioners had been negligent in enforcing payment in one year, they can have no justifiable pretence to make good their neglect, by coming on the surety of a succeeding year for payment. They have their remedy against the surety of such preceding year, and to that remedy they must be confined. The plaintiff in error cannot have an action against the former surety, but the commissioners can, and against him they ought to proceed. The effect of this judgment as it stands is to favour one surety at the expense of another, and that, too, when the person thus made liable had no notice of the previous default, which it was the duty of some other person to inquire into and prevent. By putting in force any of the powers given by the various sections of the statute, the commissioners had the means of knowing whether any thing and what was in arrear. They were bound to have that knowledge, and to give notice to the new surety in case his so becoming surety was to render him liable to the previous * default of the collector. The payment made in this * 582 particular year of all the money collected within the year is payment within the meaning of the Act, and is therefore an answer to the alleged breach of the bond. The rule, that a party paying money has a right to appropriate the payment as he pleases may be true, as between an ordinary debtor and creditor, but not as regards the surety of a public officer, bound by the settled rules of his office to pay over in every particular year what he has collected in that year. Such officer has no right to make a special appropriation of this kind, nor have the commissioners the right to receive and adopt this appropriation. The jury here found expressly that all the sums of money collected in the year had been duly paid ; this was negating the breach alleged, and the verdict was, therefore, properly given for the surety. That verdict ought to be maintained. The second question in the case is, whether, supposing the surety to be liable in respect of this wrongful appropriation, he can be held liable until after the commissioners have shown that they have seized and sold the goods of the principal debtor. The second question depends on the construction to be put on the 13th section of the statute. The language of that section is positive ; it does not leave any thing to the discretion of the commissioners. They ought to have proceeded against the principal debtor, and they have only the right of coming on the surety for the balance which remains due after they have sold the property of the principal. Here they took no proceedings against the principal, but went at once against the surety. Six out of seven of the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber thought that the principal debtor ought first to have been proceeded against, but they decided

* 583 * against the plaintiff in error, on the ground that there was no proof of notice to the commissioners that the principal debtor had property within their jurisdiction. That introduces the last question for consideration. It is submitted that the allegation of notice in such a case is immaterial. Who ought to give notice, and when and how should notice be given ? The statute contains no enactments, nor even directions, on this subject, and this House will not import this matter of notice into the statute merely to throw a liability on an innocent party. The surety had no notice till the writ was served on him. Can the commissioners enforce the bond against the surety if the principal had property which they might have made available ? They cannot, and they cannot justify their mode of proceeding by saying that they had no notice that the principal had such property, for in no part of the statute is notice to them declared to be necessary. And there was no evidence at the trial that the commissioners had ever made the endeavour to find whether the principal debtor had any land within their jurisdiction. So that they cannot set up their right on the ground that they did all they could to discover the property of the principal. It is clear that, in fact, they could allege no such thing on their part, for they must have known the situation and circumstances of the collector, and could not need notice as to his property. The seventh section of the statute requires the commissioners to be inhabitants of the district for which they act; the assessors are also inhabitants, and by these persons are the collectors appointed. This almost seems a provision intended to render notice unnecessary. It is most probable that in this case they had full knowledge of the property of the collector, and there is no finding of the jury that they had not such knowledge. If they * had such knowledge, that was sufficient, for the ordinary * 584 rule, applicable to cases of bills of exchange, that although a party has knowledge he must yet have notice, will not apply here, the difference between the two cases being plain and palpable. There is but one authority on the construction of this statute, and that is the case of Peppin v. Cooper. (a) It was a case well considered by most eminent Judges, and it distinctly lays down the rules that ought to govern the decision of the present case. It is clear from that case that this office is an annual office, that the liability of the surety therefore is only an annual liability, that no notice to the commissioners is necessary, and that the bond against the surety cannot be put in suit until after there have been proceedings taken by the commissioners against the goods of the principal. Mr. Justice LITTLEDALE, when this case was taken before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, (b) said that the goods of the principal must be sold, for that "the meaning of the clause is, that the deficiency must be ascertained first; for otherwise it is putting the bond in suit for the whole, when the Act says it shall only be so for a deficiency." That was not done, and in that respect, therefore, the proceedings of the defendants in error are incorrect. The judgment of the Court below is incorrect. The Court had no authority to enter a verdict non obstante veredicto on the last issues, which had been found, and properly found, in favour of the surety.

(a) 2 B. & Ald. 431.

(b) 2 Bing. N. C. 42.

Mr. Serjeant Taddy, for the defendants in error.—The judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed ; but if that cannot be so on the whole record, the judgment ought to be for * 585 the commissioners on some of the * issues, and for them non obstante veredicto as to the rest. That there was a breach of the condition of this bond cannot be doubted ; it is clear, therefore, that so far the judgment of this House ought to be for the defendants in error ; then comes the question whether they ought to seize the goods of the collector before they are entitled to come on the surety : even if they are bound to do so, that obligation does not arise until they have had notice of the fact that there is property of that person within their jurisdiction. They had no such notice here. There is, indeed, an allegation of notice in the plea ; but every one familiar with pleading knows that that general allegation means nothing, and is often inserted without the least reference to the facts. There is no allegation in the plea showing specific lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners to have been possessed by the collector, and to have been known to the commissioners as his property ; such an allegation ought to have been inserted in the plea, had the notice to the commissioners been intended to be relied on. It is clear that without such notice the commissioners were not bound to seize lands. The plea itself, by alleging notice, showed that the defendant in the Court below treated notice as necessary ; and this notice must be actual and not constructive notice. The commissioners were not bound to go about instituting inquiries to discover the lands of which the collector might be possessed. If they were bound to seize his lands in the first instance, which is by no means admitted, they were not bound to do so except upon notice given them that he had lands, and that certain lands pointed out to them were his. This notice was a condition precedent to their duty to seize. This point is raised by the rejoinder to the replication on the fifth plea.

* 586 [LORD BROUGHAM.—But * that rejoinder is irregular ; it does not take issue on the defendant's allegation.]

Still the want of notice is a matter raised for consideration on the face of the record. The plea alleged that the commissioners had notice, and that notice must give the commissioners a real practical knowledge of the fact. (a) There is no pretence that such a notice was given in the present case. The giving of this notice was a condition precedent. What were the leading objects of the bond, and what the rights of the parties? The bond was taken in pursuance of the Act of Parliament, the leading object of which was to secure the raising of the money for the public service. The next object was to secure the parish from the danger of reassessments. Now in this bond nothing whatever is said of seizure. The 52d clause, which gives the power of sale, only gives it as consequent to the power of seizure, which in itself is merely discretionary. The commissioners are at liberty to exercise a sound and prudent discretion as to seizure, but having seized they are bound to sell. That last part of the clause is for the benefit of the surety, but it does not override the other parts of it. If the commissioners had seized the lands of the collector, and had then brought an action on the bond against the sureties, that part of the clause would have enabled the sureties to apply to the Court, on the ground that the commissioners were wilfully delaying to sell the lands they had seized; but it does not compel the commissioners to make the seizure. On the other hand, if the commissioners had sold the lands and applied the money, the surety might have moved the Court to stay the proceedings till the money received by them had been duly carried to account for his credit.

These are the *objects of the statute, and in deciding * 587 whether a particular provision of a statute is a condition precedent or not, the Court will look at the general objects of the statute. Looking at them, it is impossible to say that this is a condition precedent. The party who becomes a surety, does so, among other reasons, for the protection of the parish; he is not to be protected at the expense of the parish; Peppin v. Cooper (a) is not an authority in point, for the facts there were wholly different from what they are in the present case. If the House should think that the commissioners were not entitled to notice, then the verdict on the issues relating to notice will be for the plaintiff in error; but as there has been a clear breach of the bond, the judgment must be entered for the defendants in error, notwithstanding the verdict.

Mr. Wightman, on the same side.—If the Court below pronounces a judgment, which though right in substance is wrong in point of form, a court of error may correct what is wrong and give the right judgment. The commissioners here were justified in receiving the money tendered to them on account of what was due for the former year; they had no right to refuse it when so tendered, and to say, we know that the money now tendered was collected for the account of this year, and we will not receive it on account of what is due for a former year. If they had no such right of refusal, then their having so received it forms no ground of answer to this action. It is true that the office is an annual office, because it is of importance that the money received within the year should be appropriated to the wants of the year; but if not so appropriated in one

* 588 year, the commissioners * have no right to say that the balance shall not be made up on the first opportunity.

Then the question arises, whether it is a condition precedent to putting the bond in suit against the surety, that the property of the principal should be seized and sold. Some of the Judges doubted whether it was a condition precedent, and the words of the statute do not clearly make it out to be so. If that is the case, then the commissioners cannot be defeated in this action because they have not seized and sold the goods of the principal in the first instance. The 13th section of the statute gives the commissioners the power to seize and sell the property of the principal, and without that section they could not make such seizure. But it does not therefore follow that, because they have the power, they must seize and sell the property of the collector. All that that section does is to give the surety the benefit of any sale of the property of the principal which may have taken place. It is clear, from the whole of the judgment of Mr. Justice LITTLEDALE, that he was of opinion that there ought to have been notice to the commissioners, for that it never could be the object of the legislature to fetter them in the right to recover, by the mere fact that they might possibly have knowledge of the principal having property within their jurisdiction. Now here the commissioners allege that all his property of which they had notice they have sold. The issue does not virtually include the notice. Notice is a substantive allegation, and must be proved as alleged. If so, then the omission of any allegation of notice in the rejoinder is an admission that the commissioners had no notice. The issue presented on the fifth plea, and the replication and rejoinder, may be an immaterial issue if found for the * 589 surety, but it was a material issue * when found for the commissioners, for it showed that they had no notice of any lands of the collector which they might have seized.

Sir W. Follett, in reply. — The pleading here is insufficient on both sides, and the verdict as now entered for the plaintiffs below cannot be supported. There was payment here of the year's collection, according to the terms of the bond and the statute, and the error was that of the commissioners themselves, in permitting the sum thus paid in to be taken to the account of a former year. The appropriation of one year's receipts to the purposes of a previous year is positively illegal, and the money thus paid in must now be treated as paid to the account of the year for which the plaintiff in error was surety. The finding of the jury settled the fact that the collector had goods which might have been seized and sold. If that is true, it is clear that the commissioners were not entitled to call for formal notice of the existence of such lands and goods, but ought to have shown that they had made due inquiries for property of the collector within their jurisdiction, and had not been able to find any. That is according to the true construction of the statute, which requires the commissioners to seize and sell all that they could and might discover.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — But suppose we think that the inferences stated in the plea are not sufficiently stated in point of law, may we not give the plaintiffs judgment non obstante veredicto, according to the case of Goodburne v. Bowman? (a)]

That case is contrary to every principle before decided: besides, that case is not in point with the present, for * there the pleas were held bad; but here, some of them * 590 at least are good; and with any good pleas on the record, the House will not give judgment for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto; nor will the House, under such circumstances, award a repleader. There is not here any confession of the cause of action.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — There are, my Lords, some questions in this case on the merits and some on the pleadings, and I should wish to frame such questions to the Judges as will procure answers satisfactory in every possible way.

(a) 2 Moore & Scott, 700; 9 Bing. 582.

His Lordship then stated generally the nature of these questions, and proposed to take time to frame them.

Lord BROUGHAM agreed with this proposal.

July 4, 1839.

The following were the questions afterwards proposed for the opinion of the Judges:—

1. A bond is given by the defendant, as surety for A. B., a collector of assessed taxes for the parish of D., in the county of E., for the year 1828, to the commissioners of the assessed taxes, with a condition to the following effect: "That if the above bounden A. B. do and shall well and faithfully demand and collect all and every the sum and sums of money in the said assessments charged and specified, of the respective persons from whom the same shall or may be payable, and shall and do, in case of non-payment thereof, duly enforce the powers of the said Acts against such persons who may make default therein, and also well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the Receiver-

General of the said taxes, rates, and duties for the said * 591 county of E., all such sum and sums of money * as shall come to the hands of the said A. B. as such collector, upon the days and at the times by the said Acts appointed for the payment thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of the said Acts; and also do and shall, when thereunto required, at such times and places as shall be appointed for that purpose, give and render, or cause to be given and rendered, unto the commissioners appointed or to be appointed to put the said Acts in execution, or to any two of them, a just and true account in writing of all such sum and sums of money which he the said A. B. shall have collected and received by virtue or on account of the said assessments, and shall forthwith pay and deliver the same unto the said commissioners, or any two of them, or unto such person or persons whom they or any two or more of them shall appoint, then this obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and effect."

A. B. paid to the Receiver-General of the taxes for the said county all the sums of money collected and received by him, and which came to his hands as collector for the year 1828, at the proper days and times mentioned in the condition, and appointed by the Acts of Parliament (43 Geo. 3, c. 99, and 3 Geo. 4, c. 88) for payment thereof; but he did not pay all those sums to the account or service of that year, but a part only, and the residue he paid to the account or service of former years for which he had been collector; but the defendant not having been surety for the said A. B. for the former years; and by such payment the account of former years was paid up and satisfied. Was this conduct of A. B. a breach of the condition of the bond?

2. A. B. had, after the time of such breach (supposing that a breach took place), certain lands and * goods in the * 592 district, and within the jurisdiction of the said commissioners, of which the commissioners had knowledge, before an action was brought on the bond: an action being brought—Is it a defence to that action that the commissioners did not before suit seize and sell the said lands and goods?

3. Is it a defence to such action that the commissioners did not seize and sell, supposing that the commissioners had no knowledge before the commencement of the suit of the existence of such lands or goods?

4. To an action on such a bond by the commissioners, a plea was pleaded (the fifth plea), to which there was a replication and rejoinder as set out in the special verdict: the jury found that there were lands and goods of A. B. within the jurisdiction after the default and before the commencement of the suit, but that the commissioners had not notice thereof: ought the issue raised by the rejoinder to be found for the plaintiff or the defendant?

5. Supposing the verdict to be entered for the defendant on the said issue, and supposing it is not a defence to the action that the lands and goods of A. B. were not sold by the commissioners unless they had notice (meaning knowledge) of their existence: can the verdict be entered for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto, on the implied confession in the rejoinder, that, if there were lands and goods, &c., the commissioners (the plaintiffs) had no notice of their existence?

6. Supposing the judgment could not be so entered, and the issue raised by the said rejoinder be immaterial, can a Court of error award a repleader, and ought it to do so in this case?

7. Supposing a Court of error cannot or should not award a repleader, what judgment ought it to * pro- * 593 nounce? Ought it to be a judgment for the plaintiffs on the whole record, on the ground that the other pleas, or the issues found thereon, contain a sufficient confession or afford sufficient proof whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiffs, disregarding the immaterial issue?

he has undertaken to be responsible, and at least as having much better means of knowledge as to his circumstances than the commissioners; and if the surety is not able to discover the concealed property of his principal, it seems to me unreasonable to expect that the commissioners shall do it.

To the fourth question, the answer I think ought to be, that the issue raised by the rejoinder must be deemed to have been found for the defendant.

To clear the way for the consideration of this question, it is necessary to state with particularity the substance of the pleadings. The fifth plea alleges three matters of substance, — first, that the collector was possessed of divers lands and goods which were subject and liable to be seized and sold, and might have been seized and sold; secondly, that the plaintiffs had notice of this; thirdly, that the lands and goods had not been sold. The replication alleges that the collector had not any lands of which the plaintiffs had notice, and that some of his goods had been seized and sold, and that there were no other goods belonging to him, within the jurisdiction, of which the plaintiffs had notice. The rejoinder is, that the collector had divers lands which the commissioners could and might have seized and sold, and that all the goods of the collector which could and might and ought to have been discovered, were not seized and sold, in manner and form as the plaintiffs had alleged, and thereof the defendant put himself upon the country.

Now, in the allegations of this rejoinder, as it seems to me, no assertion of notice to the plaintiffs is involved. That it is not asserted in express terms, is clear; and I see no reason to think that the defendant intended to involve it. On the contrary, he appears * to have omitted it designedly, and to have inserted what seems intended as a substitution for the allegation of notice, when he avers that the goods could and might and ought to have been discovered. I cannot, therefore, see any ground for extending the sense of the issue tendered beyond what the words naturally import. Taking this to be the effect of the rejoinder, it cannot but occur to ask whether any issue at all is joined; for the rejoinder contains nothing contradictory to the allegations in the replication; on the contrary, the two are entirely consistent. To make an issue, regularly, there should be an affirmative on one side and a negative on the other, meeting each other directly; and various cases are to be found in our law books in which, for a neglect of this rule, it has been held that no issue had been joined, and that the defect was not aided after verdict, but that the verdict was a nullity. See Sandback v. Turvey, (a) Oxford v. Rivett, (b) Derby v. Hemming, (c) Kirle v. Lees. (d) There are other cases, however, in which the same strictness has not been observed, and in which, after one party has made an allegation and offered to go to the country upon it, and thereupon the similiter has been added, and a trial had, it has been considered as an agreement by both parties to go to trial upon that allegation, and an informal mode of joining issue upon it, which, as far as that informality is concerned, is aided, after verdict, by the Statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 30; see the cases of Walthall v. Aldrich, (e) Parker v. Taylor, (g) Burton v. Chapman. (h) It is difficult to reconcile these two classes * of cases with each other; but it appears to me * 598 reasonable to adhere to the latter class, and to hold that where the parties have, by going to the country on a particular point, agreed to treat it as an issue joined, it should be considered, after verdict, as being such, though informally joined. The result is, that the parties in this case are to be deemed to have joined issue upon the allegations contained in the rejoinder, that rejoinder not importing any allegation of notice. I consider, therefore, the issue as being in substance only this,—whether R. Bigg had any lands and goods which were not seized and sold. The rejoinder in terms says, in addition, that the lands might have been seized and sold, and that the goods could and might and ought to have been discovered. But it does not appear to me that, under these terms, any separate issuable matter of fact is asserted, or that by the insertion of them the nature of the issue is changed; for when it is said that the lands could and might have been seized and sold, it is but the statement of a conclusion resulting necessarily from the existence of the lands; and when it is said that the goods could and might have been discovered, the assertion, standing nakedly as it does, is but the assertion of a possibility which necessarily results from the fact of their existence. When it is alleged that the goods ought to have been discovered, that is not an allegation of a fact to be proved, but of a legal obligation supposed to result from the facts alleged. Considering, therefore, the only fact in issue to be, whether R.

Bigg had lands and goods not sold before the action brought, and it being found by the verdict that he had, I think that the issue raised on the fifth plea is found for the defendant.

* 599 But although the informal mode in which the issue * is joined is, I think, cured, after verdict, by the statute, there is another defect in the issue which is not aided by the statute, namely, its immateriality; for, notwithstanding some early cases to the contrary, it is now well settled that a verdict, though it may cure an informal, cannot cure an immaterial issue. The verdict, therefore, though found for the defendant, cannot give him any title to a judgment in his favour. The case is the same, if the true view of the pleadings is that no issue at all is joined; for, in that case, the verdict is to be considered as a nullity as far as the fifth plea is concerned, and consequently the defendant cannot be entitled to judgment upon it. Sandback v. Turvey. (a)

To your Lordships' fifth question, it ought, I think, to be answered that judgment cannot be entered for the plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, on the implied confession in the rejoinder that the plaintiffs had no notice of the existence of the lands and goods in question. The ground on which such a judgment may be given is explained by Lord HOLT, in Staples v. Heydon, (b) where he is reported in substance to have said: "Where the defendant confesses a trespass, and avoids it by such a matter as can never be made good by any sort of plea, there, in such a case, judgment shall be given upon the confession, without regard to the finding upon an immaterial issue. But where the matter of the justification is such a matter as if it were well pleaded would be a good justification, there, though it be ill pleaded, yet that shall not be taken to be a confession of the plaintiff's action.

And the books do all of them, if they be narrowly looked * 600 into, * turn upon this difference, — where the confession is full, and the matter of the plea is ill in substance. And the form of entering up the judgment is quite consistent with the principles here laid down by Lord HOLT: see Viner's Abridgment, Judgment (D), pl. 1. Broadbent v. Wilks. (c) The present case does not fall within the rule so laid down; for the defendant's plea, if true in point of fact, is a valid defence to the action; and no instance can be found in which judgment has been given non obstante veredicto, except where the plea pleaded by the defendant has been insufficient in point of law.

But it is said that the Court must consider it as established upon this record that one of the material allegations of the plea, viz., that of notice to the plaintiffs, is not true; for the replication asserts that the collector had not any lands of which the plaintiffs had notice, nor any goods, but those sold, of which they had notice; and the rejoinder, by not reasserting the notice, must be considered as having admitted its non-existence; and consequently the record must be taken as if the plea had not contained any allegation of notice, in which case it would have been insufficient in law. Now, although it should be conceded, that, upon the trial of the issue raised, the want of notice must be considered as admitted, it would not follow that when the issue is found to be immaterial, and the question arises whether there ought to be a repleader or a judgment non obstante veredicto, the non-existence of notice is to be considered as an established fact. The case seems rather to range itself in the class of those in which the defendant may have failed through mispleading, rather * than through an inherent * 601 defect in the substance of his defence. He may have mistaken the law, and selected the wrong fact to put in issue; but, if a repleader were awarded, he might, for any thing the Court can see, succeed in establishing the plea originally put forward as the ground of his defence.

But it may be urged, that, in the case supposed in your Lordships' question, the finding of the jury has established the non-existence of notice. To this the answer is, that the finding in question is of a matter not within the compass of the issue: and the Court, I conceive, cannot pay any regard to a finding by the jury which has no tendency to decide the issues raised by the pleadings; for the jury are sworn only to decide the issues joined, and the parties cannot be supposed to have come prepared to try any thing else. The jury, in the case supposed, have found as a fact that there was no notice to the commissioners; but the question whether there was such notice or not, not having been put in issue, cannot be considered as ever having been tried and judicially determined.

These reasons, combined with the absence of all precedent for pronouncing a judgment non obstante veredicto in a case where a valid and sufficient plea was pleaded in the first instance, have led me to the conclusion that such a judgment cannot be given in the present case.

To your Lordships' sixth question, the answer is that a Court of error cannot award a repleader. In the case of Bennet v. Holbech, (a) it was said by Lord HALE, that, in the King's Bench, on error from the Common Pleas, it was anciently the
 * 602 custom to * award a repleader, for which he cited many records; but he said it was obsolete, and not in use in his time, and had not been done for one hundred years. Subsequently to this case, it has been commonly received in the law, and it is to be found in many text writers, that a repleader cannot be awarded by a Court of error, and I think rightly so; for it is to be observed, that, to deny a repleader where it ought to be awarded, is error: Staple v. Heydon; (b) and it seems to follow, that if a Court of error can award a repleader, it would be bound to do so in all cases in which the inferior Court ought to have done so. If, then, it were held that Courts of error have the power to award a repleader, it would follow that they have done wrong in the course they have been pursuing for so many years, — a supposition which cannot be admitted under a system of laws professing, as the English code does, to rest mainly upon precedent.

To your Lordships' seventh question, it should be answered, that, if judgment cannot be entered for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto, and if the Court cannot or do not award a repleader, the judgment given in the Court below ought to be reversed, and that judgment cannot be pronounced for the plaintiffs on the whole record, on the ground suggested.

Your Lordships' question renders it necessary to consider the doctrine on which the case of Goodburne v. Bowman (c) rests; and it will appear on consideration that the present case does not fall within the principle on which that case, as I understand it, proceeded. The declaration in Goodburne v. Bowman was for a libel. The defendant pleaded the general
 * 603 * issue, and several special pleas justifying the libel as true.

The verdict was for the plaintiff on the general issue and on one of the pleas of justification, and for the defendant on the other pleas. The plaintiffs applied for judgment non obstante veredicto. The Court were of opinion that the special pleas contained a confession of the action, and that the answer set up was insufficient by way of avoidance. But it was observable in that case that some of the allegations of the declaration were admitted by implication only, and not in express terms; and a doubt might be suggested whether there was a sufficient confession of all the material allegations of the declaration. The Court, therefore, went on to say (as I understand their meaning), that, even if they were not fully confessed by the special pleas, yet, inasmuch as they were put in issue by the plea of the general issue, and had been proved upon the trial, and a verdict had thereupon, they were as effectually established on record as if directly and in terms confessed; and the justification being bad in substance, they held that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the whole record. But the present case is different. No question is made here whether there is a sufficient admission of the material allegations contained in the plaintiffs' declaration: but the ground on which the plaintiffs are not entitled to judgment is, that the Court cannot see that the avoidance is insufficient, inasmuch as upon an examination of the fifth plea, and the issue raised upon it, the Court cannot see sufficient ground for assuming the falsity of the allegation of notice contained in the plea. Now, if it had appeared judicially from any other part of the record that the plaintiffs had had no such notice, the case of Goodburne v. Bowman would have furnished * a * 604 precedent in the plaintiffs' favour. But I see nothing in any other part of the record which can clear up the ambiguity on this point; the finding of the jury respecting notice not being entitled to be considered as a judicial determination on that point, for the reasons adverted to in a former answer.

(c) 9 Bing. 532; 2 M. & Scott, 700.

In this state of the case, it seems to me that the judgment which ought to be pronounced should be simply a judgment of reversal, which will leave it open to the parties litigant to bring a new action, if so advised.

MR. JUSTICE COLERIDGE. — In answer to the first question propounded by your Lordships, I beg to state, that, in my opinion, the conduct of A. B., in the case supposed, was a breach of the condition of the bond. Upon this question it will not be necessary to state the reasons for my opinion at any great length. The bond and the condition are framed to secure the due discharge of the duties of the collector in his office: his office is but for a year's duration, and his duty (amongst other things) is, to pay to the Receiver-General, at the times specified, the moneys which he shall collect upon the assessments for the year, in discharge of those assessments: to pay them in discharge of the arrears of former assessments is no more such a payment than to pay them on any private account to the Receiver-General, or to any other person would be. Whether this were done with or without the participation or collusion of that officer, seems to be immaterial. The condition is broken, if, with the knowledge and by the act of the collector, in whole or in part, the moneys collected are not paid in discharge of that assessment under which they were collected.

* 605 In the case supposed in your Lordships' second * question, I am of opinion that it is a defence to the action that the commissioners did not before suit seize and sell the lands and goods there mentioned, if such action be brought against the surety. This seems to me to flow as a necessary and direct consequence from the language of the first proviso in the 13th section of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99; and I can give no effect to that proviso, which was evidently framed to make a distinction between the principal and surety, in favour of the latter, unless by so construing it. The bond is taken under the provisions of that section; and it seems to me that the proviso is virtually incorporated in the condition of the bond, and that it limits the liability of the surety to the making good the deficiency remaining after sale of the collector's lands and goods. Many reasons in support of this view of the case occur to the mind, and have already been suggested in the printed judgments formerly delivered in the case now before your Lordships; but it seems to me more satisfactory to rely on the unambiguous language of the proviso itself. According to that, the surety is made liable to be sued, not for every deficiency, but for a particular and limited deficiency; i.e., that which shall remain after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of the collector. That liability only he must be taken to have contemplated when he sealed the bond. To hold that he may be sued before sale, for the general deficiency, is to subject him to a different and enlarged liability, and, in effect, to expunge the proviso from the statute.

I am equally of opinion that the want of seizure and sale by the commissioners will be an answer to the action, although they had no knowledge before the * commencement of the suit of the existence of the lands and goods. This opinion I express with much diffidence, because I have reason to fear that it differs from that entertained by some of my brethren. But I arrive at it upon the same principle that led me to my answer to your Lordship's second question, — the principle, namely, of collecting the meaning and intention of the statute from the unambiguous expression used, rather than from any notions which I may entertain of what is just or expedient.

Having considered with attention and respect the reasons that have been stated in support of a contrary opinion, I am bound to say that they have not satisfied my mind. The question arises simply on the construction of the proviso in section thirteen, before referred to : in terms it is silent as to notice to the commissioners, or knowledge had by them : the words are — “ No such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the land, &c., of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the commissioners by this Act : ” and the question is, whether these words are to be understood as if, instead of them, the statute had said, “ all lands, &c., of such collector of the existence whereof, or otherwise, the said commissioners shall have been apprised by the said surety before the commencement of such suit. ” This is the question : and the test by which I think it ought to be tried is this, — whether this addition is a necessary implication from the words already used, in order to give them a sensible meaning and effect. If by this test I can see that the proposed addition is already necessarily contained, although not expressed, in the statute, it is, of course, not the less * cogent because not expressed. But I * 607 cannot concede that we are at liberty, upon any ground whatever, to add a new term to the statute. In saying this, I am not unmindful of the dicta to be found in our books, nor of decisions upon old statutes, which seem to warrant a more free dealing with the written law ; and whenever Acts of Parliament shall again be framed with the generality and conciseness with which the legislature spoke some centuries since, it may be fit to consider the soundness of that principle of interpretation which they involve ; but it is enough to say that it is wholly inapplicable to a modern statute, in which the legislature is careful to express all it intends in so many words, that to go beyond their necessary implication is to make, not to interpret, law. The principle, then, on which I rely, will not let in the consideration of particular circumstances in each case, or a regard to a greater or less degree of convenience, a more or less complete effect to be given to the presumed intent of the legislature. Nothing, in short, which is founded on what the legislature might better have done, nor simply even what the legislature intended; the sole legitimate inquiry is, I conceive, what intention is to be found in the words of the Act, expressed or implied: unless, by words written or words necessarily implied, and therefore virtually written, the intention has been declared, we cannot give effect to it.

Now, that the words are sensible by themselves, as read without any implied addition, nay, that, the proviso being framed confessedly for the benefit of the surety, the absence of the proposed addition will more largely effectuate its general intent, can, I think, scarcely be denied. The argument, indeed, takes another direction, — that it is necessary to qualify or

from having their full natural operation, because that would defeat the very object of the section itself. This seems to me avowedly to be an alteration of the statute; and, therefore, I should not feel removed from my position, if I were to concede that the effect of my interpretation would be that which is alleged. I am not, however, driven to such a concession; if the commissioners do their duty, they will, before the appointment of collectors in any of the three modes pointed out by the 9th, 13th, and 14th sections of the statute, and before the admission of any persons to be sureties, take care to inform themselves of the properties of the collectors, in such a manner as to prevent any practical difficulty arising from the proviso. I observed, in passing, that though there are three modes of appointment mentioned in the statute, and in one of them the commissioners themselves are the parties to select the collector, yet the same form of condition and the same proviso applies to all, — a circumstance not without its weight in respect of the argument founded on the difference as to the knowledge of the circumstances of the collector, which it is said may be presumed to exist between the commissioners and the sureties.

I do not notice in detail the different suggestions which have been made in favour of the qualified interpretation of the proviso, and which are founded on considerations of inconvenience or liability to fraud in the literal one; because my argument, if a sound one, denies the admissibility of any such considerations. But one argument that has been used demands an answer. It is said, that the proviso being for the benefit of the surety,

ers of those circumstances which bring him within its reach.

I own this appears to me to beg the question, or to misrepresent the situation of the parties: if my contract has only been to be answerable for what shall remain after seizure and sale of my principal's property; if you cannot sue me for any thing till you have exhausted that primary fund,—what principal of justice requires that I should undertake the responsibility of discovering that fund? why am I to help you to the performance of this condition, which is to give you a right of action against myself? If, indeed, it can be shown that I collude with my principal, or take any step to conceal or make away with his property, any presumption may properly be made against me. Something analogous to this, though not expressly in point, is the course of decisions with regard to the landlord's re-entry under the 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, where no sufficient distress is found on the premises: the burden of search in every part of the premises, and of proof that no distress was there, is cast on the landlord; but if the tenant is shown to impede such search in any way, the presumption immediately shifts, and is cast upon the tenant.

I cannot but feel, in conclusion, that the argument on the other side is but a disguised attempt to alter a law which is thought to be imperfectly expressed. To do this is always unjust in the particular case, because it works an ex post facto alteration of the contract between the parties; and is unsound in legal principle. My sense of the practical importance of this doctrine must be my excuse for having troubled your Lordships so long with my answer to the third question.

In answer to your Lordships' fourth question, I beg to state that, in my opinion, on the facts supposed, *the * 610 issue raised by the rejoinder ought to be found for the defendant. The allegation and denial of notice in the plea and replication appear to me immaterial; the rejoinder, therefore, rightly passed them over, and tendered the issue on that which was material, on which there has been a sensible finding by the jury.

As a judgment non obstante veredicto is always upon the merits, and assumes, not only that the defence, even if good in form and true in fact, is bad in law, but that it discloses a confession of the plaintiff's case, the hinge upon which the answer to your Lordships' fifth question will turn must be, whether the rejoinder, being by the supposition (but not in my opinion) bad in point of law, though true in fact, also confesses the remaining allegations of the replication which it has not denied. In terms, a pleading of this description, which merely selects for denial one of many facts alleged in the previous pleading, admits nothing as to the residue. For the purpose, indeed, of trial before the jury, every thing is admitted but that which is denied: where, however, the fact so denied and found is immaterial, a distinction has always been taken between a pleading of this sort and one which confesses and avoids. In the case of Plummer v. Lee (a) the Court of Exchequer acted upon this distinction. The same distinction in principle appears to have been recognized as early as in the case of Pitts v. Polehampton, (b) in which Lord HOLT took this difference, that, “where the defendant’s plea confesses the duty demanded by the plaintiff, and does not avoid it sufficiently, if the issue be immaterial, and found for the plaintiff, he shall

 * 611 have * judgment; but if the defendant’s plea goes in discharge of the action, and the issue is taken immaterially, and verdict for the plaintiff, a repleader shall be granted.” I therefore beg to answer this question in the negative.

In the case of Bennet v. Holbech, (c) Lord HALE said that it had even then become obsolete for the Court of King’s Bench to award a repleader on a writ of error; and it has ever since, I believe, been the understood practice that a repleader cannot be awarded by a Court of error. Your Lordships are not in possession of the record; and I do not see how you can carry into effect that which judgment of repleader is intended to produce. This judgment directs that the parties replead, and the cause begins again from the point at which the defect in the pleading appears; it is calculated, therefore, to bring them to a material issue in fact or law; and the House would be called upon to perform the functions of an original Court for the trial of the cause, without having the record in its possession, or the means of summoning a jury, giving day to the parties, or using any of that machinery by which, in the Courts below, causes are regularly carried on to judgment.

Your Lordships’ seventh question is new. In answering it, I must assume that the opinion which I have ventured to express in answer to your third question is erroneous, and also that, if there had only been the fifth plea pleaded, the Court below should have directed the parties to replead. In that state of things, as I have already stated that I think your Lordships cannot award that judgment, I see no other course that would have been open for this House but * simply to have reversed the judgment for the plaintiffs pronounced below. * 612 The question then arises, whether the fact of there being other pleas and other issues on the record so found that upon them a satisfactory judgment could have been pronounced for the plaintiffs below if the fifth plea had not been pleaded, will enable this House now to pronounce that judgment, although the fifth plea be there, and the issue arising on it not disposed of satisfactorily. Upon principle, I should have no difficulty in answering this question in the negative. The fifth plea is pleaded to the whole cause of action. In what way a material issue raised upon it may be disposed of, the House cannot at all anticipate judicially: it may be for the defendant below; and if so, all the other issues become wholly immaterial. To pronounce judgment, then, as to the whole record, in this state of it, is to exclude one party from a defence on which he relies; to prejudge one defence by conclusions drawn from the demerits of other defences. This injustice is prevented by the rule, which I have always considered universal and inflexible, that each plea is to be looked at by itself for all purposes, except where by reference it incorporates any of the allegations of another. If, indeed, the House saw that the issue on any one good plea was in favour of the defendant, the merits of the other pleas might be disregarded. But that is only because they then become immaterial as to the final issue of the cause.

(a) 2 M. & W. 495; 5 Dowl. 755.

(c) 2 Saund. 319.

I have stated that, upon principle, this did not appear to me a difficult question. But I am aware of the case of Goodburne v. Bowman, (a) where, in a considered judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, expressions are to be found at variance with the opinion I have expressed. I feel the full weight of that * high authority; but I am bound to express to your Lord- * 613 ships the opinion which I still entertain; and it is some satisfaction to me to observe that the principle on which I rely is expressly asserted in the same judgment, and that the departure from it, which I cannot acquiesce in, is not necessary to the decision then made by the Court.

Upon the whole, therefore, my answer to this question is, that on the supposition made, the judgment below ought to be simply reversed.

MR. JUSTICE WILLIAMS.—As it so happens (singularly enough, it seems) that, upon the first question proposed, there is no difference of opinion, I shall trouble your Lordships very shortly in answer to it. I think that the payment of part of the money received by the collector for the year 1828 to the account or service of former years, was a clear breach of the condition of the bond. It seems to me that such application of the money differs in no respect from the payment by the collector of any other debt contracted at any other time and in any other manner.

(a) 9 Bing. 532; 2 M. & Scott, 700.

The answer to the second question must depend upon the true construction of the proviso in the 13th section of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99. That section, after declaring that collectors, if required, shall find good and sufficient security by bond, in the manner prescribed, has the following proviso: "That no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety or sureties for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this Act." In considering the true intent and meaning of this proviso, I pass by the

 * 614 * opposite inconveniences which have been pressed in argument, by observing that they may probably be considered as balancing each other. Our business, however, is with the construction of the statute; and, if that be ascertained, consequences are to be neglected. And the proper construction is, to give effect to the intention of the legislature as far as possible; and if there be provisions seemingly inconsistent, to reconcile them so as to further that intention. . This, I apprehend, is true generally, and will probably not be doubted. If, however, any authorities be requisite, they may be found in Comyns's Digest, Parliament (R. 10). Now, that the proviso was introduced expressly for the benefit of the surety seems to me to admit of no doubt; I can attribute to it no meaning or effect at all, except that be the object. The language seems to me to be perfectly plain and appropriate. The object also is quite consistent with the position of the surety, and his relation to the principal; because there is nothing in the bond in question, or in that relation, to raise an inference that the former should be liable except upon failure of the latter. This proviso also is introduced in a manner equally consistent with this view of the subject. In the earlier part of the section, the liability of the surety is described; and then comes the proviso imposing a restriction upon that liability. Except, therefore, the application of the lands and goods (if any) be deemed a condition precedent to calling upon the surety to make good "the deficiency," no effect is given to the proviso, and it might as well be expunged altogether. Either the proviso does impose this condition, or, in my opinion, it does nothing. I am desirous of bringing before your Lordships in as concise a form as possible what occurs to me upon this part of the subject: it has been *pursued more fully and in detail (if that should be *615 thought worthy of reference) on a former occasion. (a)

I have before observed that the words of the proviso seem to me plain and unambiguous: they are, "no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety or sureties for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, goods," &c., of the collector: that is, no bond shall be put in suit for the arrears of the collector, but only for the deficiency, if any, after his property has been applied, as in reason and justice it ought, to discharge those arrears, as far as it will go. The distinction seems to me to be obvious and plainly marked between the collector and the surety. By the 52d section, which contains the "directions and powers" alluded to in the proviso, the commissioners are authorized and empowered (not required) to make sale of the lands and goods of the collector. Against him, therefore, the bond may be put in suit before sale; for he is not within the benefit of the proviso; whereas that was framed expressly for the protection of the surety, and he (the latter), in my opinion, cannot be sued before sale made, if practicable.

When I before observed to your Lordships that the language of the proviso seemed to me to be free from doubt, I was not unmindful of the criticism which has been made upon the words "no such bond shall be put in suit," as if they were distinguishable and might have a different meaning from "no action shall be brought," or "no proceedings shall be had or taken." I am, however, unable to perceive any distinction, and cannot but think that, both in common parlance *and in legal *616 acceptation, the terms are identical, and have precisely the same meaning. That they would be so understood in a popular sense, I think is beyond a doubt; and that they ought to be so understood legally, I also think. I observe that Lord TENTERDEN, in Peppin v. Cooper, (b) where the question was upon this same Act of Parliament, uses two of the phrases in exactly the same sense. His Lordship, whose general precision and accuracy of expression are well known, observes: "I am clearly of opinion that the bond might be put in suit without selling the goods of Pepper, who, in this case, was a mere surety; for, although it appears on the face of the bond that he is a collector also, still he is not the collector contemplated by the Act, whose goods must be sold before proceedings are had upon the bond against the surety. And what is the distinction between 'proceedings had upon the bond' and 'action brought upon the bond?'" HOLROYD, J., says: "I also think that this bond may be put in suit against the surety, although it may happen that another person has been jointly appointed a collector, without first selling the lands and goods of that person; for the collector contemplated by the Act, whose goods are to be sold previously to the bond being put in suit, is the collector who has made default." Having mentioned this case with a view to the understanding of the expressions upon which I was commenting, I beg leave to observe that I would by no means press or strain any inference deducible therefrom. I am quite aware that it is no authority bearing upon the present case, nor any thing like it. The decision merely is, that whereas two

 * 617 collectors had been appointed, and one only had * made default, it was not necessary to sell the non-defaulting collector's lands and goods before having recourse to the surety. But it is, at the same time, undeniable that both the learned Judges do expressly allude (to say no more) to the sale of the defaulting collector's lands and goods as a condition precedent to resorting to the surety. This view of the subject seems to be in conformity to what was very early laid down upon it.

The third question I must beg leave to answer with some qualification; the reason for which I hope to make apparent, when, in answer to the next question, I shall have to consider the effect of the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea, the finding of the jury thereon, and the general result therefrom. If I am to suppose that the commissioners "had no knowledge," after due and reasonable diligence exerted by them to ascertain the fact, of the existence of lands and goods of the collector which they might have seized and sold, it seems to me that, under such circumstances, a good defence could not be made by the surety. If, however, the commissioners "had no knowledge," from the same cause that always occasions ignorance,— simply, not trying to learn, — I think there may be a good defence, from the fact of the possession of lands and goods by the collector, after his default and before action brought, even though the commissioners, upon the supposition last made, were ignorant of the existence of either. This is said upon an assumption at present (to be considered more fully presently) that neither from the statute, nor from any general rule of law, is the surety bound to give any notice, or furnish any knowledge (your Lordships, it seems, understanding the expressions to be equivalent) whatever to the commissioners of the existence of lands *or * 618 goods of the collector. I will endeavour to explain my meaning by reference to the pleadings themselves : — Suppose the fifth plea to have stood as it does, omitting the allegation of notice : if the replication, by appropriate allegations, had shown reasonable diligence in the commissioners to discover lands and goods of the collector, and that none could be found, it seems to me that such replication would have been an answer to the plea. If, on the other hand, the replication had merely stated that the commissioners had no notice or no knowledge of any lands or goods, it would, in my opinion, contain no answer at all, and would be bad on general demurrer.

The fourth question raises the points upon which so great a difference and variety of opinion unfortunately exist amongst the Judges ; and in our answer to this question, I adopt the supposition contained in it, viz., that issue has been joined upon the rejoinder, and that upon that issue there is a finding of the jury in the words stated in the question, and that finding is in its terms for the defendant below : whether it be so in substance, remains to be considered ; and, for this purpose, it may be necessary to advert to the course and state of the pleadings from the said fifth plea downwards.

That plea alleges, that before the exhibiting of the bill, the collector had lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners which might have been seized, &c., of which the plaintiffs had notice. The replication thereto is, that the collector had no lands of which the plaintiffs had notice, and that all the goods of which the plaintiffs had notice were seized and sold, and that, after such seizure, there were no goods, &c., of which the plaintiffs had notice, liable to be seized, &c. The rejoinder (dropping all mention *of notice) states, * 619 that after failure by the collector, he had lands which ought to have been seized and sold, and that all the goods, &c.,

It seems to me that our duty is to examine what and with whom the means of knowledge are, according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament itself. Now, so far as the surety is concerned, the statute, as might be expected, is silent as to the recommendation of caution or means of information; he is left to himself. With the commissioners, however, the case is otherwise. By the 9th section, they are to appoint assessors, who are to act upon oath, and moreover are to be charged and instructed by the commissioners in the requisites for discharging their duty. Further, by the same section, the assessors are to return two or more able and sufficient persons of the places for which the assessors act, to be collectors. It seems to be clear, therefore, that, in the due performance of their duty, the assessors are bound to inquire into the sufficiency of the persons returned, including, of course, their substance and property; and if the matter had rested here, it might perhaps have been not unreasonably considered as a statutory mode pointed out to the commissioners of ascertaining by deputed authority the means of the persons to be appointed. But the section goes further, and enacts that the persons so returned by the assessors are to be appointed by the commissioners; and as persons are presumed to do their duty (and particularly when acting upon oath, for the commissioners also are sworn), it must be taken as against them (the commissioners) that they became acquainted with the property of the persons about to be appointed, and of this collector, Bigg, amongst the rest; and this supposition and construction is the more probable and reasonable, because the collector is not required

* 623 by * the 13th section to find security at all events, but only if required by the commissioners. This, therefore, seems to imply that the commissioners ought to inquire in each case, or else how can they exercise a discretion as to requiring or dispensing with security in the case of each appointment? And why, then, is notice to be required from the surety to those who, by the very supposition of having done their duty, have acquired knowledge already?

I have mentioned at the outset that my answer to this question proceeds upon the supposition that there is an issue joined, and that, too, in the terms of the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea. I must, however, take leave to state to your Lordships that I entertain great doubt (to say no more) whether there be any issue joined at all; because there certainly is not an affirmation and denial of the same fact or facts in that replication and rejoinder, except, indeed, all that is alleged in the replication about notice can be considered as wholly without meaning, which it seems very difficult to say.

Upon the whole, it seems to me that this case is brought abundantly within both or either of the rules or conditions dispensing with the necessity of averring notice. When, therefore, I find that the rejoinder contains the same allegations which would have been sufficient to make the fifth plea good and a defence to the action, and that on the twelfth issue (in the terms stated in the question) raised upon the rejoinder, the finding is for the defendant below, my opinion is that the issue ought to be found for him. It is true that the jury do also find (in the manner stated) "that the commissioners had not notice." But it is to be observed, first, that this fact is not included in the issue, and next, that admitting the finding of such a * fact to be * 624 within the competence of the jury, it is not, without more (for the reasons, such as they are, already given at length, I fear, inconvenient to your Lordships), available for the plaintiffs below. This circumstance, therefore, does not affect the conclusion at which I have arrived, and which is as above stated.

To avoid repetition, I have endeavoured to bring together, in answer to the third and last questions, almost all that occurs to me upon the whole subject. And from those answers, it is obvious that my opinion is against a part of the suppositions contained in this (the fifth) question. Adopting, however, as I am bound to do, those suppositions, my answer is still in the negative: because, first, I do not think there is any such admission as that alluded to; and next, if there be, that the consequence would follow that judgment non obstante veredicto can be entered for the plaintiffs below. It surely cannot be carried to the extent of admitting no notice or knowledge, after due means used to obtain it. Differing, as I have the misfortune to do, from my brother LITTLEDALE upon the point of notice, I agree entirely with his observations upon this part of the case in the Court below. He is thus reported: (a) "The plaintiffs may contend that they are entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto, but there seems a great difficulty in saying that; for the rejoinder is not one which shows that the defendant has no defence on the whole case, which is the ground of entering a judgment for the plaintiff in such case. The finding of the jury that Bigg had lands, is not like an

 * 625 a defence ; and that * something else is imperfect and does form part of the issue which the jury ought to try, and if found one way would show there was a defence, but in the other way not."

If, as is certainly done continually, a venire de novo may be awarded by a Court of error, it seems difficult to assign any very good reason why it may not award a repleader. My learned brothers, however, have almost all expressed an opinion that it cannot be done. Lord HALE, in Bennet v. Holbech, (a) is reported to have said, after referring to many cases in which a repleader had been awarded, "that it is obsolete, and not in use at this day." The books of practice assume that it cannot be done ; and I cannot find any instance of the revival of the usage since the time of Lord HALE. I am not prepared to say, therefore, that a repleader can be awarded.

The latter part of the seventh question has been, in substance, answered by what I have already said upon the fifth ; viz., that the other pleas, or the issues found thereon, do not in my opinion contain a sufficient confession or afford sufficient proof whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiff upon the whole record. The earlier part involves in it the result of the whole inquiry, which is, in my opinion, that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed ; but, inasmuch as there does not appear to be any appropriate issue whereon to sustain the finding of the jury in favour of the defendant, which otherwise would have entitled him to it, I do not think that judgment can be pronounced for him.

MR. BARON GURNEY. — It appears by the special verdict,
 * 626 to which the first question refers, that A. B. * was duly appointed collector of the assessed taxes for the year 1828 ; and that the plaintiff in error duly entered into a bond with a condition for payment by A. B. to the Receiver-General of the taxes of all the sums collected and received by him, and which came to his hands as collector for the year 1828 ; but that he did not pay all those sums to the account or service of that year, but a part only, and the residue he paid to the account or service of former years for which he had been collector, — for which former years the party in this cause was not surety. The plain and necessary result from this statement is, that A. B. violated his duty, and that the bond is forfeited. The appointment is for the year 1828. The duty under that appointment is confined to that year. The bond is for the due performance of his duty for that year. It was his duty to apply the collection of that year to the account or service of that year. The application of any part of the money collected under the assessments of that year, to cover any deficiency in any former year, is just as much a breach of his duty, and a forfeiture of this bond, as if he had paid the money to any other creditor, or lost it at the gaming table. The suretyship was for the conduct of the collector in the year 1828, and no other. Neither the collector nor the surety was contemplated in any other character than as collector and surety for that year. The collector for the former year might have been different; the sureties for the former year were different; but these circumstances cannot make any difference in the consideration of this question.

The second and third questions are, whether this action can be maintained against the surety until the commissioners shall have sold the lands, goods, and chattels of the collector, within their jurisdiction; and * your Lordships have propounded * 627 questions to the Judges founded upon the different suppositions of the commissioners having and not having notice of that fact.

I am of opinion, that if the collector had lands, goods, and chattels within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, they could not put the bond in suit: and I do not think that their right of action is affected by their knowledge or their ignorance. The Statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, § 13, directs the security to be given by the collector, with the two sureties, by a joint and several bond; and directs that every such bond given by way of such security shall be prosecuted by the commissioners on any failure or default of the collector: "Provided always, that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this Act." If, therefore, the collector has lands, tenements, goods, or chattels, I think that the sale of them by the commissioners is a condition precedent. This proviso holds out to the persons who become sureties for collectors, that they shall not be resorted to until all the means of payment from the property of the collector shall have been exhausted. And if that be not fulfilled to the very letter, I think that the surety does not receive the security or advantage which is held out to him by this proviso.

I admit that this question of knowledge is not free from difficulty. It may be said that a fact of which the commissioners are ignorant, is the same as a fact that does not exist. The special verdict upon which these questions are founded, however, * 628 shows that the * ignorance of the commissioners in this instance arose from a want of due diligence, as the jury found that the collector had lands and goods, and that the commissioners had reasonable grounds for believing that he had. Another observation serves to show that knowledge or ignorance does not enter into this question. If knowledge be necessary, it must be, I apprehend, the knowledge of the two or three commissioners who are the obligees in the bond. The commissioners consist of a large number of persons: it may happen that these two or three persons may be utterly ignorant; whereas a hundred and fifty others may have entire and perfect knowledge. The Act of Parliament does not require that the knowledge shall be brought home to the obligees of the bond, nor even to the commissioners, or any of them; and I do not think that that can be superadded. It is the safer and the sounder construction of the Act, to consider this as an absolute condition precedent.

In discussing this point, it has been remarked that the 52d section, to which the proviso refers, does not make the proceeding by the commissioners against the collector compulsory; that it merely empowers the commissioners to proceed. I have given the fullest consideration to this argument; but it does not appear to me to be satisfactory. The 52d section empowers the commissioners to seize, and requires them to sell, the collector's property. The 13th section, I think, peremptorily requires that the commissioners shall exercise that power before they resort to the surety. It may be said that this construction of the statute may materially embarrass the commissioners in prosecuting the sureties of the collectors who are defaulters. Undoubtedly it may; but I

* 629 do not think that violence is to be done to the * express words of an Act of Parliament, for the purpose of relieving the commissioners from embarrassment. Another Act of Parliament may be passed which may be free from ambiguity. These cases of embarrassment, I fear, always arise from neglect of duty. If commissioners did their duty, collectors would not have the opportunity of committing such enormous embezzlements, and their sureties would escape the ruin with which they are sometimes overwhelmed. In the case of Peppin v. Cooper, (a) it was not necessary to decide this precise point, as the question there made was, whether or not the goods of another collector must be first sold. But that argument necessarily brought this proviso under the consideration of the Court; and Lord TENTERDEN, speaking of the collector, speaks of him as one "whose lands and goods must be sold before proceedings are had upon the bond against the surety."

The answer to the second and third questions includes the answer to this question,—that the issue ought to be found for the defendant.

The view which I have taken of the case renders it almost unnecessary for me to answer the remaining questions.

The answer to the fifth question is included in the answer to the fourth; and is, that judgment cannot be entered for the plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, on the implied confession in the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea, that the plaintiffs had no notice of the existence of the lands and goods in question.

I am of opinion that a repleader cannot be awarded by a Court of error. That is laid down by Lord *HALE, * 630 in Saunders. (b) One hundred and seventy years have elapsed since, and no instance of the award of a repleader under circumstances like the present, has occurred from that time to this.

I think that the judgment for the plaintiffs ought to be reversed.

MR. JUSTICE PATTESON.—In answer to the first question proposed by your Lordships, I am of opinion that the conduct of A. B., as therein described, was a breach of the condition of the bond therein mentioned. The words of the condition of that bond are, that he shall "well and truly pay, or cause to be paid unto the Receiver-General of the said taxes, rates, and duties, for the county of Middlesex, all such sum and sums of money as shall come to his hands as such collector, upon the days and at the times by the said Acts appointed for the payment thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of the said Acts." The intent and meaning of the said Acts, amongst other things, was, that the moneys collected in each year should be carried to the account of such year. Now, though A. B. paid to the Receiver-General all the moneys collected by him in the year in question, yet he did not pay the whole to the account of that year: he did not, therefore, pay the moneys according to the true intent and meaning of the Acts. He paid them in discharge of a debt which he owed in respect of the collection of former years, in violation of the intent and meaning of the Acts; whether with the consent of the Receiver-General or not, seems to be immaterial; and his conduct in so doing seems to me to be as much a breach of the condition of the bond as if he had applied the moneys to the payment of any other debt which he owed.

* 631 * To the second question proposed by your Lordships, I answer that, in my opinion, it is a defence to an action brought by the commissioners on the bond, that they did not, before suit, seize, and sell the lands and goods of A. B. of which they had knowledge. This is an action against a surety who has entered into a bond under the provisions of an Act of Parliament. 43 Geo. 3, c. 99. Before entering into that bond, he would naturally look at the Act, with a view to discover the nature of his engagement, the liabilities he was to incur, and the means of protection afforded him: he would construe the Act in the plain and obvious sense which its language imports: and surely he would have great reason to complain if a Court of Law, upon any question of his liability arising, should put a forced and technical construction on that language, to his prejudice. He finds that the Act, in the 13th section, directs the commissioners, in case of default in the collector, to prosecute, i.e., put in suit, the bond; provided always, "that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety or sureties for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this Act." Those directions and powers are contained in the 52d section of the Act, which authorizes and empowers (not requires) the commissioners, in case of default, to make sale in a summary manner of the collector's lands and goods, wheresoever the same can be discovered and found. The commissioners are not obliged to seize and sell the collector's property: they may put the bond in suit against him without doing so; for he is not within the proviso in the

lector's property, if they please, and may afterwards put the bond in suit against him ; and if they do so, it is plain that, as the bond comes within the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, § 8, they cannot recover more than what remains due after deducting the produce of the sale. Now, the proviso in the 13th section was obviously intended to put the surety in a better situation than the collector ; but if that proviso be not held to constitute a condition precedent, their situation will be precisely the same. And, indeed, it seems to me to be impossible to give any effect at all to that proviso, except by construing it as any unlearned man would do, viz., as a condition precedent. It has been suggested that the commissioners might exercise their powers under the 52d section, for the benefit of the surety, after enforcing the bond against him, and so give effect to the proviso. But, on examining again the words of the 52d section, it is clear to my mind that the commissioners could not be justified under it in making sale of the collector's property to satisfy a debt which had been already discharged by the surety, and, as far as the commissioners are concerned, altogether satisfied. That section empowers the commissioners to seize the collector's property, if he shall neglect to pay any sums received by him ; but they are not at once to sell ; they are to give ten days' public notice of a meeting ; and, in case the moneys be not paid and satisfied, they are required to sell, to satisfy, and pay into the hands of the Receiver-General the sums due, with costs and charges, and render the overplus to the owner of the property. It seems to me, that if the surety has paid the moneys due before any seizure of the collector's property, it cannot be said that the collector has neglected to pay, so as to authorize the commissioners to seize, within the meaning of that * section ; nor, again, * 633 if they could seize and hold a meeting with ten days' public notice, could it be said that the moneys due were not paid and satisfied, so as to require or empower them to sell ; nor, if they did sell, could they pay the moneys into the hands of the Receiver-General, he having already obtained the amount from the surety. The powers given by that section are, as I apprehend, primarily intended for the benefit of the commissioners in the exercise of their public duty ; and if they have no longer any public duty to perform, which they have not as soon as the moneys due are paid, they have no right to exercise those powers. The benefit to the surety from the exercise of those powers seems to be a secondary object, and arises only from the proviso contained in the 13th section. Without that proviso, the surety could have no right at any time to call for the exercise of those powers for his benefit; and, as the terms of that proviso plainly relate only to a sale antecedent to his being sued, I am at a loss to see by what construction of the Act he could call for the exercise of those powers after he had paid the money.

The third question proposed by your Lordships is one upon which I have entertained much doubt; but I have come to the conclusion that it is a defence to the action, that the commissioners did not seize and sell lands or goods of the collector, if any such existed, although they had no knowledge of their existence. No words can be found in the Act of Parliament which require any such knowledge; and there are provisions as to the appointment of collectors, by which the commissioners have the means of knowing whether they are able and sufficient persons. Those provisions, indeed, apply only to the time when the collectors are appointed, and do not give the commissioners * 634 sioners * any greater facilities for discovering the property of the collectors than any other person may have. It may be said that, if the mere existence of any such property, though unknown, and perhaps concealed, and therefore not seized and sold, were to defeat the remedy against the surety, it is obvious that much opportunity for collusion and fraud would be afforded, and all attempts to enforce the payment of moneys by the surety might be from time to time defeated, without any real neglect on the part of the commissioners; and that it is very reasonable to require that the party for whose benefit a seizure and sale are to take place, should give such information to the commissioners as will enable them to make such seizure, or at all events should not set up the want of such seizure as a defence, unless he can establish that the commissioners have been guilty of a culpable neglect in not making it. Every Act of Parliament, as well as any other document, must have a reasonable construction; and I apprehend that such construction ought to prevail as will effectuate the obvious intention of the legislature, provided no violence be done to the language which it has adopted. It may also be said that the very object and intention of the legislature in requiring that the collector should find sureties, will be frustrated if it be held that the existence of any unknown or concealed property of the collector will defeat the remedy against the surety; at the same time that the benefit intended for the surety may be amply preserved by requiring the seizure and sale of the known property of the collector as a condition precedent to his being sued for the moneys due. These reasons led me upon a former occasion (a) to entertain the opinion that knowledge of the existence * of such lands and goods was nec- * 635 essarily implied in the proviso which limits the power of suing the surety. I am, however, free to confess that, after further consideration of the Act of Parliament, I am not so sure of the intention of the legislature as to feel that I was warranted in entertaining that opinion; and, as it may be possible that, by putting such a construction upon the Act, I am altering or adding to it, instead of simply interpreting it, I feel myself bound to abide by the literal meaning of the words, and to hold that the existence of any unsold lands or goods which the commissioners might have seized and sold, is a bar to the action, whether they knew of them or not.

In answer to the fourth question proposed by your Lordships, I am of opinion that the issue raised by the rejoinder (if any issue at all be raised) ought, upon the finding of the jury, to be found for the defendant. In considering the effect of similar pleadings upon a former occasion, I came to the conclusion that the issue, though informal, involved the question of notice. I am free to confess that, upon further consideration, I think that I then came to a wrong conclusion. The replication here asserts that A. B. had no lands of which the plaintiffs had notice, that all the goods of A. B. of which the plaintiffs had notice were seized and sold, and that A. B. had no other goods of which the plaintiffs had notice. The rejoinder asserts that A. B. had lands which might have been sold, and that all the goods of A. B. which might have been discovered and sold were not seized and sold, and concludes to the country; and the plaintiffs add the similiter. Here is an assertion on the one side, and denial on the other: put the replication and rejoinder together, and the separate assertions of the plaintiffs and defendant will be found * jointly to amount to this, — that A. B. had lands and * 636 goods which might have been sold, but of which the plaintiffs had no notice. The plaintiffs have not denied the existence of lands and other goods besides those solid simpliciter, but only the existence of lands and other goods of which they had notice. The defendant has not asserted the existence of lands and other goods simpliciter, but only the existence of lands and other goods which might have been sold. The replication relates to lands and goods of A. B. in a particular condition or predicament: the rejoinder relates to lands and goods of A. B. in another and different condition or predicament. The more I consider the matter, the more satisfied I feel that no issue at all is raised by the rejoinder: neither an informal issue, which would be cured by verdict, nor an immaterial one, which cannot now be cured at all. But if any issue be raised, I think that it must be an issue in the words used by the defendant in his rejoinder, which concludes to the country, and which do not involve the question of notice: and if it be an issue in those words, it ought to be found for the defendant.

The fifth question proposed by your Lordships is one which, according to my view of it, is of very general importance as a question of pleading. It involves the consideration whether any pleading which concludes to the country (except, perhaps, the anomalous statutable plea of bankruptcy) contains any confession of the matters stated in the previous pleadings, and not denied. Here I take the issue (if any there be), as I have already stated, to be in the words of the rejoinder, and to be an immaterial issue, for want of involving the question of notice, — assuming always, as this question does, that notice is material. Still, as the

* 637 rejoinder concludes to the country, * and tenders an issue, it must be taken to traverse the whole or some part of the replication. Clearly it does not traverse the whole; it omits that part of the replication which relates to notice, and traverses the seizure and sale of all the lands and goods which might have been seized and sold. Now, the distinction between pleadings by way of traverse, and pleadings by way of confession and avoidance, is familiar to all lawyers; and it is the latter only upon which questions of this sort have hitherto arisen. One of the last cases on this subject is that of Gale v. Capern, (a) in which the defendant pleaded by way of set-off a promissory note alleged to have been made by the plaintiff to a third person, and by him indorsed to the defendant: the plaintiff replied that the said supposed debt on the said promissory note did not arise within six years. It was contended that this replication was no confession of the making and indorsing of the note; that it was not only a denial of its having been made and indorsed within six years, but a

denial that it was ever made and indorsed. The Court, however, held otherwise, and considered the replication as a pleading by way of confession and avoidance, and not by way of traverse. The replication there concluded, as it of necessity must, to the Court, because it introduced new matter. The case of Lambert v. Taylor (b) does not go to the same length; indeed, in the judgment there delivered by Lord TENTERDEN, it is admitted for the purposes of the cause that the plea of the Statute of Limitations, as generally pleaded, does not admit a cause of action. Unquestionably, for the purposes of trial, a traverse of one out of several allegations in the preceding *pleadings ad- * 638 mits the facts stated in the other allegations, and renders it unnecessary to adduce any evidence in support of them: and so far it is an implied confession of them: yet it seems to be only a confession sub modo, and not an absolute confession, as all pleadings are which go on to attempt an avoidance. I have always understood that judgment non obstante veredicto is only to be allowed in a very clear case, where the defence set up is good in form and true in fact, but insufficient in law, and so the pleadings show that the defendant has no defence upon the merits in any way of putting his case. Now, that is by no means the result where the plaintiff has averred some fact among others showing together a sufficient cause of action, but which fact, being separately traversed, turns out to be immaterial. In such a case, how can it be said that, if the traverse had been properly taken, the jury might not still have found for the defendant? For I am not now considering the effect of any special finding of the jury, but simply of their finding in the words of the issue. Besides which, there is in this case a good plea, containing an averment of notice, and that plea is not disproved in any material part of it; for the issue which arises out of it is by the hypothesis immaterial. Unless, therefore, the averment of notice be treated as struck out of that plea, and so the plea be rendered bad, the plaintiffs cannot have judgment non obstante veredicto. Now, the dropping of that averment in the rejoinder can at the most amount only to a departure in pleading, which makes the rejoinder bad; it cannot have the effect of striking out that averment from the plea itself. In a very recent case in the Court of Exchequer, the distinction between a judgment non ob- * 639 stante veredicto and a *repleader was much considered. I allude to the case of Plummer v. Lee, (a). That was an action of debt on an award, by an administratrix: the declaration stated, that, on the 12th July, 1833, a settlement of part of the accounts took place between the deceased and the defendant; it then stated a submission to arbitration by the plaintiff as administratrix and the defendant, and an award: the first plea traversed the making of an award; the second traversed that the settlement took place on the day mentioned in the declaration; the third traversed the making of such settlement at any time. On the trial, the plaintiff had a verdict on the first and third issues, the defendant on the second. After argument, and time taken to consider, the Court held that the second plea did not contain any confession, and that judgment non obstante veredicto could not be given, but awarded a repleader. This case appears to me to be a direct authority to show that the traverse of an immaterial allegation is not to be taken as an absolute confession of the other allegations, in any pleading.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the verdict cannot be entered for the plaintiffs on an implied confession in the rejoinder.

In answer to the sixth question, I am of opinion that a repleader ought to have been awarded, in the case stated, by the Court below. I think, however, that a Court of error cannot so award. Lord Chief Justice HALE expressly states that in his time the practice of awarding a repleader in the Court of King's Bench, upon error from the Common Pleas, was obsolete and not in use:

Bennet v. Holbech; (b) and so it has been laid down in * 640 our books of practice ever * since. Upon a writ of error, the parties are not before the Court upon a day given; and though a practice may have prevailed in ancient times for the Court of King's Bench to award a repleader, into which Court the record itself was always removed from other Courts on a writ of error, and became a record of the King's Bench, yet it does not appear that any such practice ever prevailed in the House of Lords; nor, I believe, is any instance known in which parties have pleaded before the House of Lords, or in which that House has ever issued jury process, or given any judgment except on a writ of error brought: yet such must be the consequence if a repleader be awarded in the case supposed by the sixth question; unless, indeed, the transcript of the record be remitted to the Court in which the original pleadings took place, with a direction that the parties should replead before that Court,—a course of proceeding for which no precedent, I believe, can be found.

(a) 2 M. & W. 495; 5 Dowl. Prac. Cas. 755.

(b) 2 Wms. Saund. 319 a.

The seventh question proposed by your Lordships raises a considerable difficulty. In answer to it, I am of opinion that, if there be but one issue on the record, and that be an immaterial issue of such a nature that the Court below ought to have awarded a repleader, but has in fact given judgment for one of the parties, a Court of error ought simply to reverse such judgment, without giving any judgment in favour of the other party. But where there are several pleas, some or one of which, or the issues found thereon, contain a sufficient confession, or afford sufficient proof, whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiff, whether the immaterial issue on the other plea shall thereby be aided, is a matter of some nicety. No authority can of course be found upon this subject in the older Reports, before the statute of Anne, which introduced *several *641 pleas. 4 Anne, c. 16. Nor have I been able to find any direct authority since that time, except the case of Goodburne v. Bowman. (a) In that case, the rule, “that, in considering the merit or demerit of one plea, recourse cannot be had to another, unless expressly referred to,” is fully recognized; but it is said that an application to enter judgment non obstante veredicto is founded upon the whole record, and therefore that all the pleas may be taken into consideration. With the greatest respect for that Court, I must confess that I have great doubts as to the soundness of the view there taken as to the effect of several pleas. It seems to me to be essential to the due course of pleading, and to avoid confusion, that no blending of pleas should in any instance be permitted, and that whatever may be the number of pleas placed upon the record, each plea should be treated, both in itself and in its consequences, as if it were the only plea on the record. It is to be observed, that in that case the Court intimated an opinion that the pleas respectively did contain a sufficient confession; and therefore what was said as to the finding on the plea of not guilty being received in aid of any supposed defect in the other pleas, was in some measure extrajudicial, though entitled to the highest respect. The present case, however, is distinguishable from Goodburne v. Bowman, inasmuch as in that case the pleas themselves out of which the immaterial issues arose were held bad ; but here the plea out of which the immaterial issue arose is good, and therefore, even if the finding on that issue be disregarded, still the plaintiffs cannot have judgment ; for the good plea not disproved still remains a good

* 642 bar to the action. The case of Goodburne * v. Bowman came under consideration in the Court of Exchequer in the case of Plummer v. Lee, (a) which I have already cited ; but a distinction was taken between them, inasmuch as in the latter case no one of the pleas concluded to the Court, and no one contained an absolute confession. In that case, the immaterial traverse was of an allegation in the declaration : and even supposing that the Court might under those circumstances have entirely disregarded the finding on that issue, — not so as to have aided that immaterial issue by the allegations in the other pleas, but treating it as if no such traverse had been taken, — yet, in the present case, that course cannot be pursued ; because, to disregard the immaterial issue would be also to disregard the plea out of which it arises, which is an affirmative plea, and contains a good answer to the action, and has not been disproved in any material part of it.

My answer, therefore, is, that upon these pleadings judgment cannot be given for the plaintiffs, disregarding the immaterial issue ; neither can judgment be given for the defendant ; but the judgment of the Court below must simply be reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BOSANQUET. — I am of opinion that the conduct of Richard Bigg amounted to a breach of the condition of the bond. Payment of the money collected in 1828 to the account of former years was as much a breach of duty as payment to one of the creditors.

I think that neglect of the commissioners to seize and sell lands and goods of A. B., of which they had knowledge, * 643 before action brought, is a defence to such * action. It appears to me that the proviso, which is introduced for the benefit of the surety, makes such seizure and sale a condition precedent to putting the bond in suit, where the commissioners have knowledge of the existence of such lands and goods.

But I think that, unless the commissioners had such knowledge before the commencement of the action, the existence of such lands and goods within their jurisdiction is not a defence ; for the proviso must receive a reasonable construction. The 13th section of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, directs the commissioners to prosecute if the collector makes default ; which direction is followed by a proviso that the bond shall not be put in suit for any deficiency other than what shall remain after sale of the lands and goods of the defaulter. But if the commissioners had no knowledge of such lands or goods, they are bound by the directions of the statute to prosecute. The legislature cannot with reason be supposed to have intended that the commissioners should delay the commencement of a prosecution against the sureties until they should have ascertained by all possible means whether or not the collector is possessed of any lands or goods : and that if, after such suit commenced, any the smallest portion of property should be discovered, a suit honestly commenced, pursuant to the direction of the statute, should be defeated by a plea of the existence of such minute amount of property within their jurisdiction. Possibly, if the existence of property were communicated to the commissioners after action brought, proceedings against the surety might be stayed until the property had been sold, and the deficiency ascertained ; but, whatever might be the effect of an application for a stay of proceedings, the question now is, whether the proviso creates an unqualified condition * precedent, or only a condition quali- * 644 fied by knowledge of the commissioners. And I cannot think that it was intended, by the introduction of this proviso, to render it impossible for the commissioners, with any safety, to comply with the directions to prosecute.

It has been suggested, as an objection to this construction, that if, by notice to the commissioners, is meant notice to all the commissioners, it would be next to impossible to comply with such condition, considering the great number of persons who fill that character ; and that, if notice to less than all be sufficient, a notice to one who may have no knowledge of the bond would be sufficient to defeat an action duly commenced by the obligees. But in putting what I think a necessary limitation on the words of the statute, to prevent unreasonable consequences, I do not feel myself driven to adopt a condition the compliance with which would be either impracticable or nugatory. The commissioners are directed to appoint a clerk : and any two commissioners may act. There can be no doubt that notice to such clerk would be sufficient ; so, likewise, would notice to the obligees on the bond, or to either of them, or to either of the commissioners who direct the bond to be put in suit in the name of the obligees. But I neither think that notice to all the commissioners is necessary, nor that notice to a person who, though a commissioner, does not act as such, would be sufficient to constitute a defence. The notice, of which the necessity is brought into question upon the pleadings in this case, is a notice to the plaintiffs, the obligees in the bond, previous to the commencement of the action. And I think that whatever would amount to notice to them, would be sufficient: but nothing else.

* 645 I think that the issue joined on the fifth plea ought * to be found for the defendant. The issue tendered by him, viz., that there were lands and goods of A. B. within the jurisdiction, has been found in his favour. The notice, which is negatived by the finding, forms no part of the issue; nor the allegation that the commissioners could and ought to have sold, which is an inference of law.

Supposing the verdict to be entered for the defendant on the said issue, and supposing it is not a defence to the action that the lands and goods of A. B. were not sold by the commissioners, unless they had notice (meaning knowledge) of their existence, still I think that the judgment cannot be entered for the plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, on an implied confession in the rejoinder, that, if there were lands and goods, the commissioners had no notice of their existence. The plea alleges that A. B. was possessed of divers lands and goods, of which the plaintiffs had notice, and which might have been seized and sold, but which lands and goods then continued unsold. The replication avers that there were no lands which the commissioners could seize and sell of which they had notice, and that they had seized and sold all the goods and chattels of which they had notice. It admits the existence of some property, and that the commissioners had notice of it; but insists upon the sale of all the property of which they had notice. Notice of unsold property is, therefore, alleged on the one side, and the want of notice of any property unsold is asserted on the other. The frame of the replication clearly invited the defendant to take issue in the terms of it, by which the sale of all the property known to the commissioners would have been denied. But the defendant, by his rejoinder, avoided such denial, departed from the good defence set up by his

ertheless, I cannot say that, by omitting to reassert in his rejoinder the notice which he had alleged in his plea, he has so confessed the want of notice as to authorize a judgment against him, founded on such a confession. In Staples v. Heydon, (a) Lord Chief Justice HOLT took this difference,—that “where the defendant confesses a trespass, and avoids it by such matter as can never be made good by any sort of plea, there, in such a case, judgment shall be given upon the confession, without regard to such an immaterial issue: but where the matter of the justification is such a matter as if it were well pleaded would be a good justification, there, though it be ill pleaded, yet that shall not be taken to be a confession of the plaintiff’s action:” and he added, “The books do all of them, if they be narrowly looked into, turn upon this difference, where the confession is full, and the matter of the plea is ill in substance.”

But though judgment non obstante veredicto cannot be given upon an implied confession in this plea of want of notice, it does by no means follow that a repleader ought in such a case as this to be awarded. If the fault of the rejoinder had consisted in a defective mode of pleading the matter relied on, some ground might be afforded for a repleader, supposing that proceeding could be awarded after a writ of error. But here the ground taken for the defence in the rejoinder is defective upon the merits, and cannot by any pleading be made available. The defendant having studiously declined to insist upon the notice mentioned in the plea, and chosen to put * his defence upon the mere * 647 existence of lands and goods within the jurisdiction, could not make that defence good by any sort of amendment. His omission to include in his traverse the want of notice was no mistake or mere error in form. A judgment non obstante veredicto is always upon the merits; a repleader, upon the form or manner of pleading. Tidd’s Practice, 9th edit. 922. But whether a repleader ought or ought not to have been awarded in the Court below, it cannot, I apprehend, be awarded by a Court of error, according to the express authority of Lord HALE in Bennet v. Holbech; (b) and even if it could, I am of opinion that it ought not to be awarded in this case, since it could have no other effect but that of enabling the defendant to set up some new defence.

The seventh question involves two inquiries: first, whether the pleas and issues contain a sufficient confession whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiffs, disregarding the immaterial issue; secondly, whether they afford sufficient proof to found such judgment.

(b) 2 Wms. Saund. 819 a; 2 Lev. 11.

I have already stated my opinion, in answer to the fifth question, that the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea does not contain a sufficient confession of want of notice of unsold property to authorize such a judgment. But, although want of notice be not confessed, still it appears to me that by the same rejoinder the plaintiffs' cause of action is confessed; and, consequently, that if it be not sufficiently answered (which, for the reasons already given, I think it is not), the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The ground of the plaintiffs' right to recover is, the breach by Richard Bigg of the condition of the bond, in

* 648 * neglecting to pay to the Receiver-General the sums collected for taxes. The declaration, as usual, states a money

bond payable to the plaintiffs on request, in the terms of the instrument. Oyer of the condition having been had, but no breach then assigned, the defendant, in his second plea, pleads performance generally; and then, in his fifth plea, sets up as a defence to any right to recover on the bond, that Richard Bigg faithfully collected all sums of money from every person charged, and in every case, long before the commencement of the action, and from thence continually hitherto, was possessed of lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners of which the plaintiffs had notice, and which might have been sold, but which were unsold. This appears to me to have been a good plea. The plaintiffs having before, in their replication to the plea of performance, assigned non-payment to the Receiver-General as a breach of the condition, proceed in their replication to the fifth plea to allege, in answer thereto, that, after Richard Bigg had collected, and after he had neglected to pay to the Receiver-General, as in their replication to the second plea mentioned, Richard Bigg had no lands which they could sell of which they had notice, and that all the goods of which they had notice were sold. The effect of this allegation is, that the condition of the bond had been broken, and that there were no lands or goods of Richard Bigg which the commissioners were bound to sell after the breach of the bond had been committed. The defendant, in his rejoinder to this replication, does not merely omit to traverse the neglect to pay to the Receiver-General, but expressly says, that, after the supposed collection and receipt of the money, and after the supposed omission and neglect to pay the Receiver-General,

* Richard Bigg had lands and goods within the jurisdiction, which might have been sold; thereby admitting, as it appears to me, that the condition of the bond had been broken by such non-payment to the Receiver-General, and relying on matter insufficient to excuse the defendant from responsibility upon the bond. He that excuses a non-performance, supposes it. Meredith v. Alleyn. (a) * 649

If this view of the pleadings be correct, then the plaintiffs will be entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto upon the confession in the rejoinder of the plaintiffs' cause of action, notwithstanding the verdict on the immaterial issue. Had the matter of this rejoinder been originally pleaded as a defence, instead of the fifth plea (supposing such defence to be insufficient in substance), the plaintiffs would, I apprehend, be entitled to judgment, notwithstanding the verdict found upon the issue tendered by it, on the ground of the confession of the cause of action which it contains. And, if that be so, I can see no reason why the existence upon the record of the plea which has been departed from and abandoned as the ground of defence, should deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of this confession.

If the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea does not contain such a confession of the plaintiffs' cause of action as to entitle them to judgment thereon, I am not aware of any pleading on this record by which it is more distinctly confessed. Supposing, therefore, that no such confession appears, the remaining question will be, whether, notwithstanding the verdict found for the defendant upon the immaterial issue tendered by this rejoinder, the plaintiffs are not * entitled to judgment upon * 650 the rest of the record. Before the statute of Anne, which allowed defendants to plead several pleas, a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto could only be founded on the confession contained in the same plea on which the issue arose. "If," as Lord Chief Justice TINDAL says, in Goodburne v. Bowman, (b) "such plea did not contain a confession, there was no part of the record by which the deficiency could be supplied." If, however, several defences are pleaded, one of which is wholly insufficient and incapable by amendment of being made a good defence, and upon which, therefore, no repleader ought to be awarded; and other defences are well pleaded, upon which material issues are joined and found for the plaintiffs; I do not see any good reason why the plaintiffs should not be allowed to take advantage of the finding upon those issues, in the same manner as they might do if the ineffectual defence had not appeared upon the record. In Goodburne v. Bowman, the Lord Chief Justice further says: "In the present case, there is a verdict on the general issue, which finds that the defendant did publish the libels. And although, in considering the merit or demerit of any individual plea, recourse cannot be had to another unless expressly referred to by such plea; yet, as the application to enter a verdict is founded on the whole record, by which it appears that the defendants have committed the grievance complained of, and have not shown any sufficient justification, it may be considered in that point of view, that there is enough to warrant the application." In that case, indeed, the Court thought that the special pleas did

(b) 2 M. & Scott, 713.

 * 651 sufficiently confess the action, but * did not sufficiently avoid it; but if the principle above mentioned be correct, the plaintiff may avail himself of a finding by the jury, as well as of a confession of the defendant, notwithstanding a verdict for the defendant upon an immaterial issue; provided a repleader ought not to be awarded; and it must be observed that the Lord Chief Justice took care to show that the defendants were not in that case entitled to a repleader.

Then how does this case stand upon the record? The plaintiffs declare upon a bond: oyer is demanded of the condition: the execution of the bond is denied by the defendant, and found for the plaintiffs. Then performance of the condition is pleaded, to which the plaintiffs reply a breach, by non-payment of money to the Receiver-General. The defendant in his rejoinder alleges payment; on which an issue (the ninth) is joined, and found for the plaintiffs to a certain amount, viz., 693*l*. Fraud and covin in obtaining the bond are pleaded, which are negatived by the jury. Two other pleas are demurred to, upon which judgment is given for the plaintiffs. No material issue either in law or fact has been found for the defendant. But an immaterial issue is found for the defendant, arising upon a rejoinder which is defective, not merely in form, but in showing any answer to the plaintiffs' right of action, capable of being made good by any amendment in form. If this pleading had not been brought upon the record, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to judgment. Upon what principle, then, are they to be deprived of the benefit of all that has been established in their favour, in consequence of a proceeding which is wholly ineffectual, entitling neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant to judgment? And why may not such * a proceeding be disregarded as altogether nugatory? * 652 Authority upon the subject is not to be looked for in the older books, since no such case can have arisen before the statute of Anne, already referred to. The only modern case upon the point of which I am aware is that of Goodburne v. Bowman, the principle to be collected from which is, that, where a verdict is found upon an immaterial issue in a case which does not authorize the award of a repleader, and the whole cause of action is confessed or proved upon some other plea or pleas on the same record, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. This case was adverted to in Plummer v. Lee; (a) and though the principle is said to have been suggested in Goodburne v. Bowman for the first time, the justice of it is not controverted, but the case is distinguished from that before the Court, on the ground that in the latter no plea contained a confession of any part of the cause of action, and there was no issue (found) upon any plea establishing the truth of the whole of it: and a repleader was awarded. The principle promulgated in Goodburne v. Bowman appears to me to be consistent with reason and justice.

The award of a venire de novo to try the immaterial issue would be wholly useless; and as this is not a case for a repleader, I humbly offer my opinion to your Lordships, though certainly not without hesitation, in consideration of the novelty of the case, and in deference to the opinions entertained I believe by my learned brothers, that judgment may be entered for the plaintiffs upon the whole record, on the ground that the issues found thereon contain sufficient proof whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiffs, disregarding the immaterial issue.

* MR. BARON PARKE. — My answer to the first question * 653 proposed by your Lordships is, that in the case suggested the conduct of A. B. was a breach of the condition of the bond, by which he was “well and truly” to pay to the Receiver-General all the sums of money collected by him, according to the true intent and meaning of the Statutes 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, and 3 Geo. 4, c. 88.

It seems to me that this condition is to be construed precisely in the same way as if another person had been collector for a former year, the appointment being annual; and it could not admit of the least doubt but that it would have been a breach of such a condition if the money received, instead of having been paid to the Receiver-General to the account of the year for the year for which it was received, had been lent to a former collector, to enable him to pay his arrears, although that collector had really so applied it. The question is precisely the same, so far as relates to the breach of the condition of the bond; and the payment to the account of a wrong year is in effect an appropriation by A. B. to the payment of his own debt; though certainly the damage is not the same, from the circumstance of this debt being due to the public, as if he had applied it to the payment of a private debt of his own. It makes, however, a most material difference to the parishioners, who are a fluctuating body, whether the collections of each year are paid to the account of that year or to that of a former year, for which the same person has acted as collector. In the latter case suspicion is lulled, and no inquiry made until the sureties of the former year, or the collector himself, are dead or insolvent; and the inhabitants of the parish are rendered liable for the arrears due from their predecessors, and have the amount levied upon them,—an evil

* 654 which might * have been avoided if each year's collection had been duly paid, as it ought to have been, to the account of that year.

In answer to the second question proposed to her Majesty's Judges, I have humbly to state the same opinion which I did in the Court below: that it is no defence to the action on the bond that the defaulter had lands and goods within the district, and that the commissioners had knowledge of their existence before the action brought, and did not before suit seize and sell them. This question depends entirely on the proper construction to be put on the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, § 13, coupled with other provisions of that statute.

The 13th section of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, enacts that security shall be given by collectors by bond, with sureties, if required by the commissioners, and that "every such bond given by way of such security as aforesaid shall be prosecuted by such commissioners, on any failure or default by the collector:" provided always that "no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands and goods of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this Act." These directions and powers are contained in section 52 by which, in case of default by a collector in paying the money received by him, the respective commissioners, or any two of them, in their respective jurisdictions, are empowered and authorised (not required) to imprison his person, and seize and secure the estate, both real and personal, belonging to him, or which shall descend or come to the hands or possession of his heirs, executors, or administrators, wheresoever the same can be discovered and found; and the commissioners * who shall seize and secure the estate shall appoint * 655 a time for a meeting of all the commissioners, who are empowered and required to sell and dispose of the collector's estate, to satisfy the arrears and costs, if the collector does not pay.

These being the material provisions of the statute, it seems to me — first, that according to their true construction, it is discretionary in the commissioners whether they will seize or not; and that if they do not choose to seize, they may put the bond in suit; and that the proviso does not operate unless they do seize — and, secondly, that if the proviso be obligatory on the commissioners in all cases, it does not constitute a condition precedent, but is directory only.

The 52d section, of which I have stated the substance, appears to me to leave it clearly in the discretion of the commissioners whether they will seize the estate or not: they have the power of determining whether it is worth while, considering the nature of the property, its probable value, and the difficulty and expense of obtaining and converting it, to put in force the power of seizure. The proviso, therefore, in the 13th section, which expressly refers to the directions and powers in the 52d section, and which are discretionary, ought to be read just as if the former section had provided that the bond should not be put in suit for any deficiency other than such as remained after sale of the estate, real and personal, pursuant to the discretionary power vested in the commissioners by the 52d section; that is, "if the commissioners should think fit, in their discretion, to seize the estate, real and personal." If this is not done, this consequence will follow, — that the commissioners, who have a discretion by the 52d section, and that, no doubt, for the benefit of the parish at * large, and the public, and all persons interested, to seize * 656 or not, are yet compellable to do so, under the penalty of not being able to sue on the bond for the deficiency if they do not: so that, if they in their discretion think the public interest and the interests of all best consulted by not incurring the expense of a seizure of property of no value, the public must suffer by losing the remedy on the bond against the sureties; for it is in truth their loss. If the commissioners took this bond and were acting for their own benefit, there might be some reason for saying that, if they did not choose first to take the estate of the principal, they should not sue the surety; but if they act, as they do, not for themselves but for the public, it appears to be impossible to preserve the discretion given by the 52d section, without qualifying the 13th section, and making the proviso therein a contingent direction or order not to sue, if the discretion should be exercised, until the sale should have been completed. I am therefore of opinion that this proviso in the 13th section has no operation, unless the commissioners choose to seize under the powers of the 52d section.

But if this construction be not correct, and the proviso is obligatory on the commissioner in all cases, then arises the other question,—is the compliance with the enactment a condition precedent, and the non-compliance a bar to the action? I must say that I am of opinion that it is not. In the first place, the language of the proviso is, not that no action shall lie or be maintained on the bond, but it comes by way of qualification on the former part of the clause, which commands the commissioners to prosecute the bond on any failure or default. It is, there-
 * 657 fore, a command to them not to put the bond in suit * in the particular case contemplated by the proviso; but it is no more. Had the legislature intended to make the non-compliance with this regulation an absolute bar, I cannot help thinking they would have used different language. But it is not on the use of the precise expression that I place so much reliance, as on the consideration of the consequences to which the construction contended for would lead. If we construe the words literally, and say therefore that no action is maintainable unless they seize and sell the lands and goods of the defaulter, whether they have knowledge, or by reasonable inquiry could obtain the knowledge of them or not, no action could be safely brought; and the public, whose suit it is, would be defeated of their remedy by proof of the collector having any interest whatsoever, in possession or reversion, however remote, in lands, or any goods, however small in value (and there is none, however poor, who has not some), in any place within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, or even without it; for it may be made a question whether, under the 52d section, their power does not extend to lands and goods anywhere. This construction would operate practically to defeat the remedy on the bond altogether. The consequences, therefore, to which such a construction would lead, at all events would require some implied exception in the provision of the statute; and it is, I understand, conceded by many of my learned brethren that it cannot be a condition precedent in all cases. If the commissioners have notice or knowledge of the existence of such lands or goods, it is said that the sale must be a condition precedent; otherwise not: but if so, can we say that, if they could with reasonable diligence ascertain their existence, the sale should not in that * case also be a con- * 658 dition precedent? There is a difficulty in drawing a distinction between the two cases; and much difficulty also in determining the fact of knowledge or of the power to ascertain the existence of lands or goods. Is such knowledge or power of one of the commissioners (a somewhat numerous body) to be sufficient? These inconveniences and difficulties, coupled with the want of a direct and positive enactment that the sale shall be a condition precedent, induce me to think that the proviso (if not discretionary, of which I have said enough) was directory only to the commissioners who act, to take all proper steps in the first instance. It does not follow, because it is directory, that it is not obligatory: and I conceive that, for the non-compliance with that proviso, there would be a remedy either at law or in equity; though the want of such remedy would not, as it seems to me, necessarily prevent the clause from being construed to be directory.

For these reasons, I cannot help thinking that the legislature did not intend the proviso in question to be a condition precedent, and that the existence of lands or goods unsold should, under any circumstances, be a bar to the action.

My answer to the second question which your Lordships have proposed includes an answer to the third. For the reasons I have given before, I think that it is no defence to an action on the bond that the commissioners did not seize and sell lands or goods of the defaulter, of the existence of which they had no knowledge, before the commencement of the suit.

To the fourth of your Lordships' questions, my answer is, that, in the case supposed, the verdict ought to be entered, on the issue raised by the rejoinder, for the defendant.

* 659 * The plea (the fifth) is, in substance (in as far as it is material to state it), that the collector performed so much of the condition of the bond as relates to the receiving all the moneys assessed from the persons liable ; and, as to his deficiency in accounting for what he received, that he was possessed of and entitled to divers lands and goods as of his own property, within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which the plaintiffs had notice, and which lands and goods still remain unsold. The replication to this plea is, that the collector, after this breach of the condition, had no lands within their jurisdiction which the commissioners could seize and sell, of which they had notice. The rejoinder drops all mention of the notice, and simply avers that there were lands which the commissioners could and might have seized and sold ; and concludes to the country ; and the plaintiffs add the similiter. I think this issue was, for reasons I shall afterwards give, wholly immaterial, or rather, in reality, no issue at all ; and if a Court of error had a power to award a repleader, it ought to award it. But I think the jury ought, upon the fact found, which is, that there were lands which the commissioners could have seized and sold, to have found for the defendant ; for that is the averment he makes in tendering the issue.

But supposing the verdict to be so entered, then, upon the supposition contained in your Lordships' fifth question, I am of opinion that this was an immaterial issue, upon which a repleader ought to have been awarded (confining my opinion at present to the question on the fifth plea, and the pleadings arising out of it), if the Court of error had power to do so ; but that judgment non obstante veredicto cannot be entered for the plaintiffs.

* 660 * The principle upon which such a judgment proceeds as against a defendant, is, that he has confessed the plaintiff's action, and avoided it by matter which is in substance no answer to the plaintiff's action ; and in such a case, although the issue raised upon that matter has been found for the defendant, yet the Court gives judgment for the plaintiff as upon a confession. There are four descriptions of judgments for a plaintiff, — on verdict, demurrer, nil dicit, and confession : Rex v. Phillips ; (a) and this belongs to the last, and is classed under that head ; and all the cases in the books which I have been able to find are founded on that principle. Thus, in the form referred to by my brother COLTMAN [14 Viner's Abridgment, Judgment

(D), pl. 1], the judgment proceeds upon the confession in the plea of the matters in the declaration, and want of sufficient matter in bar. The same in Carthew, and other authorities. (a) The cases of Lacy v. Reynolds, (b) Rex v. Phillips, (c) Drayton v. Dale, (d) Earl of Lonsdale v. Nelson, (e) Lambert v. Taylor, (g) Clears v. Stevens, (h) Lewis v. Clement, (i) and Rickards v. Bennett (k), are all cases of judgments on pleas in confession and avoidance bad in substance; for, if bad in form merely, such a judgment will not be given: Staple v. Haydon. (l) And, after a very diligent search, I have not been able to discover a single case of this species of judgment on any other pleas than those which are technically in confession and avoidance.

* It is said that, if a plea traverses one out of several * 661 matters alleged in the declaration, it confesses the remainder to be true; and in like manner the rejoinder confesses such part of the replication as it does not deny. But I do not think it confesses the remainder in the sense which is required to found such a judgment: Hudson v. Jones. (m). That which is traversable, and not traversed, may be said no doubt to be admitted for some purpose; that is, it cannot be made a matter in dispute on the trial; and if it were taken by protestation under the form of pleading, before the new rules, the matter would have been equally put out of the issue; but there would have been great difficulty in maintaining that this was a confession for the purpose of giving the plaintiff judgment. The effect of a traverse of one fact out of many is merely this,—that the party pleading rests his defence on a denial of that fact only; but if the decision of it in favour of the defendant turns out to be immaterial, I conceive the Court cannot give judgment as on a confession of the other facts. I am fortified in this opinion, not merely by the absence of any authority to warrant such a judgment, but by some cases of a similar nature, in which the Courts have decided that a repleader ought to be awarded. For if the position be true that a defendant confesses that fact in a declaration or replication which he does not deny, it must be equally true of a plaintiff denying one matter which is immaterial, out of several matters in a good plea ; and yet, in a case like this, Lord HOLT says, in Pitts v. Polehampton, (a) there must be a repleader. In Serjeant v.

Fairfax, (b) or Serjeant v. Madox, (c) which was an action
 * 662 of debt for rent against the assignee of the * lessee (as it seems from the latter report), the plea was, that the defendant assigned over to a stranger, with the consent of the plaintiff ; and the issue was on the consent ; and, after verdict, whether for the plaintiff or defendant is uncertain, a repleader was awarded. The case is reported several times in Keble, and this appears to be the result ; but I must own that no great weight ought to be attached to this authority, from the inaccurate mode in which it appears to have been reported. In a recent case in the Exchequer — Plummer v. Lee (d) — the Court decided that, where the defendant traversed an immaterial averment, there could not be judgment non obstante veredicto, but that there must be a repleader.

For these reasons, I cannot help thinking that, if the replication in this case had averred two distinct facts, and the rejoinder had traversed one which was immaterial, and was found for the defendant, it would not have admitted the other, so as to warrant a judgment non obstante veredicto. But even if it were so, the doctrine would not apply to such a case as this ; for here, in truth, the issue is immaterial, — one on which no judgment can be given ; not because an immaterial fact is traversed, but because there is in reality no issue at all, — no affirmance on one side of the same proposition which is denied by the other ; and the case belongs to a numerous class of immaterial issues which are to be found in the books, where issue is taken by one party on that which is not alleged by the other. I would instance the case of Enys v. Mohun, (e) which was an action against the assignee of a lease, to whom the estate of a lessee had come by assignment, and the plea was that the lessee did not assign to the
 * 663 * defendant ; and, after issue joined, a repleader was awarded, it being an issue joined on what was not alleged in the declaration : and the cases in Gilbert's C. P. 48, Sandback v. Turvey, (g) and Walker v. Brook, (h) all afford instances of the same kind. In the present case, the replication is, that the collector had not any lands of which the commissioners had notice; which pleading is bad on special demurrer, as being a negative pregnant; that is, an issue that rather supposes an affirmative than the contrary; but good after verdict. Gilb. C. P. 153. If the replication had been proper, it should either have denied that there were lands, or admitted that there were, and averred that the commissioners had no notice of them; but this informal replication does not deny that there were lands, nor does it admit that there were; but it means in effect this, — either that there were no lands, or, if there were, that the commissioners had no notice of them. The rejoinder contains no answer to this proposition, but avers simply that there were lands, — a fact that was never denied by the plaintiffs; and on this ground I am satisfied that this is a purely immaterial issue (more properly, no issue at all), which is not cured by verdict, upon which no judgment can be given, and for which, in the Court below, a repleader ought to have been awarded.

In answer to the sixth question proposed by your Lordships, I have to state that, in my opinion, it is not competent for a Court of error to award a repleader. Upon this point we have the express authority of Lord HALE, — Holbech v. Bennet, (a) — who said that that course had then been disused more than one hundred years, and could no longer be practised. To

* the same effect is Crosse v. Bilston; (b) and I believe no * 664 instance can be found in recent times of such a proceeding.

The reason for this probably is, that the authority given by the writ of error is confined to giving judgment, whether of reversal, affirmance, or venire de novo, on the existing record; and that the parties are not before them to replead. They have no day in Court, and are not necessarily present when the judgment is pronounced. The defendant in error has the means of compelling the plaintiff in error to assign errors, by scire facias quare executionem non; and the plaintiff in error may oblige the defendant to appear and join in error, by scire facias ad audiendum errores; or the defendant may come freely; but, this done, the record in error does not usually state the presence of both parties when judgment is given; and judgment may certainly be affirmed in the absence of the defendant, as is stated by POWELL, J. in Staple v. Haydon. (c) Be this as it may, there is no doubt but a Court of error does not now possess that power. If a Court of error could award a repleader, I think it ought to do so in this case.

(c) 6 Mod. 9.

I think the answer to the seventh question proposed by your Lordships ought to be, that the judgment should be for the plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, on the ground that the fifth plea confessed the right of action on the bond, and did not avoid the same by sufficient matter; that is, that the judgment should be affirmed. But if I am wrong in supposing that the sale of the lands was not a condition precedent, then I am of opinion that the judgment for the plaintiffs below ought to be reversed simply;

and they must begin de novo. I do not think that any aid
 * 665 can * be lawfully derived from the other pleadings in this case, though I am not prepared to say that it may not in some cases. It was said in Goodburne v. Bowman, (a) and very truly, that, "most of the cases in which the question respecting a repleader has been considered, were before the statute of Anne, when only one plea could be put upon the record;" and that, "if such plea did not contain a confession, there was no part of the record by which the deficiency could be supplied." The Lord Chief Justice proceeds to state, that, in that case, there was "a verdict upon the general issue;" and that, although, in considering the merit or demerit of any individual plea, recourse cannot be had to another, unless expressly referred to by such plea, yet, as the application to enter the verdict is founded upon the whole record, upon which it appears that the defendants have committed the grievance complained of, and have not shown any sufficient justification, it may be considered, that, in that point of view, there is enough to warrant the application,"—for judgment non obstante veredicto,—and that "no rule is better established than this, that the Court will not grant a repleader, except where complete justice cannot be answered without it;" and he cites Symmers v. The King (b) as an authority.

This doctrine so laid down by the Chief Justice is, I believe, new. At first, I felt considerable doubt as to its being well founded; but it is extremely convenient and reasonable; and I am not prepared to say that any valid objection can be made to it, provided it be explained and qualified in the manner I will mention: but unfortunately that qualification will exclude

 * 666 the present case. Where it applies, a * new mode of entering up the judgment upon the record would be required, treating the issue found for the defendant as immaterial, and proceeding, notwithstanding the verdict on that issue, to give

(a) 9 Bing. 52; 2 M. & Scott, 713.

(b) Per ASHHURST J., Cowp. 510.

judgment upon the other issue found for the plaintiff. Nor am I satisfied that the doctrine laid down by the Chief Justice would not apply to a case in which the other issues, one or more, being each material and decisive of the whole cause of action, are each found for the plaintiff, although they severally or together did not confess or traverse all the material facts alleged in the declaration; for it may be well said that a repleader is to be granted, to enable the parties to plead properly such a plea as would be decisive of the action; and if they have already done so, under the power given by the statute of Anne, and raised one or more correct issues, each of which would decide the action, and the Court may give judgment on the finding on the material issue or issues, such a course is unnecessary; and I am disposed to think, on that ground, after full consideration, that the Court of Exchequer was wrong in awarding a repleader in the case of Plummer v. Lee, already referred to; although it would have been rightly awarded, if the only plea had been, the traverse of the immaterial fact alleged in the declaration. But I am of opinion that this doctrine will not help the plaintiffs in this case; because the matter of the fifth plea has never been tried at all by a proper issue. The defendant had liberty to plead that plea, and has a right to all the benefits of it; and if it be good in point of law (which for this purpose I must assume), he had a right to have the facts properly disposed of by a proper issue. This has not been done; as the issue was found in his favour, he would have a right to ask for a repleader * if the plea stood alone, and cannot * 667 be deprived of that right if it is joined with others.

I am therefore of opinion, that, assuming the fifth plea to be good, the other pleadings would not help the plaintiffs, and the judgment ought to be reversed.

MR. JUSTICE VAUGHAN. — I have considered with attention the various questions which in this complicated case your Lordships have propounded to the Judges; some of which, being “inter apices doctrinæ placitandi,” might be expected to provoke much difference of opinion. I have found great difficulty in bringing my mind to a satisfactory conclusion upon some of them; which may cease to be a matter of surprise when it is remembered, that, after the most anxious consideration, not only have different Judges taken different views of the same questions, but the same Judges, after much deliberation, have found themselves constrained to give different judgments upon the same question, as the case has proceeded through its several stages in the Courts below.

To the first question, which appears to be the most easy of solution, I answer that the conduct of A. B., under the circumstances stated, in paying over to the Receiver-General any part of the moneys collected by him for the year 1828, to be applied to the service and account of former years, was a direct breach of the condition of the bond. But, as the case of a surety has ever been regarded with favour both in Courts of Law and Equity, his liability must be demonstrated. He has executed a bond with a condition, by which he stipulates, that, on A. B. being appointed

 * 668 year 1828, he will be responsible for * his collecting, and well and truly paying over to the Receiver-General all such moneys as shall come to his hands by virtue of the assessments of that year. True it is that A. B. did faithfully collect all the sums due upon those assessments, and did pay them over to the Receiver-General; but with a specific appropriation of part, viz., 693*l.*, to the account and service of a former year, for which year the defendant below was not his surety.

Adverting to the provisions of the Act 43 Geo. 3, c. 99 (so often referred to), which creates and defines the obligations and duties of the collector and of his surety, I am of opinion that A. B. thereby incurred a forfeiture of the penalty of the bond. But, in looking at the general frame and context of the Act of Parliament, one cannot fail to observe that the duties and the responsibility of the collector and his surety are several and distinct, expressed in different terms, and depending upon very different provisions. The office of each is an annual office; and, in considering the questions submitted to us, we must carefully avoid confounding the duties of these respective officers for any one particular year, with the duties of any prior or subsequent year. It may happen accidentally, but not necessarily, that the collector of the preceding year may also be appointed collector for the subsequent year; and that the surety of the former year may chance to become the surety for the collector of the following year; and so vice versa. The principal, or collector, engages that he will duly collect, and well and truly pay over to the Receiver-General all sums received by him by virtue of the assessments made in the year 1828, to the service and account of that particular year; and the surety becomes responsible for the

* 669 faithful discharge of this duty; but if, * instead of paying over the sums collected in 1828 to the service and account of that year, the collector causes the same, or any part of them, to be applied to the extinction or liquidation of an arrear which he had suffered to accumulate in any former year, I have no hesitation in declaring that he becomes as much a defaulter to the extent of such misappropriation as if he had applied the money to the payment of his own private debt; and pro tanto the parish becomes liable to be reassessed to make good such deficiency, and may resort to the surety for indemnification to the extent of the default. Whether this conduct of A. B. amounted to a breach of the condition of the bond, cannot, in my humble judgment, be tried by a more infallible test than that suggested by my brother PARKE, in delivering his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, wherein he observes that the condition of the bond is to be construed as if another person, and not A. B., had been collector for a former year: and could it then admit of any doubt that it would be a breach of the condition "to pay well and truly to the Receiver-General," if the money had been lent by A. B. to such former collector to enable him to pay his arrears, although the money had been so applied? It is in effect, for this purpose, an appropriation by A. B. to the payment of his own debt. To my mind, this proposition involved in the first question appears so plain, and so directly in unison with the opinions (I believe) of all the Judges (whatever difference may be found to exist in the answers to be returned to some of the subsequent questions), that I cannot prevail upon myself to waste more of your Lordships' valuable time upon the consideration of it.

The second question opens a more extended field of discussion, and is calculated to excite much greater * differ- * 670
ence of opinion. We are told that A. B., at the time of the supposed breach of the condition of the bond, had certain lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which they had knowledge, before any action brought upon the bond: and we are asked whether, an action being brought, it would be a defence to that action, that the commissioners did not before suit seize and sell the said lands and goods.

The answer to this question seems to depend upon establishing the proposition that such seizure and sale was a condition precedent which must be complied with before the surety can be sued; and whether it be such a condition precedent must be determined by the true construction of the proviso in the 13th section of the

43 Geo. 3, c. 99, regard being had, at the same time, to the power and authority given to the commissioners by the 52d section to deal with the person and property of the collector making default. It has been argued, and I think correctly, that the clause enabling the commissioners to seize the lands and goods of the collector, is not imperative, but directory only, and is not a step necessarily preliminary to putting the bond in suit against the principal. But I conceive that the legislature has drawn a distinction, and expressed it in words too plain to be mistaken, between the liability of the principal and of the surety, and has with the most guarded caution placed the responsibility of the latter upon the more favoured footing. After directing the form of the bond to be taken from the surety, that section (§ 13) proceeds to enact that "every such bond given by way of security shall be prosecuted by the commissioners on any failure or default of the collector:" but accompanied and followed by this remarkable * 671 able * proviso, which I regard as the inducement or consideration influencing the mind of the surety to enter into the obligation, viz.: "Provided always, that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this Act." If this proviso, admitted on all hands to have been introduced for the sole purpose of giving protection to the surety, and of easing the burden of his obligation, does not disarm the commissioners of any power to call him to account until the deficiency of the collector has been ascertained, after giving credit for the proceeds resulting from the sale of his lands and goods, pursuant to the powers in the 52d section, in reduction of the balance, I ask what language could be devised more clear to convey the notion of a strict condition precedent than the words of this proviso? To my mind this is a solemn declaration made by the legislature (contemplating the reluctance with which persons might become sureties in bonds of this description), that whoever executed them should not be prosecuted for the default of the collector, until after the commissioners had first seized and sold all the real and personal estate of the collector of which they had any knowledge; and that the commissioners, having given credit for the proceeds in reduction of the debt, might then, and then only, enforce the bond against the surety. How far the neglect or failure of the commissioners to exercise the powers delegated to them of proceeding against the lands and goods of the principal, for the purpose of making them available in diminution of the debt or balance to be afterwards * claimed against the surety, may render them obnoxious * 672 to any proceeding by mandamus, or by suit in equity, or otherwise, we are not called upon to discuss; but, surely, their neglect to discharge the trust reposed in them affords no just ground for prematurely accelerating the liability of the surety. So harsh a construction of the proviso in the 13th section would be fraught with injustice, and virtually operate as a fraud upon the surety. I am, therefore, of opinion, upon the plain letter of the Act of Parliament, upon the clear intention of the legislature, to be collected from the whole frame and spirit of its various enactments, and upon the reason of the thing, that the neglect of the commissioners to seize and sell the lands and goods of the collector of which they had knowledge, before the action was commenced, would, if properly pleaded, afford a good ground of defence to such action.

To the third question, which assumes the want of knowledge in the commissioners, and their ignorance of the fact of the existence of any lands or goods belonging to the collector within their jurisdiction, before the commencement of the suit, I answer, "De non existentibus et de non apparentibus eadem est et ratio et lex." Upon this short ground, and on this plain and sound principle, I am of opinion that this defence of the surety must fail, where the commissioners have had no notice.

Whether the issue raised by the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea ought to have been found for the plaintiffs or for the defendant, depends upon the matters involved in that issue. If the rejoinder, not having traversed the fact of notice to the commissioners, — a most important part of the issue tendered by the replication, — can be considered as having * the * 673 legal effect of impliedly admitting the want of notice to the commissioners of there being any lands, &c., of A. B. within their jurisdiction before the commencement of the action, I think that the verdict on that issue should have been found for the plaintiffs. But I cannot satisfy my mind that the defendant below, by his rejoinder, can be taken to have made any such admission. The allegation in the replication that the commissioners sold all the lands of A. B. of which they had notice, is one entire and substantive allegation, the whole of which the defendant might and ought to have traversed; but, by omitting one very essential part of it, he has raised an immaterial issue (if any issue be raised), in which I think the fact of notice not involved. Taking this view of the subject, the finding of the jury that A. B. had lands, &c., properly affirms all that was put in issue, and therefore entitles the defendant to have it entered in his favour; but, as it is an immaterial issue, what are the legal consequences resulting from such finding of the jury will be seen in the answer to the subsequent questions.

If I am correct in supposing that the verdict should be entered for the defendant upon the issue raised by the rejoinder to the fifth plea, and that it would be no defence to the action that the lands of A. B. were not sold by the commissioners, unless they had notice of their existence, I think that judgment might be entered for the plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, provided the fifth plea can be considered as amounting to a confession of the cause of action, and an insufficient avoidance of it. The rule as applicable to cases of this description is laid down with great precision and perspicuity by Lord Chief Justice ABBOTT, in Lambert * 674 * v. Taylor. (a) He says, "The plea being bad, the defendant certainly cannot have judgment, although the issue is found for him, the issue being taken on an immaterial matter: and the question, whether the plaintiff can have judgment, or whether there ought to be a repleader (supposing the Court competent to award a repleader), depends upon the question whether the plea does or does not contain a confession of a cause of action: if a cause of action be confessed by the plea, and the matter pleaded in avoidance be insufficient, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment notwithstanding the verdict." The same rule was recognized and confirmed by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Goodburne v. Bowman, (b) and by the Court of Exchequer in Plummer v. Lee. (c)

Let us apply this test to the fifth plea. That plea states that A. B. did well and faithfully demand and collect all the sums of money charged in the said assessments; and then avers that he was possessed of and entitled to certain lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which the plaintiffs had notice, and which they might have seized and sold to satisfy the sums so collected and detained, or not duly paid over by him in pursuance of the bond. This plea confesses a cause of action, and contains matter in avoidance of it, capable of being moulded into an issue which, properly framed, would have determined the merits of the case. But mark the mode in which the plaintiffs deal with this plea in their replication. They state, that after A. B. had collected the sums assessed, and omitted to pay them over to the Receiver-General, * he had no lands within the jurisdic- * 675 tion of the commissioners which they could seize and sell, of which the plaintiffs had notice. Without discussing the question whether the plaintiffs' replication was not inartificially drawn, and open to a special demurrer, inasmuch as it traverses, not the single fact whether A. B. had land within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, nor the fact, simpliciter, whether the plaintiffs had notice, but the compound proposition, that he had no land of which the plaintiffs had notice. Perhaps the more correct mode of replying to a plea so framed would have been either to have traversed the fact of A. B. having lands, or the fact of the plaintiffs having had notice; the one or the other, but not both; the failure to maintain either being fatal to the defendant's bar.

(a) 4 B. & C. 152; 6 D. & R. 188.

(b) 9 Bing. 532; 2 M. & Scott, 700.

(c) 9 M. & W. 495; 5 Dowl. 755.

Such being the plea and the replication, the defendant rejoins that A. B. had lands within the jurisdiction, omitting to traverse so essential a part of the issue tendered by the replication as the fact of notice. It appears to me that the plaintiffs might have demurred to this rejoinder, as tendering an immaterial issue (if not amounting to a departure), passing by and losing sight altogether of the fact of notice, upon which the strength and sufficiency of the bar rested. Instead of doing so, they have countenanced this error, and concurred, by adding the similiter, in sending an issue to be tried by a jury, which cannot dispose of the merits of the case. How, then, is the verdict to be entered on this issue? With unfeigned deference to the opinion of others, I conceive, as I have before stated, that the verdict should be entered for the defendant, the jury having found the only fact involved in it in his favour; viz., that A. B. had lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners.

* There being, therefore, a plea upon the record which * 676 confesses a cause of action, and which contains matter in avoidance of it which might have determined the rights of the parties, but which has failed to do so from their mutual neglect to observe the rules of good pleading, I think the plaintiffs are not entitled to enter up judgment non obstante veredicto upon a supposed implied confession in the rejoinder, that if there were lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, the plaintiffs had no notice of them. For the other reasons suggested by my brother COLERIDGE and the very learned Baron PARKE, I agree that the neglect of the defendant to traverse the fact of notice does not amount to any such implied admission of it.

Supposing the judgment could not be so entered, and the issue raised by the rejoinder be (as I apprehend it must be) adjudged immaterial, we are called upon to declare our opinion upon the jurisdiction of a Court of error to grant a repleader, and upon the expediency of doing so in the case before us. I believe it has been a prevalent notion in Westminster Hall of late years, that a Court of error cannot award a repleader; and the neglect or forbearance to exercise this right through a long succession of years is strong evidence against the existence of it. Since the statute of Anne, which allowed defendants any number of pleas the Court might be pleased to sanction, and since the practice of granting new trials has grown into daily use, the awarding of a repleader, even by the Courts below, has become a rare occurrence; inasmuch as the Court from whence the record issues is likely to render such proceeding unnecessary. In the case of

* 677 reported to have said, that in ancient * times it was usual to award a repleader on writ of error from the Common Pleas to the King's Bench, and that he had searched and found several rolls, not less than seven in number (the earliest in the 21 Edw. 1, and the latest in the 33 Edw. 3), in which a repleader had been so awarded; but he adds, it was grown obsolete and not in use at that day. I am not aware that the jurisdiction of a Court of error to award a repleader (assuming it once to have existed) has ever been abolished by any legislative enactment, or declared illegal by any judicial decisions. But since the time of Lord HALE more than a century and a half has elapsed, and sunk the practice (if ever it existed) into absolute desuetude, and involved the right in deeper obscurity. I cannot, therefore, venture to affirm the jurisdiction of a Court of error to award a repleader, and consequently cannot assert the expediency of doing so in this case.

This leads me to the last, and the only remaining question; viz., what judgment ought to be pronounced, supposing a Court of error cannot or do not award a repleader; to which I answer, in a word, that judgment cannot be pronounced for the defendant, because the issues found for him are immaterial issues; neither, as it appears to me, can judgment be pronounced for the plaintiffs on the whole record, or on the fifth plea non obstante veredicto, for the reasons I have before stated.

Deeply regretting the time and cost which have been expended in a fruitless litigation, I come to the conclusion, which I have arrived at after much fluctuation of opinion and with great reluctance, that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed, and the plaintiffs be at liberty to retrace their steps, and begin de novo, if they shall be so advised.

tion proposed by your Lordships, I am of opinion that the conduct of A. B. was a breach of the condition of the bond, for the reasons already given by my learned brothers.

The second and third questions are so much connected together, that, with the leave of the House, I should propose to give an answer which applies to both.

Two questions arise on the construction of the Statute of 43 Geo. 3, c. 99. The first is, whether the sale of the lands and goods of the collector be a condition precedent to putting the bond in suit against the surety. The second is, whether, if it be a condition precedent, it applies to all the lands and goods of the collector, or only to those which were known to the commissioners; and I use the term “known,” because the word “notice,” which occurs in the pleadings, sometimes means that knowledge which is acquired by specific information given with a particular object, as in the instance of notice of dishonour of bills of exchange, and other cases; but, as applicable to the present case, I mean by the term “known,” knowledge, in whatever way it is acquired.

Upon the first of these points, I think the sale of the lands and goods of the collector is a condition precedent to putting the bond in suit. The 13th section of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, after prescribing the form of the bond of the surety, says, that “every such bond given by way of such security as aforesaid shall be prosecuted by the commissioners on any failure or default of the collector;” and then there immediately follows this proviso, — “provided always, that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety, * for any deficiency other than what * 679 shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the commissioners by this Act.” Here, therefore, is a provision that the bond shall not be put in suit for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after a particular thing done. It is quite clear that, if the lands and goods have been sold, the bond can only be put in suit for the difference ; but if there are lands and goods, and they can be sold by the commissioners under the powers and directions of the Act, the meaning of the clause is, that the deficiency must be ascertained first ; for, otherwise, it is putting the bond in suit for the whole, where the Act says it shall only be so for a deficiency. It is a very reasonable provision for a surety, that he shall not be called upon until all has been got from the collector that can be raised.

But it is necessary to see what are the powers and directions given by the Act, by which the deficiency is to be ascertained. They are contained in the 52d section, which enacts, that if the collector makes default in the particulars enumerated, the commissioners are authorized and empowered to imprison the person, and seize and secure the estate, both real and personal, of the collector, wheresoever the same can be discovered and found ; and the commissioners who shall so seize and secure the estate shall, and they are empowered to, appoint a time for a meeting of the commissioners ; and the commissioners present at such meeting, in case the accounts of the collector be not delivered, or the money detained by him be not paid, are empowered and required to sell and dispose of all such estates which shall

that this clause as to seizing the estates is only directory to the commissioners, as they are only authorized and empowered, and not required, to seize ; and that this is more strongly shown, because in the subsequent part of the clause they are required to sell, and therefore a different phraseology is used. There is not the least doubt but that the clause as to seizing is only directory, and only gives a discretion to the commissioners that, if the collector makes default, they may seize and secure the estates ; and then if, at the subsequent meeting, the collector does not pay up his deficiency, they are required to sell. It is very reasonable that they shall not be required to sell if the collector can redeem his estate. And then it is said, that because the clause as to seizure is only discretionary with the commissioners, they need not seize unless they think proper ; and, as the powers and directions as to the seizure and sale of the estates are not in point of fact exercised, and need not be so unless the commissioners think proper, the deficiency, after the exercise of these powers, is out of the question, and does not and need not arise, and the bond may be put in suit without regard to that. But I think not. The 52d section relates to the conduct to be pursued towards the collector; and the commissioners will no doubt exercise their discretion as will best accord with the discharge of their duties to the Crown, to the parishioners, and to the collector; but if they do not think it right to enforce their powers, the sureties are not to suffer by that. The proviso in the 13th section is introduced for the benefit of the surety, and the meaning of it, in my opinion, is, that he is not to be called upon until the commissioners have done all in their power to make the collector pay; and if for any *reason they omit * 681 to do that, they are not to call on the surety. If it be not a condition precedent, I do not see how the surety can have the benefit of the clause; for if the surety be compelled to pay the whole, I do not think he could have a mandamus to the commissioners to seize and sell; their power is only to seize and sell if the collector has not paid the money; but if the money has been paid by other means, the collector is no longer indebted to the commissioners. Besides, if a mandamus were to go, it must be for the whole direction of the clause; and that is, that the money arising from the sale shall be paid to the Receiver-General; and then the surety would have to petition the Crown to be repaid. And I should doubt whether a Court of Equity would compel a sale, unless to carry the whole clause into effect, and so as that the surety might petition the Crown when the money had got into the hands of the Receiver-General. Perhaps the commissioners might of themselves sell, in order to relieve the surety; but, besides my doubting the power of the commissioners to sell after they have been paid by the surety, I do not think the surety ought to be put in the situation of having to rely upon what they may be disposed to do.

It is very possible that some inconvenience, and in some cases loss, might arise if the bond could not be enforced against the surety till the property of the collector is sold; for certainly the proceedings under the 52d section must be attended with delay. But I do not think we have any thing to do with that consideration; the question is upon the construction of the Act, as it is presented to us.

Some distinction was raised in the argument as to the meaning of the words "prosecute" and "put *in suit;" * 682 and it was suggested, that because the words "prosecute under the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, and other Acts which that Act consolidated and amended, collector of assessed taxes for the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green. The action was brought for the recovery of the sum of 693*l.*, which was alleged to be due to the

Receiver-General of the county of Middlesex, in consequence of Bigg * not having paid in that sum to the account of the year 1828–29, for which the plaintiff in error had become surety, and for which it was received and collected by Bigg, but to the account of the year immediately preceding, for which year the plaintiff in error was not surety. Many questions arose, both in the Court below, and afterwards in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which are at last brought by appeal before your Lordships, upon the liability of that surety, and upon the pleadings in the cause. The question on the latter did not arise in the Court of Common Pleas, but in the first Court of error into which the case was brought, viz., the Court of Exchequer Chamber. To the action upon the bond various pleas were pleaded, and various issues raised upon the pleadings, to which it is now unnecessary that I should call your Lordships' attention. But much that I have now to offer will depend upon the pleadings, and therefore to the state of the pleadings it will be my duty in a little time to direct your Lordships' attention. Suffice it at present to say, that the issues being joined, were tried before Mr. Baron ALDERSON, when questions were put to the jury, to the number of seven ; to which questions they returned answers ; and upon them, by consent, a general verdict was entered for the plaintiff in error, with leave to move the Court of Common Pleas, in which the action was brought, to set aside that verdict and enter a verdict for the penalty of the bond ; and that Court being moved, it was agreed that a special case should be taken, to be turned, if necessary, into a special verdict, with a view to carry the question elsewhere, should one or the other of the parties not be satisfied with the judgment of that

Court. The point was first argued before that Court on * 689 the special case, * which was afterwards turned into a special verdict. The Court of Common Pleas, on the argument of that case, pronounced judgment for the then plaintiffs, the commissioners of assessed taxes in that parish, the present defendants in error, for the sum of 693*l.*, which, as I have already stated, is that respecting which the question had arisen. Upon that, a writ of error was brought in the Court of Exchequer Chamber ; and that Court, after very great difference of opinion, finally affirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas. The writ of error, which brings it before your Lordships, was then sued out by the party who was defendant in the original proceeding, but who now became the plaintiff in error, against the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which had affirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas; and your Lordships, on hearing this case argued (which it was at great length, and with great learning and ability), had the assistance of nine of the learned Judges, including several of those Judges who had attended the discussion in the Exchequer Chamber; but, I think, none of those learned Judges who had originally pronounced the judgment in the Court of Common Pleas. Those learned Judges who attended the arguments here, differed very materially on some points; on others they almost all concurred: to the exceptions I shall presently call the attention of your Lordships. The result is, that it remains for your Lordships to pronounce judgment; and I certainly feel, in the circumstances I have stated, very considerable anxiety in recommending the judgment about to be submitted to your Lordships, though I think your Lordships will perceive, when I have gone through the circumstances of this somewhat singular case, which it will be my duty to do rather * fully, that there will be no * 690 doubt what course your Lordships ought to take.

There were several points made in the Court below, which have not been so far relied on here as to require the consideration of your Lordships; and accordingly on these you put no questions to the learned Judges. These related chiefly to the issues on the 8th and 11th pleas; and the question raised on them was, whether the provisions of the Act regarding the previous examination of the collector by the commissioners, and the hastening his payment of the moneys collected to the Receiver-General, were imperative, so as to constitute those proceedings by the commissioners conditions precedent to their proceeding against the surety, or were only directory. That they were only directory, all the Judges below, both in the Common Pleas and Exchequer Chamber, appear to have agreed; nor can there be any further doubt upon the point. We therefore come to the questions which properly now remain for consideration. The first which presents itself needs not to detain us long, but it must be disposed of before the others, which are mainly in dispute, can arise. Was the payment by the collector of 693*l.* (the sum for which the plaintiff has recovered) to the Receiver-General, not to the account of the year 1828-29, for the service of which year it had come to his hands, but to the account of a former year, during which the defendant was not security, a breach of the condition in the bond? It appears to me very clear that such payment was not well and truly paying according to the true intent and meaning of the Acts. The Acts intend and mean that the money of each year should be carried to the account of that year. But the payments made in this case

The appointment of collector is annual; and I really can see no difference in the construction that ought to be put upon the statute here, and that which ought to be put on it in a case where a different person had been collector in the former year. Had it been so, and had the money been paid to the account of that person's debt, no doubt whatever could have been raised. Here it is paying another debt of the collector himself; and though the public are the creditors in both cases, yet it is the payment of another debt as much as if it had been owing to another creditor. Accordingly, we find all the learned Judges are agreed in their opinions upon this point. On this point, too, the Judges of the Common Pleas were unanimous.

The next question is one upon which the Court of Common Pleas gave no opinion, and on which all the other Judges, with one exception, are agreed; both those whose assistance we had here, and those who dealt with it in the Exchequer Chamber. That question is, whether the seizure and sale of the collector's lands and goods by the commissioners constituted a condition precedent to their putting the bond in suit against his surety? The words of the 13th section of the Act appear to leave no reasonable doubt on this subject. After pointing out the manner of giving security, the section proceeds to enact, "that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety or sureties for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after the sale of the lands and goods of such collector, in pursuance of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this Act." Now, as this taken by itself could leave no doubt that the bond was only to be sued upon for the balance * 692 left unpaid after the collector's lands and * goods had been seized and sold, and as the only ground upon which a question can be raised, is the reference made to the powers given by the Act, which are specified in the 52d section, it becomes material to consider that section. It empowers and authorizes (but does not require) the imprisonment of the collector's person, and the seizure of his estate, real and personal, "wheresoever the same can be discovered and found;" and then it authorizes and requires the sale of the property which may have been seized, if the collector shall not have paid before the next meeting: from which it is contended that as the commissioners have a discretion given them to seize, and are duly required to sell what they have seized, they must sell, and are forbidden by the proviso in the 13th section to sue the surety for more than the balance left unsatisfied by the seizure and sale, in case they shall have elected to seize and sell under the 52d section. But the reason why the seizure is discretionary, and the sale alone imperative, is to give the collector the opportunity of redeeming after the seizure. The 52d section relates to the proceedings against the collector; the 13th to those against the surety, and the proviso in the latter appears expressly framed for the benefit of the surety. Whoever gives bond for the collector, must, on reading the 13th section, suppose that he only becomes bound for what remains unsatisfied after the seizure and sale of the collector's property. To hold that the discretion given by the 52d section of proceeding against the collector, imports into the 13th a condition "in case the commissioners shall choose to seize," would be altering the nature of the proviso, rendering it unavailing to the surety, and placing him in the same situation in which the collector himself is under the * statute * 693 of Will. 3, and in which the surety would have been had no proviso been introduced into this Act in his favour; although it is plainly the intention of the proviso to place him in a better situation than the collector. The argument used that the power given by the 52d section may be exercised in the surety's favour after he shall have been compelled to pay the debt, and that a mandamus will lie to compel the commissioners to seize and sell, does not appear to have any good foundation. The power given by that section is to seize and sell for the collector's debt. The power given is to seize on his default, and sell for what he has left unpaid. If the payment by the surety is his payment, there is no power to seize and sell, for there is no debt. If the payment by the surety is not his payment, then there may be a debt, and there may be a power to seize, but there is more, there is an obligation to pay over; just as if the debt subsisted; for the words require a payment into the hands of the Receiver-General of such sums as have not been accounted for by the collector; so that if the commissioners are compellable to seize and sell because the surety has paid, they are compellable to pay the whole debt into the Receiver-General's hands, although the surety shall have previously paid it, and then the surety must look to the receiver for being reimbursed, without there being any words whatever in the statute giving him such resource for the recovery of what is due to him, — a proposition which seems wholly untenable. It therefore appears sufficiently plain that the bond cannot be put in suit against the surety, unless and until the commissioners have exercised the power given them against the principal. Although, where a statutory enactment is clear, there is no occasion to argue from the consequences

 * 694 of a * construction, and where it is ambiguous, such an argument is only admissible if it is connected with the general intention of the Act, yet we cannot avoid perceiving here, that unless the commissioners are obliged to seize the collector's goods before suing the surety, they may, and very likely will, proceed against a solvent surety, rather than incur the trouble of seizing and selling; so that the whole benefit plainly intended for the surety will be lost to him.

The next question has given rise to a much greater diversity of opinion: it is, whether the commissioners are bound, before proceeding against the surety, to seize all the collector's lands and goods, or only those of which they have notice; meaning by notice, as it is now on all hands agreed, knowledge, however acquired. The proviso in the 13th section is clear and express that the bond shall not be put in suit for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after the sale of the lands and goods of the collector, in pursuance of the directions and powers of the Act; that is, of those given by the 52d section. This sale being by what has been already shown a condition precedent, the 13th section must be read as if it provided that the surety shall not be sued until after the lands and goods of the principal shall have been sold under the powers of the 52d section, which authorizes the seizure and sale of the whole estate wherever it can be discovered and found. The two sections taken together thus make no exception, but render the sale of all the principal's estate a condition precedent to proceedings against the surety. Have we any right to graft upon this plain and positive enactment a qualification restricting the performance of the condition to the seizure and sale of such estate only as shall have * 695 come to the knowledge of * the commissioners? The only

words that can be supposed to import any restriction whatever are these: "wheresoever the same can be discovered or found." But these words only refer to the local situation of the property, and are meant to give a power over the whole, wheresoever situated. They are enabling words, words of enlargement rather than restriction. They import that whatever property can anywhere be found may be seized. If they are read as they must be to support the argument raised upon them, they must be read thus: "whenever the property shall be discovered or become known to," or, rather, "if any such property shall be discovered or become known to" them. But how could they seize any which had not become known to them? This is plainly an insensible construction, and the words can only refer to the situation. They mean all property wheresoever found. It is not to be denied that the condition of notice may sometimes be implied where the conditions of an enactment do not specify it: but this cannot be in cases where the party has no exclusive means of knowledge, nor any duty to inquire. The surety may know more about the affairs of the collector than the commissioners, but not necessarily so: nor is there any duty cast upon him more than upon them, to become acquainted with the collector's property. The consequences of a construction which does not hold notice to be necessary, form confessedly the only ground for maintaining the affirmative of the proposition. It is said, and truly said, that if the commissioners cannot proceed against the surety until all the property of the collector is seized, they may not be safe in proceeding while any unknown parcel of goods exists, or in case any estate, real or personal, has, on the eve of the seizure, come to * the collector by descent, devise, or bequest; but nothing * 696 can be more dangerous than to make such considerations the ground of construing an enactment quite complete and unambiguous in itself. If we depart from the plain and obvious meaning on account of such views, we, in truth, do not construe the Act, but alter it. We add words to it, or vary the words in which its provisions are couched. We supply a defect which the legislature could easily have supplied, and are making the law, not interpreting it. This becomes peculiarly improper in dealing with a modern statute, because the extreme conciseness of the ancient statutes was the only ground for the sort of legislative interpretation frequently put upon their words by the Judges. The prolixity of modern statutes, so very remarkable of late, affords no ground to justify such a sort of interpretation. The only safe rule to go by is to hold that, if the legislature had intended to obviate the consequences apprehended, it would have done so: nothing confessedly being more easy than to have added words confining the condition precedent to the property of which the commissioners had notice. In considering this point, no authorities are to be found, except so far as the dicta of Lord TENTERDEN and Mr. Justice HOLROYD, in Peppin v. Cook, (a) certainly favour the literal construction rather than the other: but then no case has been cited, and none can be shown, where, in construing a recent statute requiring all the things of a certain description to be dealt with or by in a particular way, the Courts have held themselves bound to add the words, “and whereof A. had notice or knowledge.” Nothing could justify this but the impos-

Now, here it is not contended that the general meaning of the enactment makes the addition necessary; the statute is very sensible without it. Neither is it necessary for enabling the commissioners to act; they may ascertain the property of the collector at the time of appointing him and accepting his security. They may even inform themselves, from time to time, of any change in that property: but if they should be unable to do so, and inconvenience should thence arise, still there is no ground for adding to the statutory enactment, because the legislature might easily have provided against it. But supposing that we are agreed that the seizure and sale constitute a condition precedent, and that the want of notice is immaterial; in other words, that the surety has a good defence to the action, on the ground that the plaintiffs, the commissioners, had not seized and sold the collector's property: although it would then follow that the judgment cannot be reversed, because it cannot be given for the plaintiffs, it still does not follow that it must be entered for the defendant, or that in the state of this record it can be so entered. We must now, therefore, examine the pleadings, with a view to find whether there be any issue joined between the parties, upon which judgment can be given. For this purpose the fifth plea, and the issue on the replication to that and the rejoinder, need alone be considered, because the sixth being similar to the eighth, and the seventh and twelfth referring themselves to the fifth and sixth, the whole question on the pleadings resolves itself into the question arising on the fifth plea, and the whole four issues — nine, twelve, thirteen, and sixteen — raise only the same question, namely, that which arises out of the pleading upon the fifth plea. The fifth plea is, that * “the collector, before * 698 action brought, and continually hitherto, had lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners of which they had notice, and which might have been seized and sold under the Act to satisfy the debt of the collector; but that the same have not been so sold by them.” In substance, the plea is, that the collector had property of which the commissioners had notice, and that they did not seize and sell it. The replication is, that after the default the collector had, within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, no lands of which they had notice, and no goods of which they had notice, other than a certain parcel known to them, and which they had seized and sold: in substance, that the collector had no property subject to seizure and sale, of which the commissioners had notice. The rejoinder is, that after the default the collector had lands which the commissioners might have seized and sold; and that after the default, all the goods of the collector at the time of the default, and which might and ought to have been discovered and found by the commissioners within their jurisdiction, were not seized and sold by them in pursuance of the powers under the Act, in manner and form as alleged by the plaintiffs: and it concludes to the country. In substance it is, that the collector had lands which might have been sold, and that his goods which might have been sold were not sold: and this rejoinder says nothing whatever of notice, the want of which had been stated in the plea and taken up by the replication: the modo et forma clearly referring not to the substantive matters of the plaintiffs’ allegation, namely, “goods of which the commissioners had notice,” but only to the manner in which the plaintiffs had made the allegation.

Then the verdict is, that the collector had lands * and * 699 goods after the default and until the commencement of the suit, which lands and goods might have been seized and sold by the commissioners under the Act before the commencement of the suit; but that the commissioners had no notice of the collector’s lands, but had reasonable grounds for believing that he had goods:—and this does not amount to a finding that they believed he had any. It has been treated as a finding that they had no notice of either lands or goods; I am rather disposed to regard it as negating notice of the lands, and as no finding at all on notice of the goods. But this becomes immaterial if the notice is immaterial; and therefore let it be taken, as it has been taken, to be a finding that they had notice of neither lands nor goods.

We have now to consider what the issue is upon which the verdict is found, and whether there is really any issue at all. The plea affirms the existence, not of lands and goods absolutely, but of lands and goods of which the commissioners had notice, and which they might have seized and sold. The replication asserts that there were no seizable or salable lands and goods of which the commissioners had notice. The rejoinder, without mentioning notice at all, asserts that there were salable and seizable lands, and that goods seizable and salable were not seized and sold; which, though very inartificially expressed, may be taken after the verdict to assert (what it does not assert, except inferentially) that the collector had goods as well as lands seizable and salable. Now it is plain that here the parties make their averments of and concerning different things, and not of the same thing: the one pleads respecting property in one predicament, and the other respecting property not in the same, but in

* 700 another predicament. The allegations * of the two parties, far from being diametrically opposed to one another, as they must be to raise an issue, are not at all inconsistent with each other. If I say that all the freehold lands of J. S. in the manor of A. have been sold, and my adversary only says that all the lands of J. S. in the manor of A. have not been sold, he does not negative my assertion. My proposition contained a negative pregnant (indeed the replication would on this ground have been demurrable specially). I might have explained or particularized the proposition thus: "All the freeholds have been sold, but all the copyholds remained unsold." And my adversary might have explained or particularized his proposition in the very same words: so that, instead of one having asserted an affirmative, and the other a negative, respecting the same matter, which is the character of every issue, both of us would only have been asserting propositions which, far from being opposite, are quite consistent, and might have been identical. The more this pleading is examined, the more plainly will it appear that it raises no issue at all; neither an informal one, which would be cured by the statute after verdict; nor an immaterial one, which could not be so cured: consequently the verdict is a nullity according to all the authorities. Sandback v. Turvey, (a) and other cases, lay this clearly down; and although cases are cited which seem to throw some doubt upon the position, it is to be observed that those are rather cases where there was an issue raised, though an informal issue, than where there was none whatever. One of them, too, Parker v. Taylor, (a) is said in another case, Walsingham v. Coombe, (b) to have been denied; and another *of them, * 701 Walthall v. Aldrich, (c) was decided the very term after Sandback v. Turvey; viz., Michaelmas, 17 Jac. 1, and without any reference to the former case; which plainly shows that the two decisions were not regarded as inconsistent. Nothing, indeed, could be more contrary to all principle, nay to common sense, than to regard a finding upon an issue which had no existence as other than a nullity. The jury must be taken to have found a verdict upon a matter not before them, as much as if they had given a verdict in another cause. The learned Judges have all agreed that the verdict on the fifth plea must be entered for the defendant, but not one of them holds that the judgment can be entered generally for the defendant. Upon different reasons they all arrive at this conclusion; as well those who hold the seizure and sale of all property a condition precedent, as those who hold only a seizure and sale of the property known to the commissioners a condition precedent; and much more the learned Judge who alone considers the seizure and sale no condition precedent at all, whether with or without notice. I ought to state that one of the learned Judges whose assistance your Lordships had (Mr. Baron PARKE), and he alone, took that view of the case, that a seizure and sale did not constitute a condition precedent, with or without notice; he was the only Judge here who held that proposition; but one Judge in the Court of Exchequer Chamber concurred with him in that opinion; namely, Lord ABINGER. All the other Judges in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, as well as here, took a different view. The whole of the learned Judges, therefore, whose opinions have been given in answer to the questions put, are *agreed that there can, in no view, be * 702 judgment for the defendant upon the issues which these pleadings raise; but that if judgment be not entered for the plaintiffs, there must be a simple reversal, and they must begin again, should they be so advised. A repleader would have been awarded in the Common Pleas, had the points on the pleading

been made there; but it is agreed on all hands that a Court of error cannot award a repleader. The only grounds upon which judgment could be given for the plaintiffs are two; either that it may be given now non obstante veredicto, on an implied confession in the rejoinder; or that, upon matter disclosed in other parts of the record, it may be given disregarding the immaterial issue. But all the Judges hold that judgment non obstante veredicto cannot be given on an implied confession in the rejoinder; that if there were lands and goods, the commissioners had no notice of them; and surely the mere dropping of all mention of notice — the merely not reasserting in the rejoinder the notice which had been asserted in the plea — cannot be taken as a confession of want of notice, entitling the plaintiffs to judgment. The case on this point stands thus: the plea is good, even if notice be supposed necessary. The replication meets the plea on this ground, and therefore answers it sufficiently. The rejoinder dropping the mention of notice is bad, on the supposition that notice is necessary, and might on that ground be demurred to; but they have not demurred. But then it contains no confession. The mere leaving out of notice, the not averring notice, does not confess it. The averment in the replication was not substantive that the commissioners had notice, but the notice was part of one entire allegation; and the omitting a part which was essential to

* 703 its materiality, and so leaving * what was least immaterial, cannot be taken as a confession of the thing omitted. Therefore, even supposing notice to be material and necessary, the plaintiffs could not have judgment on this ground. Even supposing notice necessary, the plaintiffs cannot have judgment on the whole record, if, as all but one of the learned Judges held, the fact of seizure and sale be a condition precedent. Now all are agreed on that point, with the exception of another learned Judge, who, agreeing that the seizure and sale form a condition precedent, yet holds that enough appears on the whole record to entitle the plaintiffs to judgment. For this opinion there is confessedly no direct authority; but what the Court of Common Pleas said in Goodburne v. Bowman (a) is relied on, to show that though you cannot have recourse to one plea not expressly referred to, in considering the sufficiency or insufficiency of any other plea, yet that all the pleas may be taken into consideration on a notice to enter judgment on the whole record. But it does not appear necessary to that case that this should have been held ; it was therefore extra-judicial in that case ; and even if it had not been so, there is this difference between the two cases, that there the pleas held bad were those out of which the immaterial issues arose, while here a good plea remains in bar of the action, after passing over the immaterial issue, or treating it as a nullity. The judgment of reversal which may now be given, will therefore substantially agree with the opinions of all but one of the learned Judges, upon the assumption upon which all but another of the learned Judges are agreed, that seizure and sale constitute a condition precedent. The consequence will *be, that *704 the plaintiffs may begin de novo. But if I am right in agreeing with those of the learned Judges who hold want of notice to be immaterial, the most carefully conducted pleadings in another suit never can avail the plaintiffs, or entitle them ultimately to a judgment.

Of the questions to which I have directed the attention of your Lordships, it is to be observed that the first three are those upon which the merits of the defence were decided in the Court of Common Pleas : those arising upon the pleadings do not appear to have been there made, and accordingly we have no judgment upon them except that in the Exchequer Chamber, where one only of the three learned Judges who have not attended your Lordships has given any opinion on those points. Even of the questions upon the merits, the first appears to have been argued more fully than the other two. A great part of the judgment in the Court below is upon the points which have never been made, or at least at all relied on here, and a very small portion of it relates to that which has been the subject of discussion before your Lordships. Under these circumstances, my Lords, I have no hesitation in moving simply to reverse the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, which will have the effect of affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, notwithstanding the complexity of this case, and the difference of opinion amongst the Judges upon some points, it does not appear to me that there is much difficulty in deciding upon the course this House ought to adopt, because there are points upon which there is a uniformity of opinion amongst the Judges, in which I think it is *impossible not to concur, as to such part of the case as *705 must regulate that course, if your Lordships agree in opinion with the learned Judges upon those points. That the condition of the bond was broken, there is, I conceive, no doubt. In this all the Judges concur; and all but one concur in thinking that the appropriation of the property of the collector, towards payment of the debt due from him, was a condition precedent to calling on the surety; whether it was to exhaust the whole of his property, or such part alone as came to the knowledge of the commissioners, was the subject of much difference of opinion amongst the Judges; but as the defendant, by his fifth plea, set up the defence that property of the collector of which the commissioners had notice had not been applied, and as the decision must turn upon that plea, it does not appear to me to be very material to consider how far the defendant might have defended himself by pleading and proving that the collector had property unapplied, of which it was not shown that the commissioners had notice.

According to the opinion of all the Judges but one, the fifth plea, if established by a verdict, would have amounted to a good defence to the action. Objections were made as to the manner in which the plaintiffs' replication to the fifth plea was framed; but in substance the replication tendered an issue on the defence set up in the fifth plea, which alleged that the collector had property of which the commissioners had notice. The defendant did not join issue on the point so raised, but by his rejoinder departed from his plea; and the plaintiffs, instead of taking advantage of that departure in the proper manner by demurrer, took issue on this irregular rejoinder. And the question is, what, under * 706 such circumstances, ought to be the fate * of the action.

The issue so raised being, if it is to be considered an issue at all, an immaterial issue, cannot, though found for the defendant, afford ground of a judgment for him in the action. At the same time, the state of the pleadings precludes the plaintiffs having a judgment non obstante veredicto; for, so far from there being any admission upon the record of their title, there is the fifth plea, which, if true, would constitute a good defence to it. This unfortunate state of the pleadings could not have arisen without blunders on both sides. That there can be no repleader in this House appears clear from the opinion of all the Judges, and the authorities to which they refer; and as there can be neither judgment for the plaintiffs nor for the defendant, the only course is to reverse, simpliciter, the judgment of the Court below.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The defendant cannot get his costs, though he has succeeded here; but, upon the whole, every thing connected with the rejoinder being considered, I cannot say that that, in my opinion, is to be regretted.

Judgment reversed.

DUNCAN STEWART	Appellant.
WILLIAM GIBSON, and JOHN MACKENZIE, his Man- datory	Respondents.

Illegal Contract; no Right of Action. Practice. Parties.

An American ship was fitted out in the port of Liverpool and sent to the coast of Africa, in 1806, on a joint adventure for trafficking in slaves. An English ship was sent at the same time, by the same parties, with arms and ammunition, to be at the disposal of the supercargo of the American ship; security having been given to the Admiralty that they were to be expended in trade on the coast of Africa. On the arrival of the two ships in the river Congo, the arms and ammunition were transhipped on board the American ship, which was thereupon seized by a British privateer, and ultimately condemned as contraband.

Held, that the whole transaction was illegal, and that no action for contribution or account, in regard thereto, could be maintained by any of the parties concerned, against the others.¹

Semble, that in the Courts of Scotland, as in England, one partner of a dissolved company has no title to sue in his own name another partner or a stranger to the company, in respect of advances made by the company or other person.

January 23, 25, 26, 1838. August 3, 1840.

THE summons in the action, out of which these appeals arose, narrated, among other things, that in the year 1806, James Broadfoot, merchant in Charleston, South Carolina, in the United States of America, made a purchase of the American ship Washington (which had shortly before arrived in that port with a cargo of datory of the said William Gibson ;” and they proceeded upon the same grounds, and for the same sums, now again concluded for. In that action also the defender objected to the pursuer’s title to pursue in his own name for any sum said to be due to “ William Gibson & Company ;” and the Lord Ordinary sustained that defence, and dismissed the action, with costs ; and to that interlocutor the second division of the Court of Session adhered.

3. That (as to the merits) if any loss arose upon the joint * 711 adventure, for payment of the defender’s alleged * share of which the first branch of the libel concluded, it was occasioned solely by the illegal act or culpable negligence of the pursuer and his partner, under the firm of W. Gibson & Co., or one of them, in shipping on board the vessel, upon her outward voyage, guns and gunpowder to a prohibited extent (a) and in violation of her neutrality as a foreign ship, whereby ship and cargo were exposed to seizure, and were ultimately condemned as lawful prizes to a British privateer, and the insurances effected upon them were invalidated and the joint adventurers deprived of all recovery of loss ; (b) and on this ground, the defender claimed to be entitled to indemnity from the pursuer and his partner under the said firm.

4. That the second branch of the libel, which concluded for payment of 1132*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.*, alleged to have been received by the defender in Barbadoes from the agents of the pursuer, was untrue, and contradicted by the conclusions of the former action, in which the pursuer insisted, in name of W. Gibson & Co., on payment by the defender of this identical sum, as having been received by him from the agents of the said W. Gibson & Co.

5. That the sum of 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* “ conform to state of accounts,” was also sued for in the former action, and the account then produced by the pursuer stated that sum to be due to W. Gibson & Co., and he concluded for payment thereof to that company. That the pursuer was therefore precluded now from suing for that sum as due to him individually. If that sum * 712 was due by the defender at all, it could * not be due to the pursuer, but Gibson & Co. alone could allege claim to it, and the defender had long ago settled accounts with them.

By an interlocutor dated the 9th of March, 1825, the Lord Ordinary repelled the defences, and decerned against the defender conform to the conclusions of the libel.

Stewart presented a representation against that interlocutor; but the Judicature Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 120) having passed before it was disposed of, the parties, in conformity with that Act, entered into condescendences and answers.

The pursuer, in the eighth article of his condescendence, stated the cause of the capture and condemnation of the Washington thus: — “In order to facilitate the purchase of the Washington’s cargo of slaves, the pursuer had shipped by a British vessel, named the Croydon, from London for the river Congo, a quantity of muskets and gunpowder, which were to be delivered to the defender, or his order, on their arrival in that river; and the defender, before he sailed in the Washington, received a bill of lading of those guns and powder, which are accordingly entered in the general invoice book of the adventure, referred to in article 5. The reason why the muskets and powder were shipped by the Croydon from London, was, that by the existing orders in Council, no foreign ship was allowed to carry these articles under certain penalties. After coming to anchor in the river Congo, the defender applied for, and received from the commander of the Croydon, delivery of the muskets and powder; but instead of carrying them ashore as he ought to have done, he very improperly carried them on board the Washington. This transaction was witnessed by a British letter of marque privateer, called * the Prince of Orange; the commander * 713 of which immediately went on board the Washington, and took possession of her as a prize and afterwards carried her to Barbadoes for adjudication, on the ground that she had more guns and powder on board than was allowed by the sufferance from the custom-house at Liverpool.” And the pursuer averred that no larger quantity of guns or gunpowder was shipped on board the Washington at Liverpool than was allowed by the custom-house sufferance.

The defendant’s answer to that article was, “that some days after the Washington had been moored in the river Congo, the defender received on board part of the guns and powder sent out in the Croydon, for the sole purpose of bartering for slaves.” But it was denied by the defender that this was either the cause of the capture, or could have been a ground for condemning the ship (the guns and powder being by no means intended for the supply of an enemy), or that it was the duty of the defender to have carried the guns and powder ashore. The vessel was seized by the Prince of Orange cutter, Captain Leyburn, upon information given by a mutinous American sailor, whom the defender had caused to be punished, that the vessel had taken on board at Liverpool more gunpowder than was allowed by the admiralty license. In the Admiralty Court at Barbadoes, the defender showed, to the satisfaction of the Court, that the reception of guns and powder for the purpose of barter, from the Croydon, on the coast of Africa, was not illegal; whereupon sentence of liberation was pronounced: but when costs were asked, Captain Leyburn appeared personally in Court, and instructed his counsel to state that he had several of the Washington's crew who

* 714 were ready to swear that more powder * was shipped at Liverpool than was allowed by the license. Now, the pursuer had the exclusive charge of, and was solely responsible for, the outfit and shipment at Liverpool; and it was denied by him that more gunpowder was shipped at Liverpool than was allowed by the custom-house sufferance, and at all events the defender could not be made answerable for his conduct.

It further appeared from the pleadings that the pursuer held one-fourth share in the joint adventure; his partner, William Broadfoot, one-fourth; James Broadfoot (the consignor), one-fourth; Thomas Moffat, of Edinburgh, one-eighth; and the defender one-eighth: that the ship, cargo, outfit, and premiums on insurances effected on the ship, were all paid for by Gibson & Co., and exceeded 28,000*l.* (having received from the defender 1400*l.* for his share in the Washington and cargo): that while the suit as to the legality of the capture of the Washington was going on in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Barbadoes, the ship and her cargo were there sold by arrangement between the parties, the proceeds to abide the decision: that the decree of that Court for restoration was appealed from, and reversed by the Privy Council, and the ship and cargo condemned as lawful prize to the captors: that Gibson, in 1811, brought an action in Scotland, in name of Gibson & Co., against Stewart, for his proportion of the loss sustained in the adventure (stated by the pursuer to have exceeded 21,000*l.*, including the forfeited premiums on insurances); but that action was dismissed in 1819, for want of proof that the pursuer's partner, who resided in America, authorized him to enter on the adventure, or to bring that action; whereupon the pursuer brought the present action in 1822, in his individual name.

For Gibson: 1. That loss arising from a joint adventure must be borne by the several parties engaged, each in proportion to his share in the adventure. 2. That one of several coadventurers who has made advances of money or incurred loss, on the common account, is entitled to be indemnified by all the coadventurers, in proportion to their several interests in the concern. 3. That the judgment pronounced in the former action brought by the pursuer on behalf of Gibson & Co., dismissing that action on objection to the instance, but reserving to the pursuer to insist privato nomine, cannot be effectually pleaded as res judicata against his present action at his own instance as an individual. 4. That claims of compensation do not afford a competent ground of defence unless verified by the production of liquidated documents of debt.

For the defender: 1. That the pursuer's claim in the present action is contradicted by his statements in the former action, which was dismissed on his admissions that the claim then made, if due, belonged to Gibson & Co., and on the ground that the pursuer individually had no title to sue for the claims of that company. The dismissal of that action was not qualified by any reservation in favour of the pursuer to bring a new action. 2. That the defender never having contracted with the pursuer as an individual relative to the adventure in question, is not responsible to him in that character for any thing touching the adventure. 3. That the defender's claims of compensation against Gibson & Co., and against the pursuer as a partner of that company, arise out of the adventure, and would form part of the accounting between the party with whom the defender contracted * respecting the adventure and the defender. * 716 That party was Gibson & Co.; and if the pursuer, in contracting with the defender in name of that company, acted without its authority, and did not bind the company, neither can the defender be bound; as one of the contracting parties cannot be bound while the other is free. If the pursuer, therefore, must take on himself the whole consequences of the adventure as far as concerns the company, he must do the like as far as concerns the defender also.

cause, the revised cases for the parties, and whole process, repels the defences and pleas in law of the defender; decerns against him conformably to the conclusions of the libel, and refuses the prayer of his representation," &c.

Against that interlocutor the appellant presented a reclaiming note to the first division of the Court; and by leave of Court subsequently obtained, under the proviso in the 11th section of the Judicature Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 120), he stated this further plea to the action, viz., that, according to the pursuer's own showing, the action was not maintainable; that the facts set forth by him established that the adventure out of which the claims arose was a prohibited and a contraband trade; and in support of that plea the defender referred to two judicial decisions in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, upon two actions brought by the pursuer on some of the policies of insurance on the ship Washington and her cargo in this adventure, nonsuiting the pursuer on the ground of its illegality: (a) and in further support of that plea, the defender referred to the 2d, 3d, and 4th sections * 717 of the Act * 29 Geo. 2, c. 16, (b), and the corresponding enactments of the Act 33 Geo. 3, c. 2; and to an order in council of the 11th of May, 1803. (c) A minute of the defender's

(a) See Gibson v. Mair, 1 Marshall, 41; and Gibson v. Service, 1 Marshall, 119, and 5 Taunt. 533.

(b) By § 2 it was enacted, that whatever quantity of saltpetre, gunpowder, arms, or ammunition, prohibited by proclamation or order in council to be exported, shall be shipped on board any ship in any port of Great Britain in order for exportation, contrary to such proclamation or order, shall be forfeited, and the owner shall forfeit in the proportion of 100*l.* for every cwt. of saltpetre or gunpowder, or for every five-and-twenty arms; and 100*l.* for every two cwt. of any species of ammunition.

By § 3 it was enacted, that any person aiding or assisting in the shipping any saltpetre, gunpowder, &c., during the time it shall be so prohibited to be exported, shall forfeit 100*l.* and treble the value.

By § 4 it was enacted, that if any master of any vessel shall take on board, or suffer to be taken on board, any saltpetre, gunpowder, &c., for exportation during the time it shall be so prohibited to be exported, every such master shall forfeit 100*l.*

(c) By the order of council, dated the 11th May, 1803, it was ordered, that all ships and vessels clearing out for the coast of Africa for the purpose of carrying on trade there, be permitted to take on board, as an assorted part of their cargoes, as much gunpowder, and as large a quantity of trading guns, pistols, cutlasses, and flints, lead balls, bars and shot, as the exporters shall think necessary, provided that sufficient security be given to the principal officers of his Majesty's customs of the port in which the ships are fitted out.

pleading on this point, and of the pursuer's answer, having been given in, the first division of the Court pronounced the following interlocutor on the 8th of March, 1828: "The Lords having resumed the consideration, &c., alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of, sustain the defence founded on the illegality of the adventure, and assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the libel, so far as the same relate to the sum of 1272*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, concluded for, and decern: also find the defender entitled to the expenses incurred by him in defending himself * against the conclusion of the libel from which he is * 718 assoilzied; appoint an account thereof to be given in, &c.

And further, in regard to the other conclusions of the libel, remit the same to the Lord Ordinary to proceed," &c.

By a subsequent interlocutor of the 10th of June, 1829, an interim decree for the expenses, notified at 132*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, went out against the pursuer.

The parties, upon the remit to the Lord Ordinary, made up an additional record upon the pursuer's other claims against the defender, viz., the sums of 1132*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* and 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, mentioned in the conclusions of the libel. The pursuer contended that the declared illegality of the adventure did not affect these claims; that they were distinct and separate debts, against which the defender could not set off his claims or services in the illegal transaction. The first of those sums was composed of several alleged advances to the defender by the pursuer's agents in Barbadoes, for cloths, wages, fittings for the ship, and 745*l.* for the costs of the suit in the Admiralty Court there; and it was alleged by the pursuer that though the whole of this sum of 745*l.* was advanced to the defender on bills drawn on Gibson & Co.'s agents, he received that same sum a second time out of the proceeds of the sale of the ship and cargo; and that he charged twice in his accounts for the other items, composing the whole sum of 1132*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.*

The defender, in his answer, denied these allegations, insisting that all the advances made to him by the agents were on account of the ship, and were extinguished by his own claims against the

and before they proceed on their respective voyages, in treble value of the articles exported, that the same shall be expended in trade upon the coast of Africa; which security is not to be cancelled until proof of such expenditure has been made by the oath of the captain or master of the ship or vessel, in like manner as is prescribed with regard to spirits and East India goods used in carrying on that trade.

shipowners ; and that the part of the proceeds of the sale retained by him was according to the order of the Court, and was * 719 accounted for by him to the captors, * to whom the whole of the proceeds properly belonged, the seizure being declared lawful prize. He further insisted that there could not be any accounting legally enforced respecting the proceeds or expenses of an adventure which had been declared illegal ; but if an account could be had, it would be found that the pursuer, instead of being a creditor, was largely indebted to the defender.

The Lord Ordinary having reported the cases to the first division, their Lordships, on the 6th of June, 1834, pronounced this interlocutor : “ The Lords having advised the mutual cases on the points remaining undecided, repel the defences ; find the defender liable in the sum of 745*l.*, and also in the sums of 22*l.* 10*s.* and 16*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, Barbadoes currency, mentioned in the pleadings, (a) with legal interest and commission as in the account stated in process, &c. Also find the defender liable to the pursuer in the sum of 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* with interest, remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties on defender’s claim to remuneration, and pursuer’s claim for remaining articles of said account.

The Lord Ordinary having, in pursuance of that remit, considered the revised minutes, by an interlocutor of the 30th of May, 1835, repelled the defender’s claim for remuneration, and also the pursuer’s claim for the remaining articles of the account referred to ; and decerned accordingly. (b)

(a) These two sums were for freight of a cable to Surinam, and for insurance on it ; and though paid by the agents of Gibson & Co., were again charged by the defender, and payment received by him.

(b) The Lord Ordinary added to his interlocutor the following note :— “ On the first point, viz., the defender’s claim for remuneration on account of his attendance and services in the West Indies during the proceedings which terminated in the condemnation of the vessel, the Lord Ordinary thinks that, in the circumstances of this case, it is inadmissible. It is a claim on equitable grounds advanced by the defender, who was not only the master of the vessel, but a partner in the adventure ; and had the accounting for the ultimate loss proceeded agreeably to the principle assumed in the summons, the claim might, perhaps, have formed a very reasonable article in that accounting on the side of the defender. But the defender has pleaded the condemnation of the vessel, and the illegality of the contract, ascertained by that condemnation, in bar of all accounting or claim against him as partner for any share of the loss ; and that plea has been sustained by the Court. Having taken the benefit of such a plea, he is not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, entitled to make any demand on the score of services performed in

* Both parties having presented reclaiming notes against * 720 this interlocutor, the Lords of the first division pronounced an interlocutor the 16th of December, 1835, on the defender's note, adhering to the interlocutor so far as it respected the claim for remuneration; * and remitting to * 721 the Lord Ordinary to dispose of what remained of the cause, and of the expenses.

The Lord Ordinary having accordingly further heard the parties, pronounced an interlocutor on the 14th of January, 1836, in conformity with the special finding contained in the interlocutor of the 6th of June, 1834, and decerned against the defender for payment of the several sums of 745*l.* sterling; 22*l.* 10*s.* and 16*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* Barbadoes currency, with interest from the year 1807; and 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* sterling, with interest from 1816; with expenses of the second and third conclusions of the libel.

The defender presented a reclaiming note against that interlocutor, but the Lords of the first division, by interlocutor of the 20th of May, 1836, adhered.

The defender (Mr. Stewart) appealed to this House against relation to the adventure, and before it was terminated by the condemnation of the vessel.

“ The Lord Ordinary can see no ground for the pursuer's next claim, in relation to the articles of the account forming the only remaining point in this discussion. These are certain items which were included in that account, — an account paid to the defender, first, by the bills drawn by him on Dixon, and afterwards paid to him a second time by Hyndman, and taken credit for by Hyndman, on settling with the captors for the proceeds of the vessel. By the former interlocutor of the Court, the pursuer has recovered the full amount of that account from the defender, of which he had received a double payment; and what the pursuer now demands is another repayment of certain articles which he says ought not to have been allowed to the defender at all, in either account. In any view of the case, the pursuer's claim is untenable. By the decision already pronounced, he is completely indemnified; and such being the case, and even taking his own view of the judgment, as proceeding on the ground that Hyndman, in claiming the amount from the captors, acted as his agent, it is impossible to see why he should claim the articles now in dispute from the defender, or how it can be relevantly stated that those articles ought not to have entered into the account at all. The case is now precisely the same as if there had been no previous payments to the defender by Dixon's bills, and as if Hyndman, viewing him as the pursuer's agent, had paid those items to the defender, and then taken and got credit for them, in accounting with the captors. Now, had that been done, it would seem a most extraordinary proposition to maintain that the pursuer was entitled to recover from the defender the amount of those very charges which he or his agent had got credit for from the captors, on the single ground that, whether justly or not, they had been actually paid to the defender.”

founded on by the appellant, contains any substantive prohibition against the exportation of arms to the coast of Africa. On the contrary, those statutes refer to the exportation of such articles only as shall be prohibited by proclamation or order in council to be exported. And the regulations of the order in council of the 11th May, 1803, are not themselves prohibitory, but permissive, in regard to the exportation of such articles, under the conditions therein specified. At all events, with reference to the facts set forth in the closed record, all the conditions and regulations of the order in council were duly complied with by the respondent in this instance. But if there was any illegality in the exportation of arms, which the respondent does not admit, such illegality does not extend to or vitiate the general adventure, which was conformable to the laws then in force; and, consequently, the respondent ought not, therefore, to be barred from recovering from the appellant his due proportion of the loss.

The remaining articles of the account No. 8 of process, referred to in the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, of 30th of May, and of the Court, 16th of December, 1835, being composed of personal advances to the appellant by Dixon, were not
 * 725 proper charges * against the respondent: but having actually been included in Dixon's account with the respondent, and in bills drawn by the appellant upon the respondent in favour of Dixon, the respondent, who paid those bills, is entitled to recover from the appellant the amount of the advances; and it forms no sufficient or relevant answer to the respondent's claim in this respect, that the appellant has already been found liable to account for a second payment of the same advances, which, subsequently to the date of the bills in favour of Dixon, he had obtained from the appellant's other agent, Hyndman, upon the false pretences mentioned in the pleadings.

The Attorney-General replied.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Further investigation will be necessary before I state my opinion on this case. At present I have great difficulty with regard to the party's right to bring the action. It does not appear that in the Court of Session a practice, which is necessary for the purpose of administering justice in this country, both at law and in equity, prevails; viz., that those with whom a contract is made should be the parties to sue upon it.

Beyond all doubt, the contract in this case was not made with the individual who brought the action; indeed, he does not state that it was: on the contrary, the summons states the contract to have been made on behalf of the firm of William Gibson & Company. This is a question with respect to which it is very important to have further information as to the practice in the Court of Session, before we lay down a rule which shall be binding on all the Courts in Scotland.

With regard to the question of illegality, I have no doubt that the Court of Session was right in pronouncing * this * 726 transaction illegal upon the facts as they appear in the printed cases. It is not disputed at the bar, that if there had been a contract between the parties to do that which subsequently took place, it would be illegal. If the contract had been that an adventure should go out, relating in part to certain articles of merchandise which might be legally taken, and in part to arms and ammunition, which, by the law of the country, could not be legally taken; and it was thereby agreed that, in order to evade the law, no part of the arms and ammunition should be carried out in the ship which was to carry out the other goods, but should be carried in another ship to a place out of the immediate power and jurisdiction of this country, and then should be transhipped into the ship carrying the merchandise; that would be a transaction illegal, as being in violation of the British law, and a contract upon which no relief could be given. Now, we find, in point of fact, that this is the nature of the transaction in question, which was carried on under the immediate management of the party now suing on the contract: and all your Lordships have to do is to make up your minds whether that which subsequently took place did form part of the contract between the parties or not: whether the undoubted illegality of one part of the transaction would not affect that part of the transaction which is alleged to be legal. Seeing what took place, and looking at the invoice, I cannot doubt that the whole formed one transaction; and consequently that the whole was affected by the illegality which it is admitted existed with regard to part of it. If your Lordships should be of that opinion, the only question will be, how far the illegality of the transaction affects the particular sums in question between the parties.

* LORD BROUGHAM.—I have felt great embarrassment * 727 from the beginning, in consequence of not having before us any note of the opinions which were pronounced by the learned Judges who dealt with the case in the Courts below, and of the reasons upon which those opinions were founded. Upon some branches of the case we may have less doubt than upon others, particularly the illegality of the transaction ; but then we have not any means of telling in what light the Courts below, in the judgments which they ultimately pronounced, regarded two most material parts of the case, which form the subject of the original appeal, — I mean the question of parties, which extends over and pervades the whole case, the matter of the cross appeal as well as the original appeal ; and the question as to the sums of 745*l.*, 139*l.*, and the 22*l.* and 12*l.*, which formed the subject of the cross appeal alone. And this is the more to be regretted with respect to these last mentioned sums, inasmuch as we are left entirely in the dark, and without the power of forming even a conjecture of the grounds upon which their Lordships came to one judgment with respect to the 1272*l.*, assoiling the defender from that claim on the ground of illegality, and to another judgment respecting the lesser sum ; allowing that claim, although to all appearance that claim comes within the scope of the argument of illegality as much and in the same way, and for the same reasons, in which and for which the judgment proceeded against the claim for the larger sum, as arising from an illegal contract.

In stating to your Lordships what my opinion is respecting the merits of the case, I shall take first that objection which relates to the right of the party who has brought the action ; be-
 * 728 cause that goes over * the whole case, both the original and the cross appeal : it is not the same kind of objection as a plea of abatement in our Courts for the nonjoinder of a defendant, but it is rather the case of a nonsuit by the nonjoinder of a plaintiff. In the one case it may be matter of form, but in the other it is matter of substance. If a contract is made by A. with B., A. of course may be sued upon that contract by B., and vice versa ; but if a contract is made by A. and B. with C., shall A. alone sue C. upon that contract, unless he produces an authority from B., or a release by B., which comes to the same thing ? In both of these cases, B. must sue as well as A. ; for, doubtless, the contract enuring to the benefit of both, being made by both, the performance of it must enure to the benefit of both, and both, and not one, shall have a right to come into Court against the other party, and sue the other party. Nothing has been stated in this case which at all satisfies me that there is, either in point of form or in the substantial law of Scotland, any difference with reference to this particular from those principles which regulate our Courts of Equity as well as of law in this country, — nothing which shows that the principles on which the Courts of Scotland proceed differ from those principles which, by natural justice, or even according to the plain dictates of common sense, must be the rules of proceeding in all Courts of Law or Equity. Nevertheless, I am disposed to agree with my noble and learned friend in not pronouncing at present upon this question, although it would be a shortening of the whole case, both in the original and the cross appeal; because it is barely possible there may be some rule which we are not aware of; and it may be as well that we should postpone our decision for further information.

I must proceed, in the second place, to say that *I do *729 not think that question will necessarily arise in this case at all. First, with respect to the cross appeal; upon that I entertain no doubt whatever. The question has been disposed of in the Court below, as regards the sum of 1272*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, upon the ground that there was an illegal agreement in which this voyage and speculation had its origin; that that illegality rides over the whole adventure and speculation; and that “ex dolo malo non oritur actio.” Perhaps, correctly speaking, dolus malus does not apply to what is illicitly done, but to what is malum in se; so that there is no dolus malus, properly speaking, here, but there is pactum illicitum, and there is dolus malus in evading the positive enactments of the municipal law. Now “ex pacto illicito non oritur actio.” But it is said that here there was a legal agreement completed on or before the 27th of May, 1806, and that that is not vitiated and rendered illegal by a sort of reaching backwards, because, on the 2d of June afterwards, on the African coast, something was done which must be admitted to be illicit and in contravention of our municipal law. It is said that the two things cannot be connected together. Now this is a question of fact; and the question is, whether the circumstances of the case do not afford sufficient evidence, I should say irrefragable evidence, of the two proceedings being connected inseparably together, both forming parcels of one transaction, both making up one adventure in trade, and that adventure becoming illegal altogether, because bottomed in and originating from that which was in itself illegal.

We are asked to go a great way, when we are called upon to believe that these two adventures were not one transaction; we are asked to go a little further, when we are called upon

 * 730 to believe that they had not * a close connection with each other; but we are asked to go a length which I am sure no man of ordinary common sense and understanding can accompany the respondent in going, when we are called upon to say that there was no connection whatever between the two; and that the one was entered into without any prospective looking forward to the other; and that the other was entered into without any retrospective view to the former. Yet all this we must believe, before we can admit the argument of the respondent; it is absolutely necessary for his case, before he can overturn the decision of the Court below brought here by his cross appeal, that we must believe all this before we can suppose that the matter, admitted to be illegal matter, was collateral to the legal matter, and that the legal was independent of, and uninfluenced and unaided by, the illegal matter. Can any man believe that so material an article as gunpowder to a great amount, muskets, flints, and other arms and ammunition to a still larger amount, a chest of 400 stands, and another chest of 200 stands of arms, — that all this was an after-thought, just a sudden, accidental fancy, that seized upon these slave-traders after they had wholly completed their adventure, had arranged their outfit, and had contracted with one another for the carrying on of their crime (which used to be called a trade, but which has now obtained its proper appellation by an Act of Parliament, which I had the happiness to bring in with as great pleasure as any thing I ever did in my life, — I mean the Felony Act of 1811), — that in the arrangement of this adventure, in the conspiracy by which they planned a crime to be perpetrated upon the coast of Africa, the powder and muskets had never entered into their imagination up to the 27th of May; but that, having arranged a cargo * 731 * of beads, having got an assortment of tartan hussar dresses, among other things, for the poor natives, whom they were going to plunder and torture and murder in carrying them through the horrors of the middle passage, — that these tartan dresses and beads by which they were to get the mothers to sell their children, and the different members of families to sell their relations, — that all these were put on board the vessel on the 27th of May, and that they never thought of muskets and gunpowder and flints; till when? the time is material here: till the 2d of June; so very long a period after as no less than six days. No less than six days afterwards it was that they suddenly thought, "What are we doing? We are going to Africa, but we are going to rob and murder the people there, and therefore we must have gunpowder and muskets. We are going to get the poor people to help us in our robbery and murder, and therefore we must have beads and other things; therefore, let us go and illegally put them on board; and as we cannot put them on board at Liverpool, let us put them on board at the river Congo."

Now it is as to that part of the adventure we are called upon to judge. We are called upon to say that this was a totally collateral and unconnected adventure, wholly foreign to that which happened six days before. My Lords, this is totally impossible, and I really feel that I ought to apologize for having dwelt so long upon it. I am perfectly clear that this is one transaction, — one voyage out. The invoice speaks no other language; the book, which has been produced in the proceedings below, speaks no other language; the abstract jumbles them altogether, and mixes them all up as one transaction; the party is debited with the whole. But, above all, the whole * scope and cir- * 732 cumstances of these proceedings plainly show that it is one united, joint, connected transaction, — not two several transactions. My Lords, even if I had more doubt than I have (I say I have none), I should really think that it would not become your Lordships, upon a mere matter of fact, to be very ready to reverse the decision of the Court below: that when four learned Judges have drawn a conclusion upon facts, that you should take another view of these same facts; and having no other materials whereby to modify the opinion arrived at in the Court below, should say, from thence we arrive at an opposite conclusion. Upon the whole, therefore, I have no doubt whatever, but entirely agree with my noble and learned friend, that the cross appeal must be dismissed, and with costs. I do not see a shadow of ground for this cross appeal.

Now, my Lords, I have thus disposed, in my humble opinion, of part also of the original appeal. But I cannot divine what the Court meant by taking a distinction between the 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* and the 1272*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* This matter seems to me to be in one or other of two predicaments. Either there is a blunder altogether (I speak with great respect), and this 139*l.* is part of the 1272*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, because that sum of 1272*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* is called an eighth, — an eighth of what? How does the sum of 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* happen to get out of the scope of that dividend, of which the 1272*l.* 8*s.*

7*d.* is the quotient? By the process of dividing by eight, I think there is nothing suggested to show why the 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* did not come within the scope of that process of division: if so, it is disposed of by the part of the judgment assoiling the appellant from the 1272*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* Or suppose it is a separate sum from * 733 the 1272*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, then does * not it come within the scope of the illegality? How can you distinguish the 139*l.* from the 1272*l.*? I can see no difference. I am therefore perfectly ready to say that the judgment cannot stand as regards the 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*

The two small sums of 22*l.* and 12*l.* may, I think, be put out of the case; but with respect to the 745*l.*, that is the part of the case as to which I feel most doubt, because it is involved in considerable obscurity as to the ground upon which the Court below proceeded. I am inclined, however, to consider that, either upon the ground of want of parties in this case, which would ride over this part as well as over the other, or upon the ground that at all events Gibson cannot claim this sum, the decision here is wrong. But I think it right to add that I do not see how the question of illegality affects the 745*l.*, though I am of opinion that it affects the 1272*l.* and the 139*l.* If I should ultimately feel prepared to advise your Lordships that that has been well allowed as not coming within the scope of the illegality, and also that it has been well allowed, because well claimed, inasmuch as there is no foundation for the alleged want of proper parties (and only upon that assumption can it be said that it is well claimed), if it should be found upon further inquiry that there is no foundation for the objection of the want of proper parties, I do not see how there should be any allowance made by way of set-off in the nature of a quantum meruit to the other party. Though I feel the pressure of the argument of the want of parties, I feel also that it would be setting off a quantum meruit against a legal demand. But as at present advised, I am inclined to think that we shall * 734 never come to that set-off at all; * and that, upon further inquiry, in all probability your Lordships may be advised to reverse the whole of the decision on that point. I am quite clear that, with respect to the cross appeal, you ought to dismiss it, and affirm the interlocutors therein complained of, with costs of appeal.

I have entered into the matter at this great length, with a view to save your Lordships the trouble of hearing any further arguments, when you come ultimately to decide the case. It may be understood that, unless we come to another opinion upon making further inquiry on that part of the case, what has now been said may be considered as the reasons for reversing the judgment. If we come to another opinion, of course it will be affirmed.

My noble and learned friend (the Lord Chancellor) has suggested to me, that though it is quite clear what we shall do on the cross appeal, it is not usual in deciding two appeals to decide the cross appeal first, and then to consider the original appeal. It is quite clear what the judgment will be upon the cross appeal. My noble and learned friend agrees with me in imposing upon the parties the trouble of bringing a note of what passed in the Court below; in all probability such a note would have enabled us to dispose of it at once. We know that in Westminster Hall it has been the usual practice, since the time of Lord KENYON, upon the important questions that go from the Court of Chancery to the Courts of Common Law, that they certify their answers without giving reasons. That has been found so inconvenient that the Courts are now disposed to come back to the old and better practice. I hope the Court of Session will not be offended if we apply to them the same observations * which have been applied to the Courts of West- * 735 minster Hall, and that they will take the trouble of giving their reasons as well as giving judgment. Perhaps a knowledge that it has been proposed here will be an inducement to those very learned persons to adopt that course. I have the greatest respect for them, and wishing to have their reasons is a token of our great respect.

August 3, 1840.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, upon the principal question in this case, the illegality of the transaction from which the litigation between the parties arose, there is no doubt, and it has been very properly adjudged to be illegal by the Court of Session. It is not disputed that it would have been a violation of the Acts of Parliament to have exported the arms and ammunition in the Washington; therefore they were sent in another ship for the purpose of being transhipped into the Washington, when it might be thought safe so to do; and this was accordingly done upon the coast of Africa, and the ship and cargo being seized, were afterwards condemned. All the questions between the parties must therefore, in my opinion, be considered with the assumption that the adventure was illegal; and this will dispose of Gibson's appeal against the interlocutors of the 8th March, 1828, and the 10th June, 1829; and it appears to me that necessarily carries with it the reversal of the interlocutor appealed from by Stewart, so far as the Court found him liable to pay 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, which appears to be the value of certain parts of the cargo, which were applied by Stewart, as the captain, in paying a debt he owed

* 736 to some natives. If the whole adventure was * unlawful, there can be no right to recover this sum. If, the cargo having been sold, an action had been brought for the proceeds, and the illegality of the adventure had been set up and established, the pursuer could not have recovered; and so the Court of Session has determined. Why is this sum, being a part of the adventure, not to be affected by the same rule? If the captain had sold the goods represented by the 139*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, he could not, according to the decision, have been made responsible for the proceeds. Upon what principle, then, has he been made responsible for them, because, instead of receiving value for them in money or goods, he has received value in the liquidation of his own debt? The captain, indeed, alleges that the goods were not so applied until after the capture, by which they ceased to be the property of the pursuer. In neither case, however, can the pursuer be entitled to recover the value of them. This part of the case is also involved in the question, whether the pursuer can maintain a suit founded upon transactions, not with himself individually, but with Gibson & Company, in which firm he was a partner; and as this question, if decided in the negative, will conclude all the subjects of appeal against the pursuer, it requires particular consideration.

[His Lordship, after stating the facts before stated as to the origin of the adventure, proceeded:] The accounts of the ship were kept under the heading of "Ship Washington and Owners, with William Gibson & Company." The ship having been captured and ultimately condemned, though ordered to be released by the Court of Admiralty in Barbadoes, expenses on account of the suit there, and on account of the ship and of the de-
* 737 fender personally, were incurred, which * were paid to the agents there by bills drawn upon Gibson & Company, who paid them, and some of the items, comprising the sum for which such bills were drawn, constitute part of the pursuer's demand.

In consequence of the failure of the former action in the name of Gibson & Co., the pursuer has brought the present action in his own name, not alleging any transfer to him of any interest of his partner, William Broadfoot, but claiming right in himself to sue for and recover the sums alleged to be due from the defender on account of this joint adventure, although all the money transactions were with Gibson & Company, and although the pursuer had only one-fourth and the defender one-eighth of the adventure. It does not follow, because one partner exceeds the limits of his authority, — which was one ground on which the former action was dismissed, — as between himself and his copartners in any transactions he may enter into, that the firm is not pledged to those with whom the dealing takes place in the name of the partnership. A decision, therefore, that the pursuer had not the proper authority to bind William Broadfoot, his partner in those transactions, proves nothing in the question whether he can alone sue those with whom he dealt in the name of the firm. That the funds of Gibson & Company were employed in the adventure is admitted; that they paid the bills drawn from Barbadoes is a fact common to both statements. How the account stands between Gibson and Wm. Broadfoot does not distinctly appear, although it is alleged that Gibson is debtor to his partner; but under such circumstances, how can the pursuer be entitled to receive the repayment of what the firm of Gibson & Company have so advanced? Yet such would be the result of the interlocutor *decerning for payment to the pursuer of the 745*l*. If, *738 therefore, it were necessary to decide this question, I should not hesitate to advise your Lordships to reverse the interlocutor appealed from by the defendant, upon that ground alone. There appear to me, however, to be other grounds which make it unnecessary to decide expressly upon that point. The interlocutors of the 6th of June, 1834, 14th of January, 1836, and 20th of May, 1836, find the defender liable to pay to the pursuer 745*l*., 22*l*. 10*s*., and 16*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. These sums are composed of the expenses in the Admiralty Court at Barbadoes, and some expenses incident to the ship whilst there, and said to have been due to the defender, who was there employed in attending to the interest of the owners. The amount was advanced by Dixon & Company, the agents in the island, and repaid to them by bills drawn by the defender upon the house of Gibson & Company, by whom they were paid, and so constituted items in the account of that house with the ship. If the defender had by those means obtained payment of sums to which he was not entitled, such overcharges might properly be the subject of investigation in settling the accounts of the adventure, but they could only be items in such account; and if, from the illegality of such adventure, no legal investigation of such accounts could be enforced, upon what principle can the repayment of particular items of such accounts be decreed? The objection applies to every item; and though the particular sum should appear to have been improperly charged, it is impossible, without taking the whole account, to know whether it ought to be repaid, or merely to be disallowed in the account. It appears, however, that by far the greater part of these charges (that is, all the * 739 * expenses in the Admiralty Court) were properly paid by

Gibson & Company on account of the adventure, being the expenses of protecting the property against the claim of the captors, and which defence was successful in the island. But these expenses, it is said, were paid twice over, the amount having been deducted from the proceeds of the sale of the ship, and such appears to have been the fact; but such deduction was made from the proceeds, which were the property of the captors, and not of the pursuer, or of Gibson & Company; and though apparently improperly made, no injury was thereby done to the pursuer. If the payments were properly made by Gibson & Company in the first instance, no right to recover back the amount can arise from their having been improperly placed to the account of, and so improperly paid by, the captors.

It was argued that this deduction, having been made by order of the Admiralty Court at Barbadoes, amounted to an adjudication that the sums ought to be paid out of the proceeds of the ship. This, however, does not appear to be so, the order of the Court of Admiralty being only to permit the deduction till the account should be settled; and it appears that no part of the 745*l.* paid to Dixon & Company came to the hands of the defender. These payments, too, are subject to the same observation, — that they were transactions with Gibson & Company, and not with the pursuer, and that they constitute only items in the account of the adventure, the illegality of which precludes all parties from asking the adjudication and assistance of the Court, and therefore equally precludes the discussion of any particular items of the account. For the same reason, and upon the same ground, I think the defender is precluded from claiming remuneration: indeed, * 740 as the pursuer recovers nothing in the action, * this claim of the defender cannot arise. The result, in my opinion, is, that the interlocutors appealed from by the defender in the action ought to be reversed, so far as they find him liable to pay any thing to the pursuer, and to pay costs to him. On the contrary, the pursuer ought to pay the costs below of the defender, as he was, by the interlocutor of the 14th of January, 1836, ordered to pay the costs of such part of the suit in which he was then held to have failed. Of course there can be no costs of the appeal by the defender. The appeal by the pursuer must, I think, be altogether dismissed, and with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I agree in the view taken by my noble and learned friend of this case. The whole rests manifestly upon the illegality of the transaction, it being unnecessary to have recourse to the other ground, though on that also I concur with my noble and learned friend, — I mean with respect to the partnership. It is not true, as it was attempted to be argued, that this decision respecting the illegality must rest upon importing into this cause the judgment in the Court of Common Pleas in the insurance case. (a) That judgment is not imported here. The authority of the case is upheld, but as to the facts we have no right to go to the Court of Common Pleas. We must apply that judgment as an authority in law to the facts found in this case; and the facts in this case are perfectly sufficient to enable us to apply to it the authority of the judgment in point of law, that judgment being upon the legality or illegality of the contract, and the facts in the case showing what the transactions were whereunto that contract bore reference. * The facts are stated in the * 741 eighth article of the pursuer's own condescendence. (b) It is needless to remind your Lordships that we have in this case nothing to do with the illegality of the slave trade; this transaction was some time before that trade was put down by law. The pursuer had shipped by a British vessel named the Croydon, from London, for the river Congo, a quantity of muskets and gunpowder, which were to be delivered to the defender or his order, he being the supercargo of the Washington, on their arrival in that river; and the defender, before he sailed in the Washington, received a bill of lading of those guns and powder. Of what guns and powder? Of the guns and powder shipped in the Croydon. Now, it was legal to ship those guns and powder in the Croydon, a British vessel; but it was illegal to ship them in the Washington, a foreign vessel; but, nevertheless, the supercargo, who had the management of the whole adventure, and who actually sailed in the Washington for the river Congo, received a bill of lading of those guns and powder, "which are accordingly (says the party himself) entered in the general invoice book of the adventure referred to in article fifth." And when we look to article fifth, we find it is a duplicate of the invoice book of the ship, cargo thereto relating, outfit and insurances, and "relative bill of lading conform to foresaid invoice book, signed by the master, David Adams, in favour of the defender (that is, Stewart) as supercargo;" so that it is perfectly manifest that this indissolubly connects the adventure in the Washington with the proceedings in reference to the cargo in the Croydon; and the

(a) Gibson v. Service, 1 Marsh. 119, and 5 Taunt. 433.

* 742 Court of Common Pleas thought that the * voyage of the Washington was, in fact, as much altogether an illegal voyage as if the cargo had been originally shipped (which it could not legally be) in the foreign vessel, the Washington, and not in the Croydon. And, as one of the learned Judges below very properly observed, there was nothing in this proceeding to prevent, instead of the transshipping of these goods (the powder and stores, and so on) in the river Congo, their being transhipped in the river Thames, and shipped to America in contravention of the order in council. The transshipment made in the river Congo to the Washington is alleged to have been contrary to the orders of the master of the cargo. But supposing he had landed the goods, as it was contended he had a right to do, and not put them on board the Washington, still the question is, whether the sending them to the river Congo in the Croydon was not merely colourable, in order that they might be under the control of the defender, who had the charge of the foreign vessel; and therefore it does not depend merely upon the fact, which is admitted, of his having taken the goods on board the Washington. It appears evidently what the intention of the parties throughout the whole was. And even if the goods had been landed, still the evidence would, in my opinion, have gone far to prove the illegality of the transaction.

"Ordered and adjudged by the Lords, &c., that the interlocutors complained of in the original appeal, in so far as they entertained any of the conclusions of the libel, and did not assoilzie D. Stewart from the whole of the said conclusions, with expenses of the action, be reversed; and that the said interlocutors, in so far as they find the said D. Stewart is not entitled to

* 743 * any remuneration for his services, be affirmed. And it was further ordered, that the expenses of the action in the Court below, in so far as the same relate to any claim made by the pursuer against the defender, be taxed according to the practice of the said Court, and be paid by the pursuer to the defender. And it was further ordered and adjudged, that the cross appeal be dismissed this House; and that the interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be affirmed. And it was also further ordered, that the appellants in the cross appeal pay to the respondent therein the costs incurred in respect of the cross appeal; the amount thereof to be ascertained by the clerk assistant."

Vicar. Endowment. Privy Tithes. Pleading.

To a vicar's bill for an account of all small tithes, the defendants answered that the right to all tithes, as well small as great, became vested in the rector, and in the owners of the lands by grants and conveyances, and that they and their tenants held the lands, with the tithes, or free from all tithes whatsoever; but that some occupiers paid annually to the vicar, in respect of their houses, certain small sums in the name of "privy tithes," which the defendants alleged were personal tithes, and not compositions for small tithes. The vicar, unable to produce an endowment, gave secondary evidence showing that the vicarage was endowed generally with small tithes. There was no evidence that any small tithes were ever paid to or claimed by the rector, or the persons who became entitled to the rectory. Held,

1. That the defendants, after failing to show title to the small tithes in themselves or the owners of the lands, could not be heard to say that the small payments in the name of privy tithes were compositions.
2. That, in the district in which those lands are situated, privy tithes are not personal tithes, but are the same as small tithes.

3. That where there is evidence that the vicarage was endowed with small tithes, the vicar's right to them is established against all occupiers of lands within the parish as to which no particular discharge is proved; although no small tithes have ever been paid by them.
4. Where any of the defendants proved a particular discharge of the lands in his occupation, or showed that they were originally part of the glebe lands, the vicar's bill against them was dismissed with costs, but without costs as to such defendants as did not set up and prove that defence in the Court below.

June 11, 14, 18, 19, 1838. June 1. August 4, 1840.

IN July, 1833, the respondent, as vicar of the parish of * 745 Tenbury, in the county of Worcester, filed three * bills in the Court of Exchequer against the above several sets of appellants, for accounts of the tithes in kind of all tithable matters, except corn and grain, taken by them respectively from the several farms and lands owned or occupied by them within the said vicarage and parish, since the institution and induction of the respondent thereto, in 1827. The vicarage of Tenbury comprises four hamlets or townships, viz., Tenbury Town, Tenbury Foreign, Berrington, and Sutton. The first of the sets of appellants are owners and occupiers of lands in Berrington; the second, in Tenbury Foreign; and the third, in Tenbury Town.
 Against such of the appellants as are owners or occupiers of lands in Sutton, the bills prayed accounts of tithes in kind of all tithable matters arising from their respective occupations therein.

The appellants, by their respective answers, denied the respondent's right to any tithes within the first three hamlets. They admitted that the rectory of Tenbury was formerly part of the possessions of the alien monastery of Lyra; that afterwards, upon the suppression of alien monasteries, it became part of the possessions of the monastery of Shene; and upon the dissolution of monasteries, it became vested in the Crown, and was granted by the Crown, in the 35th year of Henry VIII., with the tithes and appurtenances thereto belonging, together with divers lands and hereditaments, to Richard Andrews and Nicholas Temple, and the heirs and assigns of Andrews for ever. They alleged that, upon the appropriation of the rectory to the monastery of Lyra, a vicar of Tenbury was appointed, and a vicarage endowed with the great and small tithes of part of the hamlet of Sutton, but not with any tithes within the other three hamlets * 746 above-mentioned, the tithes of which, together * with the rectory and lands, after they became vested in Andrews, were disposed of by him, and the tithes have ever since belonged to those who were, from time to time, owners of the lands, and their tenants. They admitted that small payments had been made to the vicar, from time to time, by some, but not all the occupiers of farms in the said hamlets, in the names of "privy tithes;" which they said were payments in the nature of personal tithes, obventions, or oblations, by the occupiers of houses only, and not as compositions for tithes of any tithable matters arising within the said three hamlets.

The material parts of the pleadings and evidence on both sides are set forth in Messrs. Younge & Collyer's Reports, vol. 2, p. 153, together with Mr. Baron ALDERSON's judgment.

By his Lordship's decrees in the three causes, all dated the 28th of June, 1836, it was ordered and decreed that it be referred to the Master to take accounts of the tithable matters and things (other than and except corn, grain, and hay) had and taken by the appellants respectively from and upon their respective farms and lands since Michaelmas, 1827, and of the tithes thereof; and the Master was to set a value on such tithes, and state the sums due from the appellants respectively for the same: and it was ordered and decreed that what should be found due from the appellants respectively, upon taking the said accounts, should be answered and paid by them respectively to the respondent. And it was further ordered and decreed that it be referred to the Master to tax the said respondent his costs of the said suits, so far as regarded the respondent's claim to the tithes of the several matters and things of which accounts were directed; and that such costs, when taxed, * should be paid by the appel- * 747 lants. And it was ordered and decreed that the respondent's bills, so far as regarded his claim to the tithe of hay, be dismissed, with costs to be paid by him to the appellants.

The appeals were against these decrees (except so far as they dismissed the respondent's bills with costs, as far as they prayed accounts of tithes of hay), and they came to be heard on the 11th of June, 1838.

Mr. Boteler, of counsel for the respondent, addressing the House before any of the appeals were opened, asked their Lordships if they would hear two counsel for the appellants in each, the same point being raised in all.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — If the parties require it, they are all entitled to be heard ; but in that case the course the House would recommend is, that counsel should arrange among themselves who shall open the discussion.

Mr. Pemberton (with whom were Mr. Maule and Mr. Younge) said he was leading counsel in the first appeal, but of the other two he knew nothing. He then proceeded to open that appeal: the three bills were filed just before Lord TENTERDEN's Act (a) came into operation. There was no evidence in the causes that the respondent, as vicar of the parish of Tenbury, is entitled, by endowment, or usage, or prescription, to tithes of any matter whatsoever arising within the hamlet of Berrington, in which the most of the lands occupied by these appellants are situated. The respondent is the first vicar who demanded these tithes, which have been always considered to belong to the rector or to

* 748 the owners of the land. A vicar has *no common-law right to tithes; he is not like a rector, who is primâ facie entitled until another person shows a prior right. A vicar must show title. To support the claim in this case it was necessary to prove either an endowment, or usage amounting to evidence of endowment, of all tithes in the nature of small tithes. The effect of the evidence is, that occupiers of houses, and some occupiers of lands and houses, but not of lands only, have made uniform payments of small sums yearly to the vicar, — mere personal payments, under the denomination of “privy tithes.” They were called privatæ decimæ in the 26th of Henry VIII.; and the fair inference from the evidence is, that the payments still continued to the vicar are of the same nature. The receipts of the last vicar, produced at the hearing, were all expressed to be for “privy tithes,” which are mere personal tithes or oblations. They were called privy tithes in one of the terriers put in evidence by the respondent.

The decree has proceeded on the assumption that “privy tithes” and privatæ decimæ are identical with small tithes or decimæ minores. Mr. Baron ALDERSON thought “privy tithes,” in their ordinary meaning, would be the small or vicarial tithes; (b) and that is the meaning,” he says, “in which Blackstone (c) uses the words.” The form of expression, “which are, therefore, generally called privy or small tithes,” used by Blackstone in his succinct statement of the distinction between a rector and a vicar, although sufficient to convey to the student an idea of the vicar's right in contradistinction with the rector, was never intended to define privy or small tithes, or confound these different descriptions, or signify that they were synonymous or equivalent. In the same sentence, he says, * "the greater * 749 or predial tithes being still reserved to the rector:" surely greater and predial tithes are not the same. Blackstone teaches the principles of our laws, but uses very inaccurate language. Privy tithes are expressly distinguished from small tithes in the Ecclesiastical Survey, which was put in evidence in this cause, and which in one part, showing the value of this vicarage, has, "In libro suo comput. paschat. privatarum decimarum;" and in another part has these words, "In minoribus decimis, viz., porcorum anserum," &c. But inasmuch as this Ecclesiastical Survey distinctly mentions "oblations" as due to the vicar, his counsel in the Court below insisted that "privy tithes" could not, as the appellants contended, be taken to mean oblations or offerings. The short answer to that argument is, that small tithes, decimæ minores, are also distinctly mentioned in that document, and for that very reason they cannot be taken as synonymous with privy tithes.

The whole question seems to turn on the construction of the words "privy" and "private" tithes. All parties admit that they are a species of small tithes; but the respondent goes further, and insists that they include all small tithes; while the appellants submit that they are only personal tithes. Personal tithes are defined by the Stat. 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 13, § 7, and are ordered to be paid yearly at or before the feast of Easter. All tithes are divided by the common lawyers into majores seu grossæ decimæ, and minores seu minutæ decimæ. (a) No one can contend that privy or private tithes are coextensive with either branch of the division. The appellants say they were money payments to the vicar in addition to the Easter offerings, and were paid by persons occupying * houses within the * 750 parish, with or without lands. The evidence showed that some persons having lands did not pay them; and that others, having lands with houses, paid always the same amount, although the quantity of land in their occupation might have varied. Mr. Baron ALDERSON seemed to be of opinion that these payments were in the nature of compositions for small tithes; but that opinion was not supported by any part of the evidence, oral or documentary. There is no case in which privy tithes have been held to be small tithes, or compositions for small tithes; and in the Ecclesiastical Survey, the former description seems to be used in contradistinction to the latter.

It may be worth while to see how the words "privy" and "private" were used by the ancients. It will be found that privatus means a man's own, particular, peculiar, proper; the same as the Greek word ιδιος. The critical dictionaries annex to it, "quod unius cujusque proprium; privum; ei oppositur publicum aut commune." Suetonius has, "privatus sumptus." Petronius Arbiter has, "paupertatem nostram privatis quæstibus tentamus expellere." And Horace has, in the second epistle of the first book, "privatas ut quærat opes." The word privus likewise means particular, proper, peculiar to one's self. Martin, in his Philological Lexicon, annexes to the word, "quæ unius cujusque sunt." Livy, in the 43d chapter of book 30, has, "senatus consultum in hæc verba factum est, ut privos lapides silices, privasque verbenas secum ferrent." Horace has, in his first epistle, "quem ducet priva triremis." Neither privatus nor privus has been ever used to signify "small;" and, as applicable to tithes, the word always used to express that description is, minores, or minutæ decimæ. In several *records and enrolments of leases in the midland counties, cotemporary with the Ecclesiastical Survey of 27 Henry 8, "privy" tithes are used in the sense of "personal" tithes; it is in that sense the expression is used in the Ecclesiastical Survey and in the terrier; and the searches made by the appellants in a great number of vicarages establish the identity of the expressions in this case.

As to the Berrington Court farm, occupied by the appellant Clee; the render of the crops of the ridges and parcel of land on that farm to the vicar, or the money payment in lieu of the crops for a long series of years, as stated in Clee's answer, was distinctly proved; as were also the assertion by the respondent of his title to the ridges and parcel of land as owner, and to the money payment as a rent, and not tithe; and the ejectment brought by him against the tenant in possession, to recover the ridges and parcel of land; all which facts, the appellants submit, are inconsistent with the claim of the respondent to tithes of the Berrington Court farm.

The evidence in the cause distinctly proved, and it was not disputed, on the part of the respondent, that all the small tithes of certain lands in the hamlets of Tenbury Town and Tenbury Foreign had been conveyed together with those lands from a very remote period. And it was proved that the dwelling-house and land occupied by the appellant Davis, situate in Tenbury Town, formed part of the lands so conveyed together with the tithes thereof, and therefore not liable to the payment of small tithes to the vicar; and yet an account is decreed with costs as against Davis in respect of the last-mentioned dwelling-house and lands, as well as in respect of the farm and lands occupied by him in the township of Berrington.

* Even if the appellants had not satisfactorily proved * 752 that the respondent is not entitled to the tithes of any tithable matters in the township of Berrington, and if the respondent had proved (which the appellants submit he has not) that he is entitled to any tithes within that township, yet the effect of the evidence on the part of the respondent tended to prove the existence of moduses in lieu of the tithes of the farms and lands occupied by the appellants; that is, the payments stated in the pleadings to have been made under the denomination of privy tithes; and with such evidence the Court ought not to have decreed an account of tithes in kind.

If the House should not be of opinion that the bill ought to be dismissed, in that case the appellants further submit that an issue or issues ought to have been directed; and also that the rector ought to have been made a party to the suit. A decree made in his absence, and without his having an opportunity to assert his rights, would not protect the appellants from any claim by him in respect of the tithes, of which an account is decreed in favour of the respondent.

Mr. Maule was heard on the same side.

Mr. Boteler and Mr. Simpkinson (with whom was Mr. Bethell), for the respondent. — The vicar stands on his legal right to all the small tithes of the three hamlets, and to all the tithes, as well great as small, of the fourth, except, perhaps, the tithe of hay; in lieu of which he is entitled to a composition. That claim of right is supported by the evidence in the cause, both the ancient documents and the parol testimony. The payments made to the respondent's predecessors by occupiers of lands in the three hamlets, in the name * of "privy tithes," * 753 were payments of compositions for small tithes. The terms privy tithes are synonymous with small tithes, in the parish of Tenbury and in the whole county of Worcester. The argument for the appellants, that "privy tithes" are money payments in the nature of personal tithes, oblations, and offerings, is refuted by the very fact that, besides and above the payments of privy tithes, other payments, including personal tithes and offerings, have been always made to the vicar in the name of "Easter dues," in every year; so that in practice in this very parish they are distinct payments. The admission by the appellants, that the payments of privy tithes were uniform in amount, shows that they were compositions for small tithes. "In libro suo computato," are the words in the Ecclesiastical Survey. Pope Nicholas's Taxation, the Nonæ Rolls, and the Ecclesiastical Survey, all put in evidence by the respondent, clearly support his claim. He did not make the improper rector a party to the suit, because he wanted nothing of the rector, who claims only the tithes of corn and grain in the three hamlets, and the appellants insist that the small tithes belong to themselves or to their landlords.

In the old edition of Jacob's Law Dictionary, "privy tithes" are taken to signify vicarial tithes; and Tomlins retains that description in his edition. Blackstone, in the first volume of his Commentaries (p. 387), and after him Mr. Eagle, in his book, mention privy tithes and small tithes as meaning the same thing. And they are so mentioned indiscriminately in a great number of decided cases: Ekins v. Dormer, (a) Coe v. Mason, (b) Hastings v. Goldwyer, (c) Fleetwood v. Livesey, (d) Dyde v. Kinch, (e) * Walter v. Flint, (g) Allen v. Critcheley, (h) Warner v. Fisher, (i) Lord Stawel v. Atkins, (k) and Boulter v. Thackwell. (l) These cases leave no room to doubt that generally privy tithes mean small tithes; and indeed, in common acceptation, "privy" and "small" are used synonymously. It would be easy to multiply quotations from ancient authors to show that meaning, as well as the signification contended for by the appellants. The passage cited from Livy bears that meaning. The priva triremis (his own galley), in the 93d line of the first epistle of Horace, was used in contradistinction to conducto navigio, in the preceding line. In the fifth satire of the second book we find this passage, teaching the secret of growing rich : —

“ Accipe qua ratione queas ditescere. Turdus
Sive aliud privum dabitur tibi, devolet illuc
Res ubi magna nitet domino sene.”

There privum can have no other meaning than small.

The evidence produced in the cause by the appellants themselves confirms the case made by the respondent; the receipts produced by them from the former vicar show that they were given for moneys paid for small tithes, in the name of “privy tithes.” The title-deeds produced by them relating to the impropriate rectory, restrict the title of the impropriate rectors to the tithes of corn and grain and hay; the only instance, in which any other tithes were in these deeds expressed to be conveyed, was where the tithes conveyed were the tithes of the parsonage or glebe lands belonging to the rectory. No cause or origin has been shown, or even suggested, for the *payments * 755 made to the vicar throughout the three hamlets, except the right he has to the small tithes of these hamlets.

Mr. Pemberton replied. — The cases referred to do not decide that privy tithes are small tithes. The quotation from Horace establishes the meaning sought to be affixed to the word privus by the appellants. Privum there means peculiar, particular, and has been so understood in the popular translation of Horace, by Mr. Francis, who translates it “dainty.”

July 1, 1840.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, in this case of Clee and Others v. Hall, it appears to me particularly important to attend to the defences set up in the answers of the appellants. They all claim title in themselves, or in those under whom they hold their lands, to the tithes demanded by the vicar; and they all, except Clee, George, and Blacklock, admit payment of small annual sums to the vicar, under the name of privy tithes. Against such defences it is certainly necessary for the vicar to show his title to the tithes claimed; but if he succeed in so doing, it is not competent for the defendants, upon such pretences as they have alleged, to set up moduses or compositions.

The defendants have totally failed in showing any title to those tithes in themselves, or in those whose lands they hold. There seems to be some reason for supposing that some of the lands, held by Roberts, Powles, George, Davis, and Price, were formerly part of the rectory; but they have not proved that the small tithes in question were granted with the lands, or have since been conveyed with them. It is, indeed, stated in * 756 the appellants' case, that one * of the houses in Tenbury Town, comprised in one of the deeds proved in the cause, was traced to the defendant Davis; but I do not find any evidence that any of the lands occupied by any of the defendants had been conveyed with the tithes in question. All the defendants, therefore, have failed in this their principal defence, namely, title in themselves to the tithes in dispute.

But it is still open to the appellants to insist that the vicar has failed in proving any title in himself. No endowment being produced, the vicar is at liberty to establish his title by other evidence. That there was a vicarage endowed before the year 1291, appears from Pope Nicholas's Taxation. The tenth of the church was taxed at two marks, and the tenth of the vicarage at one mark. The Ecclesiastical Survey is not very intelligible by itself; but it becomes less so, when it is considered that the vicar appears to have all the tithes of a district called Sutton. When, therefore, the Ecclesiastical Survey speaks, in one place, of tithes of sheaves and hay, and in another, of lesser tithes, to wit, pigs, geese, et cetera, it may be referring altogether to Sutton; otherwise it might be inferred that the privy tithes spoken of were something different from the lesser tithes. This establishes the fact that the vicar at that time was entitled to some endowment under the name of "privy tithes."

The Parliamentary Survey and the first terrier afford no information, but the second terrier is very important. It states that the vicarage has one portion of tithes from Sutton and privy tithes from the rest of the parish. The fact that the vicarage was endowed with some description of tithes from the parish generally is, I think, from these documents, sufficiently * 757 established. Of the payment of small sums, as for * privy tithes, there is no dispute; the receipts go back as early as 1763, and in 1784 the payment is described as a modus for the small tithes. The same occurs in 1796; but in general the term "privy tithes" is used.

As these small tithes must have originally formed a part of the rectory, and as the question is whether they were at an early period separated from the rectory as an endowment of the vicarage, it is material to ascertain whether they have been treated as still belonging to the rectory. The earlier documents, such as the grant to Andrews and Temple, in the 35th of Henry 8, prove nothing, as general terms only are used, such as "all tithes to the rectory belonging;" but in subsequent conveyances, such as the fines in the 26th of Chas. 2 and the 2d of Anne, and the recovery in the 11th of Anne, there is a description of the advowson of the church of Tenbury, and all and all manner of tithes and sheaves, grain and hay; and there is no evidence that any small tithes from any of these lands were ever claimed by the persons entitled to the rectory.

It is true that conveyances were produced from Millward, Corbett, and Hayle, who claimed under Andrews and Temple, of particular lands, with all tithes, as well great as small, as are within the premises; but from the preceding conveyance of the 13th of April, in the 19th of James, there is good reason for believing that these lands were parcel of the glebe, which may well be supposed to have been excepted from the endowment of the vicarage; and these form no part of the lands of the defendants.

These ancient documents, taken by themselves, would constitute strong evidence of the vicarage being *endowed *758 with the small tithes generally, by proving that the vicar was entitled to some tithes called "privy tithes," and that the small tithes had not (except in some few instances, not in question in this cause) been conveyed with the rectory as tithes; and the parol testimony strongly confirms these deductions from the documentary evidence, as it proves the payment of these sums called "privy tithes," and that they are different from Easter offerings; and the small tithes have never been paid to the owners of the great tithes.

As to the meaning of the term "privy tithes," many authorities and instances were produced to show that the term was often used as synonymous with small tithes; proving, I think, satisfactorily, that they cannot be understood to mean personal tithes, which is the meaning contended for by the appellants; and there is parol evidence that the term is understood in the district in which these lands are situated, to mean small tithes. It is true, that as to some of the defendants there is no evidence of any payment of privy tithes having been made by them; but the question is, whether there be sufficient secondary evidence of the vicarage having been endowed with the small tithes ; because, if there be sufficient evidence of such endowment, the vicar's right will be established as against all lands as to which no particular discharge is proved, although no small tithes have ever been paid for such lands. The cases of Kennicot v. Watson, (a) and Masters v. Fletcher, (b) establish this proposition. Upon the whole, therefore, I think the decree of the Court of Exchequer right, and that it should be affirmed, with costs.

* 759 * It was ordered accordingly, that the appeal of Clee and Others v. Hall be dismissed ; and that the decree appealed from be affirmed, with costs.

GODSON v. HALL.

August 4.

The further hearing of the two appeals of Godson and Others, and Wheeler and Others v. Hall, being appointed for this day, (c) —

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Swanston, and Mr. Godson attended for the appellants ; Mr. Boteler and Mr. Bethell, for the respondent. — The counsel for the appellants admitted that the question in these appeals on the merits was the same as that which was disposed of in Clee and Others v. Hall, and that the principle of the decision in that case governed these ; but they showed that several of the appellants, in the case of Godson and Others v. Hall, held lands which were either glebe lands, or were conveyed, with all the tithes, by some of the deeds produced in the cause.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — Some of these appellants had a particular ground of defence, which was not brought before the Court. It might be in their counsel's brief, but the Court did not know any thing of it. At present it appears that the land of Barnes, who holds under Pembroke College, is altogether withdrawn from the suit ; and so also are Russell's four acres, which are part of the glebe lands ; and all Cooke's, which are also a piece of the glebe. It appears to me that these appellants set up a good defence to the suit, and that they stated that from

* 760 the beginning, * and that the bill ought to be dismissed

(a) 2 Price, 250 ; 3 E. & Y. 690.

(b) Younge, 25.

(c) Vide supra, p. 549.

with costs as to them; but as they did not ask for the opinion of the Court below on this case, their having to come here is their own fault, and so the costs of the appeal must not be given to them.

After some further discussion between counsel as to the situation of the lands occupied by other appellants, and the evidence of their exemption from tithes, —

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The right course will be as to some of the parties, — those who are not proved to be in possession of the lands which form part of the premises comprised in the conveyances embracing the tithes, — that, as to them, the decree must be affirmed, with costs. With respect to the defendants Cooke and Barnes, the bill must be dismissed; and I think that, as they set up a complete answer to the suit, the bill must be, as against them, dismissed, with costs. There was not any good case as against them; and to that case, such as it was, they stated a good defence. With regard to the costs of the appeal, those parties who succeeded in altering the decree must be exempted from the payment of those costs. With respect to those who hold glebe lands, the decree must be altered, so far as they are concerned, by excluding from the effect of the decree that part of their lands which is conveyed with the great and small tithes. Two parties have succeeded altogether in withdrawing their lands from the effect of the decree, and those who have so succeeded must not be called on to pay costs, while those who have not so succeeded must pay costs; and those who have succeeded in showing their lands not to be liable must have the costs of the suit below.

The order made in the appeal of Godson and Others v. Hall was, that the decree complained of, as to the appellants Cooke and Barnes, be reversed, and that the respondent's bill as to them be * dismissed, with costs; that the said decree as * 761 to the appellants Russell, Smith, and Benbow, be in part reversed, and that the respondent's bill as to them be in part dismissed, with costs; that is to say, as to Russell, in so far as the bill and decree relate to four acres and twenty-seven perches of his land, being part of the parsonage lands purchased by Penry Williams, Esq., and as to Smith, so far as the bill and decree relate to one acre and three quarters of his lands, being also parcel of the said parsonage lands, and as to Benbow, in so far as the bill and decree relate to a dwelling-house and buildings and eleven acres of land held by Benbow under Pembroke College; that the decree as to these three appellants in respect of all other houses and lands in their respective occupation be affirmed; and that, as to all the rest of the appellants, except those five above named, the appeal be dismissed, and the decree affirmed, with costs. — 72 Lords' Journals (for 1840), p. 598.

WHEELER v. HALL.

August 4.

After some discussion between counsel on the claims of exemption by some of the parties appellants in the case of Wheeler and Others v. Hall, —

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — As to the case of Wheeler and Others v. Hall, that is a case where the defendants merely denied the vicar's title, but did not make any title in themselves. The parties here are in the same situation as the parties in Clee and Others v. Hall, and must have the same rule applied to them.

It was ordered accordingly, that the appeal of Wheeler and Others v. Hall be dismissed, and the decree complained of be affirmed, with costs.

ALEXANDER DONALDSON Appellant.
 Misses JANE HALDANE and ISABELLA HALDANE Respondents.

Attorney. His Duty and Liability.

An attorney, who was the ordinary attorney for a borrower, also acted in the matter of a particular loan for the lender, but did not make any charge against the lender for his services. The security he took was not sufficient. Held, that he was properly charged as an attorney acting on the retainer and employment of the lender, and was in that character liable to an action for damages for the loss suffered through the insufficiency of the security.¹

After the death of the lender, two of his sisters, by an arrangement with the rest of the family, who were the legatees of the lender, became possessed of the security, and applied to the attorney to do what was necessary. The means taken to secure the repayment of the loan, on this continuation of it, were insufficient.

Held, that as representing the interest of the deceased, and on their own account, the sisters were entitled to compensation from the attorney.

June 2, 1837. August 3, 1840.

THE appellant in this case (the defendant in the suit below) was a writer to the signet, and had been employed in that capacity as attorney for Mr. Henry Haldane, now deceased. The summons in the suit stated that the late Mr. Henry Haldane, the brother of the pursuers, being in the year 1823 desirous of investing a sum of 2000*l.* on heritable security, consulted with the appellant, and employed him to look out for a safe and profitable investment for the said sum: that Archibald Dunlop, distiller at Haddington, for whom the appellant also acted as agent, had, in the year 1815, obtained from the magistrates and town council of the burgh of Haddington, as representing the community thereof, a lease for twice * ninety-nine years of a field belonging to * 763 the said burgh, on which Dunlop had subsequently erected a distillery and other buildings: that in 1818 Dunlop had borrowed a sum of 2000*l.* from an individual of the name of Cunningham, on the security of an assignation to the lease above mentioned: that, in the course of the communications betwixt Haldane and the appellant, in regard to the investment of the 2000*l.*, the appellant advised Haldane, that a transference in his favour of the assignment of the lease would form a valid and effectual real security to him, the said Henry Haldane, over the subjects in question: that Haldane did, in consequence, professionally employ the appellant to invest the 2000*l.* on the said security, as being a good and effectual real security: that the appellant accepted this employment, and prepared a transference accordingly, as security for 2000*l.* paid over by Haldane to Cunningham, the previous holder of the security: that it was the duty of the appellant to take steps for having the right in the lease so conveyed made an effectual real right in the person of Haldane, so as to be preferable to any other rights subsequently granted or acquired over the property; and this, either by intimating the same to the landlords, and at the same time taking measures for putting Haldane in the possession, natural or civil, of the said subjects, or by such other steps as were required by law; but that the defender, in violation of his professional duty, took no steps, or at least no sufficient steps, for this purpose, and the said assignation to the lease remained a merely personal and incomplete right: that Haldane died in December, 1826, and his interest in the loan of 2000*l.* and the security became vested in the respondents: that the respondents consulted and

 * 764 * advised with the said appellant in relation to the said sum, and the mode in which they should proceed regarding it: that, antecedently to this period, the subjects in question, held, as above-mentioned, by Dunlop, had been disposed by way of feu by the magistrates of Haddington, by feu-disposition, in July, 1826, to Dunlop, who thereon became absolute proprietor of the same, and was regularly infeft thereon: that the respondents were ready to call up from Dunlop the sum of 2000*l.*, but that the appellant, who still acted as agent for Dunlop, advised the respondents that it would be expedient and profitable for them to allow the money to remain with Dunlop; and, instead of the assignment of the lease, to take a heritable bond and disposition in security over the property, to be granted by the said Archibald Dunlop, as proprietor thereof: that the appellant did not then, or at any other time, inform the pursuers of the defective nature of the original security, but represented that the money would be safely invested on a heritable bond and disposition, granted as aforesaid by the said Archibald Dunlop: that the respondents did, in consequence, professionally employ the appellant to invest the 2000*l.* on the said security, as being a good and effectual real security: that the defender accepted this professional employment, and prepared a bond and disposition in security over the property, in favour of the respondents, which bond was subscribed by Dunlop on 4th February, 1828, and on which infestment was passed by the appellant in favour of the respondents on the 5th, and recorded on the 8th, of the said month: that in consequence of the bond having been granted in the respondents' favour, the assignment of the lease was given up to Dunlop *and cancelled: that in this transaction the respondents * 765 relied on the professional skill and diligence of the appellant in making the bond and infestment a good and sufficient security; and trusted that they thereby held an effectual right over the said subjects, preferable to all other real rights whatever: that the respondents have recently discovered that the said security was not a good and sufficient heritable security, or such as any professional person of ordinary prudence would, in the fair discharge of his duty, have accepted on behalf of his employers; and more especially, there had been granted by Dunlop, over the said subjects, certain other heritable bonds and dispositions, or other real rights, which were prior in date to that in favour of the respondents, and preferable thereto; and, in particular, a bond and disposition in security, in favour of the British Linen Company Bank, in security of a loan of 15,000*l.*, dated 30th August, 1826, and whereon infestment followed on the 4th, and was recorded the 6th September of the same year. And also another bond and disposition in security, granted in favour of William Dunlop, merchant in Edinburgh, and John Tweedie, writer to the signet, for relief to them of sums amounting to 8500*l.* of principal, besides other sums of interest and premiums of insurance, dated 10th October, 1826, and followed by infestment, dated 20th October, and recorded 28th November of the said year: that, at the time of preparing the above-mentioned bond in favour of the respondents, the said appellant, in violation of his professional duty, omitted to search the records in order to discover prior incumbrances: that the value of the subjects in question is so much exhausted by the prior and preferable securities as to leave nothing for the security held by the respondents, *and, in fact, not to be sufficient even to * 766 satisfy the prior and preferable rights. The summons then alleged a loss of the principal and interest of the sum lent; and after charging, on account of the appellant's connection with Dunlop, more than merely incautious and negligent conduct on the part of the appellant, prayed that he might be decreed to make good the loss so sustained, with costs.

The defences for the appellant in the Court below consisted of a general denial of liability in law and in fact; and he alleged that when the change in Dunlop's tenure of the property from leasehold to freehold was made, it was matter of notoriety in Haddington, where Mr. Haldane resided, was well known to himself, and was frequently the subject of conversation between him and Mr. Dunlop: that, at Mr. Dunlop's request, the appellant then intimated to Mr. Haldane that the 2000*l.* owing to him would then be paid, unless he wished the money to remain with Mr. Dunlop on his personal security. The appellant, at the same time, stated to Mr. Haldane that, according to the opinion he entertained, Mr. Dunlop's right of lease had merged in his feudal right, and was incapable of affording a real security. Mr. Haldane stated that he was quite satisfied with Mr. Dunlop's personal security, and felt obliged by his retaining the money; for which, as was then thought, so secure an investment could not easily have been obtained.

After Mr. H. Haldane's death, the appellant alleged that he wrote the following letter to Mr. John Haldane, who had then the management of the respondents' affairs:—

“ I think you will find the enclosed a correct copy of Mr. Dunlop's bond to your late brother. In explanation of
 * 767 what I said yesterday, I may mention * that the assignation never was intimated to the magistrates, and that, in point of fact, the lease was virtually renounced three months before your brother's death, by Mr. Dunlop's becoming feudal proprietor of the ground on which the distillery is built. Mr. D. was very anxious to change the tenure by which he held this property, and applied to the town council to give him a feu-right in place of a lease, offering 20*l.* annually in addition. This was evidently beneficial for the town, but they could not enter into the transaction without exposing the ground for sale. It was then bought by Mr. Todrick for Mr. Dunlop, and afterwards transferred to the latter, and he was infeft in August, 1826. I mentioned to your brother that, in my opinion, he no longer held any security beyond Mr. Dunlop's personal obligation, and that Mr. D. would pay him up the money at the ensuing Martinmas, if he wished it; but he said that he was quite satisfied with Mr. D.'s own security. Under the circumstances now stated, I do not think this can be viewed in any other light than a personal bond."

He also alleged that, in the transaction with Dunlop, he was the attorney for that person, and not for Mr. H. Haldane, against whom he had never made any charge for the labour then performed: and finally, he denied the title of the respondents to claim as the representatives of Mr. H. Haldane; for he alleged that that gentleman left a will made in the English form, which would not have passed this security, if it had been a real security, to the respondents, and that they took it not under the terms of that will, but by an arrangement in the family, which proceeded on the express ground of this being not a real but a personal security.

* The cause was heard before Lord FULLERTON as Lord * 768 Ordinary, and he made a decree (afterwards confirmed by the Court of session) declaring the appellant liable. The present was an appeal against that decree.

Sir W. Follett and Dr. Lushington, for the appellant. — The conveyance was in the first instance correctly executed; and beyond that the appellant undertook no responsibility. But if intimation to the landlord of the security granted upon the lease was required, that had been sufficiently complied with by the notice given to the magistrates upon the execution of the security to Cunningham, and all the rights which Cunningham possessed were completely transferred to Haldane upon the execution of the assignment of the lease. Haldane, in fact, to all intents and purposes, stood in the situation of Cunningham, entitled to his rights and subject to his liabilities. But, strictly speaking, the appellant has a right to deny his employment by Haldane, and therefore to deny his liability altogether. He was the law agent of the grantor and not of the grantee, and neither charged nor received any compensation for his trouble for the latter. Then, again, the fact that the security was not a real but a personal security, was known to Mr. Henry Haldane in his lifetime, and he expressed himself as contented with the personal security of Mr. Dunlop. In order to recover from the appellant compensation for any alleged loss, he ought to have given notice to the appellant of his dissatisfaction with the security, so that the agent might have had the opportunity of obtaining relief by taking the subject off his client's hands. Hunter v. Fleming & Strang, 11th December, 1829. The respondents can

 * 769 * stand in no better situation than Mr. Haldane, from whom they claim to derive title ; and as he could not have recovered against the appellant, neither can they, but must be bound by his acquiescence. But in truth the respondents here do not represent Mr. Haldane, for he did not make them devisees of this security : they came into possession of it by a family arrangement made among the survivors of Mr. Haldane, and they are therefore not entitled to claim damages for a loss that happened, if at all, to his estate, which in no manner whatever do they legally represent : so that taken either way they must fail. If they represent Mr. Haldane, they are concluded by his acts, and cannot recover : if they do not represent him, they have no title to complain of a loss which happened in his lifetime and to his estate.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Hope Maclean, for the respondents. — The summons here properly charges the appellant with having been retained as attorney for Mr. Haldane, and that he accepted that employment. If so, his liability to answer for the skilful and careful discharge of his duties is too clear to be doubted. That principle was fully and clearly stated in this House in Stephenson v. Rowand, (a) and the Scotch cases are all in accordance with it. Struthers v. Lang (b) and Brown v. Cuthill. (c) Then comes the question whether Mr. H. Haldane was aware of the fact that the security was only a personal security, and was content that it should be so. There is no direct proof that he was ; and whatever he may have said in a general
 * 770 way as to his being satisfied with * the security, was, no doubt, a statement made by him on the faith of the representations and the advice given him by the appellant. There is, therefore, nothing which can affect the right of the respondents. The case was considered quite clear in the Court below, the judgment in which proceeded on a principle distinctly laid down by this House.

Sir W. Follett, in reply. — The employment of the attorney must be an employment for profit, — a mere gratuitous acting, — where, in fact, the attorney was the attorney of the other party, will not make him liable. Besides, it is plain here that he did what was at the time satisfactory to Mr. Haldane, who was aware of the nature of the security, and was content with it. Those who take under Mr. Haldane cannot now turn round and impose on the appellant what that gentleman had never thought of imposing.

August 3, 1840.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The first question in this case is, whether the appellant was liable in an action for damages in respect of certain transactions which took place in 1823, when money was first advanced by a client of the appellant, and, as it is alleged, under his advice: and the second is, whether he is liable in respect of the transaction of 1827, when the loan was continued by the sisters of the former client, — those ladies, as it is stated, also placing themselves under the advice of the appellant. The security for the loan ought to have been on certain leases of land demised to the borrower, and an assignment of the lease was obtained; but in order to complete it, there should have been notice of the assignment given to the lessors. That was not done; and that is one of the grounds of the * action. It is said that the respondents do not represent * 771 the original lender, H. Haldane; and therefore that they cannot claim here compensation for a loss suffered by that person in his lifetime. I am not of opinion with the appellant on that point. In October, 1827, a letter was written by the appellant to some of the respondents' family, to the effect that the appellant had, after the change of Dunlop's tenure of the property in 1826, informed Mr. H. Haldane that the security he had received had become nothing more than a personal bond; and that Mr. H. Haldane had then stated to the appellant that he was satisfied with Mr. Dunlop's personal security. If that was so, it was most probably under the advice of the appellant; and if the advice was wrong, the money was lost by his mistake, and he must be held responsible for it. The ladies were willing to lend, or rather to continue to lend, the money at interest, if they could get a good security for it. Now it appears that no means were taken by the appellant to effect that object, independently of obtaining the personal security of the owner of the property; and from the want of care in this respect the loss has arisen. It therefore appears to me that I ought to advise your Lordships to affirm the interlocutor; but I do not think that the circumstances require that it should be affirmed with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I quite agree with my noble and learned friend. It is impossible to get over these letters, in which the appellant appears to act for the Misses Haldane after their brother's death. It appears that he had not made any charge, and his conduct in volunteering his services does incline one to think that the liability he incurred in point of law is some-
 * 772 what hard upon him; but still I cannot doubt that * he is liable. There have, however, in this case, been unwarranted attacks on the character of a professional gentleman; and that circumstance induces me to agree that costs ought not to be given.

Interlocutor affirmed, without costs.

LA TOUCHE v. EARL OF LUCAN.

Creditors. Trust-Deed. Cestui que Trust.

¹ In Synnot v. Simpson, 5 H. L. Cas. 149, Lord ST. LEONARDS said: "The cases of Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale and La Touche v. Lord Lucan show that some distinct act of dealing with the creditors must take place, in order to entitle the latter to trusts." See Montefiore v. Browne, 7 H. L. Cas. 241; Perry Trusts, § 593; Simmonds v. Palles, 2 Jo. & Lat. 489; Cosser v. Radford, 1 De G., J. & S. 585; Evans v. Bagwell, 4 Dru. & W. 398; Browne v. Cavendish, 1 Jo. & Lat. 606; Whitmore v. Turquand, 3 De G., F. & J. (Am. ed.) 107, note (1); Forbes v. Limond, 4 De G., M. & G. 298; Russell v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 408; Widgery v. Haskell, 5 Mass. 144; Stephens v. Ball, 6 Mass. 339. As to the doctrine upon this point in the United States, see Whitmore v. Turquand, 3 De G., F. & J. (Am. ed.) 107, note (1); Perry Trusts, § 593, and cases cited.

A. executed a trust-deed, appointing B. trustee for certain purposes therein stated, one of which was for the payment of creditors, and another was to raise a sum of money by way of mortgage, in order to satisfy a claim for rent due in respect of A.'s lands, then about to be enforced by ejectment. B. obtained from C. an advance of money with which he satisfied this claim. B. afterwards gave to C. a letter, written subsequently to, but dated before the day of the advance; in which, appearing to ask for the advance, he said, "I will consider such advance as raised by me under the power given me; and will, whenever you please, exercise that power, by securing such advance in the best manner I am empowered by the deed."

No security was ever executed by B.

Held, that C. did not stand in the situation of a cestui que trust under the deed, and could not maintain a bill in equity, calling on B. to execute the trust of the deed.

August 3, 6, 7.

SIR NEAL O'DONEL the elder, baronet, deceased, being seised of certain lands in the county of Mayo, known by the name of the Newport freehold estate, for a term of three lives renewable for ever, at the yearly rent of 980*l.* of the late currency of Ireland, and being also seised in fee of certain other lands in the counties of Mayo and Galway, by deeds of lease and release, the release bearing date the 10th day of * October, * 773 1798, conveyed these several estates, subject to certain annuities, to the use of himself for life, with remainders to his first and second sons, and their sons; and on failure of them, to Neal O'Donel, the settlor's third son, for life, with remainder to his first and every other son in tail male, with divers remainders over. And by said deed a sum of 10,000*l.* was charged on said estates for any daughter of Hugh O'Donel, one of the settlor's sons, and a term of 500 years was thereby created for securing the charge; and Sir Neal the elder reserved to himself a power to charge the estates with a sum of 14,000*l.* (and which power he afterwards executed); and a schedule was annexed to said deed, containing the several sums due by Sir Neal O'Donel, bart., and chargeable upon the estates.

Hugh O'Donel died in the lifetime of his father, without any male issue, leaving an only daughter, who survived him, and became entitled to the benefit of the sum of 10,000*l.*, which was secured by the trust term; and the other son having also died without issue, and Sir Neal O'Donel the elder having died in the year 1810, Neal O'Donel the younger thereupon became Sir Neal O'Donel, baronet, and entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said estates under the limitations of the settlement, subject to the charges of 10,000*l.* and of 14,000*l.*, and to the scheduled debts.

The Marquis of Sligo being entitled to the rent and reversion of the Newport freehold estate, brought an ejectment in Easter term, 1825, for non-payment of the rent; and Sir Neal O'Donel having given a consent for judgment in the ejectment suit, afterwards, on the 10th November in the same year, exhibited his bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery of Ireland against
 * 774 the Marquis of Sligo and others, praying that * he might be at liberty to redeem the premises upon payment of the rent then justly due and owing to said Marquis of Sligo.

Sir Neal O'Donel being so indebted to the marquis for rent, and to several other persons in large sums of money for interest then due on the encumbrances comprised in the schedule to the deed of the 10th of October, 1798, and on the other encumbrances created by that deed, and being also largely indebted on his own account, in the month of October of the said year, 1825, gave his solicitor, William Furlong, instructions to prepare a deed, vesting his interest during his life in the said several estates in a trustee or trustees, for the purpose of raising a sum of money sufficient to discharge the arrears of rent and the other demands to which he was liable, and also to charge the estates with annuities for the necessary support of himself and family.

In the month of December of said year, or in the beginning of January, 1826, while the trust-deed was being prepared, several overtures (according to the statement of the appellant) were made to Sir Neal O'Donel on the part of the respondent, then Lord Bingham, who had declared himself a candidate for the representation in Parliament of the county of Mayo at the election which was then about to take place, for his support and influence; and with a view to enable the respondent to use such influence to the best advantage, it was proposed that he should be appointed a trustee in conjunction with the appellant in the trust-deed; the respondent and his friends undertaking to procure a loan of money sufficient to relieve Sir Neal O'Donel from his embarrassments, and more particularly to enable him to lodge in Court the rent and costs claimed by Lord Sligo.

* 775 For this purpose, negotiations * were carried on between the respondent and those acting for him, and Sir Neal O'Donel and his friends, to which the appellant was neither party nor privy; but such treaty having been broken off, an indenture, bearing date the 13th day of February, 1826, was made between Sir Neal O'Donel, of the one part, and the appellant of the other part; whereby, after reciting that Sir Neal O'Donel was tenant for life of the said estates, subject to the rent payable to the Marquis of Sligo, and to the several debts and encumbrances specified in the first schedule to the deed annexed, on which a considerable arrear of interest had been suffered to accrue due, and being indebted to the several persons and to the respective amounts in the second schedule thereunto annexed specified, had proposed to vest said estates in the appellant, in trust for the uses and purposes in the deed set forth; and he, Sir Neal O'Donel the younger, had therefore conveyed unto the appellant, and to his heirs and assigns, the Newport freehold estate, then held under the Marquis of Sligo, subject to the rent of 980*l.*, and the Cong and Newport fee-simple estates, to hold the same for the life of Sir Neal O'Donel the younger, "Upon trust, in the first place, thereout to retain and reimburse himself or themselves, all and every sum and sums of money advanced, or to be advanced, by him or them, out of his or their own moneys, in part execution of the trusts hereby reposed, together with legal interest thereon; and also all costs, &c., incurred in preparing these presents, or in any way relating thereto, or in performance of the trusts thereof, &c.; and then in the payment and satisfaction of all arrears of quit-rents, chief and other rents, or rent-charges, now due or to grow due thereout, and all costs incurred or to be incurred in respect thereof. And

* upon this further trust, that the said Peter Digges La * 776 Touche, or such other trustee or trustees as aforesaid, shall be at liberty (if he or they shall deem it expedient so to do) to raise, by way of mortgage, annuity, rent-charge, or other disposition of the said manors, towns, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises, or any part or parts thereof, for the life of the said Sir Neal O'Donel, as they may find convenient or practicable, any sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of 10,000*l.*; the same to be applied in payment of the arrears of rents or of the interest of the encumbrances affecting the said estates in said first schedule mentioned; and of the interest of any other subsisting and valid debt or encumbrance now affecting them, or any of them, prior to the life-estate therein of the said Sir Neal O'Donel; and, in the next place, in payment of the several debts of the said Sir Neal O'Donel in the said second schedule mentioned, and of any other bonâ fide debt due at the day of the date of these presents by the said Sir Neal, in such order of a year; the said last mentioned 500*l.* to be payable only from the time of such appointment, and in case there shall be a sufficient sum remaining of the annual rents of said lands and premises after making the several other annual payments thereout herein before directed; and in the next place, to pay off such of the aforesaid debts of the said Sir Neal O'Donel as may then remain unpaid, and as specified in the second schedule hereunto annexed, the same to be paid in such manner as shall appear to the said trustee most advisable. And after payment of the several outgoings herein before mentioned, the residue of the said rents, issues, and profits, during the continuance of these presents, to be laid out as the said trustee or trustees may deem most expedient, to accumulate as a fund either to discharge or pay back the sum or sums that may be raised under the power aforesaid, or, with the consent in writing of the said Sir Neal O'Donel, to pay off any of the debts or encumbrances affecting the said

* 780 estates, specified in *the said first schedule, that may be called in by the person or persons entitled thereto, or which it may be proper to pay off for the purpose of reducing the rate of interest to be paid thereon in future; such debt or encumbrance when so paid to be assigned to a trustee for the said Sir Neal O'Donel, and the said Sir Neal O'Donel to be an executing and consenting party to all such assignments."

The first item of charge in the first schedule was the arrear in respect of the rent of 980*l.*, which, with the costs, was to be paid in preference to any other demands out of the first moneys to be raised pursuant to the powers given for that purpose by the annexed deed.

The second schedule annexed to the deed related to the debts of Sir Neal O'Donel.

On the 13th of March, 1826, pursuant to an order for that purpose made in the redemption suit, a sum of 4002*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* old government 3½ per cent stock, being the property of Richard Earl of Lucan, the father of respondent, was transferred to the credit of said redemption suit. The appellant was alleged to have been ignorant of such transfer, or any negotiations respecting same, until he was informed thereof by William Furlong, the solicitor of Sir Neal O'Donel, on the 17th March, 1826.

On the 13th June, 1826, shortly previous to the election for the county of Mayo, which took place in that month, Richard Livesay, the solicitor of Lord Lucan, called at the office of William Furlong, and produced to him a copy of a letter, which he proposed the appellant should write, as the appellant alleged, for the purpose of showing that the sum of money so advanced by Lord Lucan had nothing to do with said election; but the said William Furlong did not approve * of said draft letter, * 781 and with a view to meet the wishes of said Richard Livesay, he prepared a draft of another letter, which said Livesay, with some slight alterations, approved of: and that it might more effectually appear by said letter that the business of the election had nothing to do with the transfer of said stock, it was agreed upon between the said Richard Livesay and said William Furlong, that said letter should bear date the 23d day of February, 1826, ten days after the execution of the trust-deed, and previous to the transfer of said stock. This purpose in writing the letter was denied by the respondent.

The letter was addressed to Mr. Richard Livesay, and, though really written in June, 1826, bore date on the 23d of February, 1826, and was in the words following:

“Dear Sir, — Sir Neal O'Donel has now executed the deed vesting all his life-estate in me, in trust to raise money, in the first place, to pay the rent and costs of the ejectment pending; and next, to pay the interest of the encumbrances. If you will prevail on any client of yours to advance three or four thousand pounds in time to pay the rent and costs, or even on account of it, I will consider such advance as raised by me under the power given me; and will, whenever you please, exercise that power, by securing such advance in the best manner I am empowered by the deed: it being distinctly understood that, in doing so, I am not to be in any way personally answerable for either the principal or interest, further than as trustee for the due application of the rents pursuant to the trust-deed.

“I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

“PETER DIGGES LA TOUCHE.”

After the letter had been signed by appellant, and during the time which elapsed between that period and the 1st of March, in the year 1827, when Sir Neal O'Donel departed this life, several negotiations were * carried on between William * 782 Furlong, acting as the appellant's solicitor, and Richard Livesay, as solicitor of Lord Lucan, for the purpose of devising some mode of giving Lord Lucan the benefit of the trusts of the deed of the 13th of February, 1826, with reference to the advance so made by him ; but no deed was executed, and all further negotiations on the subject were terminated by the death of Sir Neal O'Donel, on the 1st of March, 1827. His son, Hugh James Moore O'Donel, succeeded to the baronetcy, and died, leaving a daughter, in 1828 ; when his brother, Richard Annesley O'Donel, entered into possession of the estates.

On the 21st August, 1828, the widow of Sir H. J. M. O'Donel filed a bill in Chancery in Ireland, on her own and her daughter's behalf, claiming her jointure, and also interest charged on the estates by Sir H. J. M. O'Donel for his daughter : and for a receiver over the estates ; and by certain orders pronounced in that cause, Alex. Clendinning, Esquire, was appointed receiver over the trust estates.

On the 26th January, 1829, the appellant, who was entitled to the interest of certain judgments comprised in the schedule to the deed of the 10th of October, 1798, and which had been assigned to trustees on his marriage with his present wife, filed a bill against Sir Richard O'Donel and others, for the purpose of getting a receiver to keep down the interest due on the several encumbrances affecting the estates, and for a sale ; and Mr. Clendinning was also appointed receiver in that cause.

The estates over which Mr. Clendinning was appointed receiver, and which are the estates comprised in the trust-deed of the 23d of February, 1826, produced an annual income of about 8400*l*.

* 783 On the 21st of March, 1827, the Earl of Lucan, * since deceased, on behalf of himself and all other persons interested under said deed of the 13th February, 1826, exhibited his bill in the Court of Chancery of Ireland, against the appellant, and also against the widow of Sir Neal O'Donel, Sir Hugh James Moore O'Donel, Richard Annesley O'Donel (now Sir Richard Annesley O'Donel, baronet), Mary O'Donel, Anna O'Donel, Margaret O'Donel, Catherine O'Donel, and Isabella O'Donel ; and thereby stated the proceedings by ejectment taken by the Marquis of Sligo for the recovery of the rent due out of the Newport freehold estate, and the proceedings in the Court of Chancery on the part of Sir Neal O'Donel to redeem said estate, the loan, and the other matters above detailed ; and prayed that the trusts of said indenture of the 13th of February, 1826, might be decreed to be carried into execution, and that an account might be taken of the sums received by the appellant, of the rents, issues, and profits of said trust estates since the execution of the said deed of trust of the 13th day of February, 1826, and how the same had been applied and disposed of; and that an account might be taken of the sum advanced by said Richard Earl of Lucan for the redemption of the said lands under ejectment; and that the same, together with legal interest thereon from the time when the same was so advanced, might be decreed to be well charged on the said trust estates so conveyed to the appellant for the life of Sir Neal O'Donel the younger, in priority to all other charges created by the said trust-deed, save the cost and expenses incident to the preparation of the said deed, and the execution of the trusts thereof.

The appellant put in his answer; and some of the parties having died and the suit having been duly revived, the cause came on for hearing on the 26th * of May, 1836, when the * 784 Lord Chancellor of Ireland made a decree to the following effect: —

“ It is adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of said trust-deed; and accordingly it is hereby referred to William Henn, Esquire, one of the Masters of this Court, to take an account of the sums received by the said Peter Digges La Touche out of the rents, issues, and profits of the said trust estates, since the execution of the deed of trust of the 13th February, 1826, and how the same has been applied and disposed of; and also to take an account of the arrears of rent due out of the trust premises at the time of the execution of the trust-deed. And it is hereby also ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that it be referred to the Master to take an account of the sum advanced for the redemption of the said lands so under ejectment. And it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the same, together with the legal interest thereon from the time when the same was so advanced, be well charged on the said trust estates so conveyed to the said Peter Digges La Touche for the life of the said Sir Neal O'Donel the younger, in priority to all other charges created by the said trust-deed, save the costs and expenses incident to the preparation of the said deed and the execution of the trusts thereof. And it is further ordered that the said Master do take an account of the sums, if any, due and owing to all other persons interested under the trusts of the said deed.”

The present was an appeal against that decree.

Mr. Pemberton, for the appellant. — What is the foundation of the respondent's claim in this case? It is that he is a cestui que trust under the deed, and that he is entitled to call for execution of the trust. He claims to stand in the place of the Mar-
 * 785 quis of * Sligo, to whom an arrear of head rent was due, and who was paid with money advanced by him. But even the marquis himself could not have called for execution of this trust, though avowedly made to secure payment of his claim; for it was a trust between different parties, not creating any equitable obligation as to him. He is not a party to the deed, nor is there any good consideration for such an obligation. Lord Sligo's rights may be and are sufficiently well secured, but they are not secured by the provisions of this deed in such a manner as to make him a cestui que trust under it. Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale. (a) A party cannot become a cestui que trust by any act of his own. Here the respondent merely advanced a sum of money to the trustee, in the expectation that the trustee had the power under the trust-deed to raise money to pay off that advance. Such an act will not constitute the person advancing the money a cestui que trust. Palk v. Clinton. (b) There the rule of equity on this point was clearly laid down by Sir W. GRANT, Master of the Rolls, who said, (c) "The first question is, whether the plaintiff has any right to the relief he seeks against the trustees. For the defendants it is contended that, having raised 44,000*l.* by mortgage, they are functi officio with regard to their trust, which was to raise that sum by sale or mortgage: they have raised it by mortgage, and therefore the trust, so far as it respects them, it is said, is completely performed. Without entering into the question how far it was competent to the trustees to make a sale, either of their own authority or by that of the owner of the estate, if he was not an infant, for the purpose of paying off the mortgage, this plaintiff has
 * 786 no right * whatever to call upon them to sell in order to pay him. He is no object whatsoever of the trust, farther than as that trust enabled the trustees to make him a good mortgage; when he has that, he is in the ordinary situation of a mortgagee. He gets nothing more than that. He has all the remedies, but only the remedies, of a mortgagee. All the other objects of the trust are foreign to him. He has also nothing to do with them. I may say that it is at least very doubtful, upon the true construction of this deed, whether the trustees could make a sale after they had raised the money by mortgage. But it is not necessary to give a direct opinion upon that point; as, if they choose to resist the plaintiff's demands, he has no right to compel them to try whether they can or cannot procure a purchaser to take such a title as they can make him under this trust-deed."

(a) 3 Sim. 1; 2 Russ. & My. 451.

(b) 12 Ves. 49.

(c) 12 Ves. 55.

In like manner it is impossible to understand how the appellant can be treated as a trustee for this particular purpose. Suppose the respondent had had the security of this trust-deed, he would not have been entitled to an account of the by-gone rents, nor of the future rents, except from the moment of failure of payment. Now here there is not even a suggestion of a default; and therefore the respondent could not, upon his own statement of his case, have had what he now claims.

Mr. Jacob, on the same side.—In Worrall v. Harford, (a) there was a trust-deed for the benefit of creditors; and the trust was, in the first place, to pay the expense of a commission of bankrupt, which commission happened ultimately to be superseded. * The solicitor to the commission there im- * 787 agined that, as the deed was intended to secure payment to him, he had become a cestui que trust under the deed, and he filed a bill and asked for an account of the trust property. There was a demurrer to that bill, and Lord ELDON said that the case must depend on the provisions of the particular deed, and that it could not be implied that persons employed by the trustees became therefore creditors on the trust fund. Apply that rule here, and then it is plain that there are no words in this deed creating a trust in favour of the respondent, and that no such trust can be implied. Suppose that in 1826 the respondent had a mortgage deed instead of this letter, what would have been the result? Would the mortgagee have had a right to file a bill for an account of the rents received before the time when the sum became due, and before the date of the mortgage security? Certainly he would not. The question now is whether the appellant is to pay over again the sum which he has once paid for the benefit of Sir Neal O'Donel. But even supposing the respondent to be an encumbrancer under this deed, still he cannot be entitled to what he now asks. The decree is founded on a forgetfulness of the rule that an encumbrancer or mortgagee cannot claim an account of by-gone rents and profits. In all respects, therefore, it is incorrect, and must be reversed.

Mr. Knight and Mr. J. Russell, for the respondent. — The Earl of Lucan is the only respondent in this appeal, yet the decree really interests all those who were parties to the suit in the Court below. This is a circumstance to be considered by the House, since this is a case in which it now appears that * 788 * all persons except this one appellant are satisfied with the decree of the Court below; and even this appeal was not presented till nearly one year after the original decree had been pronounced. That is a wilful procrastination on the part of the appellant, which certainly entitles the respondent to costs. In the creation of a trust a valuable consideration is not necessary: as between the cestui que trust and the trustee it may be wholly without value, and the former may enforce the performance of it by bill, though he may not be able to sue on it at law. Neither is it necessary that the objects of the trust should be parties to the deed creating the trust. A man desirous that his property should not be subject to the legacy duty, may make a settlement of it in his lifetime. He will constitute a cestui que trust as the object of his bounty, and a trustee for the purposes of his bounty; and the former may file a bill against the latter, to obtain the benefit intended to be secured to him, not as against the author of the trust, but as against the trustee, who holds the character with all its incidents and consequences. So that the mere circumstance that creditors are the objects of the trust, and that they are not parties to the contract, cannot make any difference in the matter. The nature of the object must decide the question whether it is a trust or not. Here it is clear that it was so intended to operate. The respondent's money has regained the estate, and he is therefore entitled to be primarily satisfied. This deed was intended to be binding on the trustee for his benefit. The letter shows that the payment was to be made by the late Lord Lucan with reference to the deed. The answer does not put in issue the right of the cestui que trust, or his title to sue; and whether the House looks at the deed with * 789 * its accompanying circumstances, or disregards extrinsic circumstances altogether, it is clear that it is a deed of trust of which the respondent is entitled to have the benefit. The decree is founded on the clearest principles of equity as applicable to the particular circumstances here; and this appeal, which only opposes technical objections to plain rules of law, must be dismissed.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. — The appellant does not, as it is said on the other side, oppose technical objections to plain rules of law. It is said that the respondent's money has regained the estate, and therefore that he ought to recover; but the answer to that argument is, that the trustees of the estate had not the least shadow of a right to give him the priority he claims. The respondent has three things to make out: first, that he is a party to this deed; and secondly, that the trusts required that every shilling of the rent should be applied in the way he now demands; and thirdly, that he did not assent to any different application of these rents, but that in the lifetime of Sir Neal O'Donel he called for them to be applied in this particular manner. Not one of these things has been established by the other side. This is a deed merely between the principal and the agent, settling the mode in which the agent shall perform the business of the principal. It does not give the cestui que trust, even supposing the respondent to stand in that situation, any power to call for an execution of the trust. On these grounds it is clear that the decree of the Court below cannot be supported.

August 6.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — In this case there was an appeal against the order of the Lord Chancellor of * Ireland, * 790 by whom a decree has been made in the following terms. — [His Lordship read it.] — This arises under a trust-deed by which a tenant for life of certain estates, partly leasehold and partly freehold, conveyed what interest he had in those estates to trustees for special purposes named in the deed. As to the leasehold estates, Lord Sligo, who was the owner of the fee, and so entitled to the head rent, had proceeded to recover, in an action of ejectment, the lands liable to that rent. According to the provisions of the Ejectment Acts in Ireland, a certain time is allowed to a tenant to pay the rent so due; and by paying it within that time he is to be allowed an advantage, which is equivalent to redeeming the lands so recovered in ejectment. To effect this purpose, the tenant for life executed a trust-deed by which he conveyed his property to the appellant as trustee, with a declaration of trusts to pay the rent, and to raise 10,000*l.* by way of mortgage for the payment of such rent and of other charges. It appears, though the history of it is not accurately known, but it appears by the evidence that a sum of money was paid into Court, in order to meet this demand of the Marquis of Sligo. That money appears to be the money of Lord Lucan. There is evidence of some previous communication as to that money being paid into Court, but the bill states that it was paid into Court in this case. On this subject the following letter was written. [The Lord Chancellor read the letter dated 23d February.] Now the principal question is, in what manner that letter is to be treated; whether as an undertaking to give to the person advancing the money a priority over all other claimants on the estate; and if so, whether it was in the power of the trustee under the deed to give to such person an advantage of that kind.

* 791 * The allegation in the bill is, that on the faith of this letter the advance was made. The letter was dated in February, 1826. The advance really took place at a period subsequent to that time, and there seems no reason to doubt that the letter was in fact written after the advance had actually been made; the letter being antedated to serve a particular purpose. Yet the allegation in the bill is, that the advance was made on the faith of that letter. Those, therefore, who gave instructions for filing this bill, put a case on the record which they must have been aware could not be supported by the evidence. There were some negotiations as to the money, the time at which it was to be paid, and the time of the repayment; but with regard to that, it is to be observed that Lord Lucan and the Marquis of Sligo were not parties to the trust-deed. The deed was entered into by the owner of the property for the purpose of disposing of that property in the way most advantageous to himself. The bill stated the trust-deed, stated the letter, and the advance of the money, made, as alleged, on the faith of the representations of the appellant (the defendant below); and asked that the trusts of this deed might be carried into execution. [Here his Lordship read the prayer of the bill; and he also read the answer, which was in substance a denial of the allegations of the bill.] Two questions arise on these pleadings: first, whether there was any right on the part of the plaintiff to call for an execution of the trusts of that deed independently of the letter; and, secondly, whether he, on account of that letter, was entitled to a decree in the terms prayed for. It does not seem that there was brought distinctly under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, (a) that train of decisions which have established the law * upon matters of this sort in this * 792 country; that where a party creates a trust for the purpose of paying debts, the creditors, not being parties thereto, cannot become cestui que trusts entitled to call on the trustees to execute the trusts of the deed. Wallwynn v. Coutts (b) was probably the foundation of all those decisions; but the doctrine on which they proceed has been well established by Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, (c) and is now always adopted and acted on. Then how does the present case differ from those to which I have thus referred? In my mind there is no difference between them. As a party having a demand against the owner of the estate, the respondent could not have a right to call for the interposition of a Court of Equity to enforce the satisfaction of that demand out of the trust fund. Under the circumstances of this case, equity could not allow the respondent to come in and ask for the execution of the trusts of this deed. Lord Sligo had no equitable rights; he had the legal right against the estate. But he was only a creditor, and not being a party to the deed, could not ask for the execution of it; but even if he could, Lord Lucan is not placed in the situation of Lord Sligo. For the accommodation of the owner of the estate, Lord Lucan advanced the money by which the claim of Lord Sligo was satisfied: but that alone will not give him the same right as Lord Sligo. But as Lord Sligo had no such rights as those now asserted by Lord Lucan, it is not material to consider the question of the relative rights of these parties.

Then how stands the case with regard to this letter? The letter was dated in the month of February, before the money had been paid into Court, but was in fact written after that payment had been made; and there * was in it an under- * 793 taking by the trustee that he would give such security for the repayment as he could under this trust-deed. But that did not make the creditor a cestui que trust under the deed. He was by that letter to have some security. The only security that could have been given was under the deed to raise 10,000*l.* by mortgage of the estate. That plan of a mortgage did not go on.

It would have deprived the family of the benefit of the proceeding, and the drafts which were drawn show that it was not to have any such effect. The negotiations went on, and objections were made to several proposals, until an event occurred which prevented the possibility of the contract being carried into effect. That was the death of the tenant for life, out of whose estate the charge was to be paid. The result is, that the contract for the purpose of creating a charge upon that property was (by parties having control over an uncertain fund depending on the life of another) extended, until the dropping of the life prevented its being carried into effect. But the effectuating such a contract is not either the object of the suit nor the purport of the decree. It is not necessary to decide here what might have been the result of such a suit had it been commenced. The Court below has granted relief on the supposition that the creditor here was a cestui que trust under the deed, not only for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of the charge, but for the purpose of calling for the repayment of these sums of money, alleged to have been advanced on the understanding of all parties, including the party who now prefers this complaint. I cannot suppose but that this decree, proceeding on such a view of the case, was made in consequence of not calling the attention of the Court to the

* 794 well established doctrine of equity, to which I * have before referred. If your Lordships agree with me on that point, then I must advise your Lordships that the decree, as now framed, cannot stand. The demand here is made in a shape which is not consistent with the principles established by decided cases. On these grounds, therefore, I move that the decree be reversed.

Decree reversed. The bill to be dismissed with costs up to the decree on the 26th of May, 1836.

 Sir CHARLES EURWICKE DOUGLAS Respondent.

Will and Codicils. Construction. Residue.

A testator by his will gave the residue of his personal estate to his wife for her life, and after her decease to Sir C. E. D. absolutely; he subsequently, by a codicil, which did not affect the gift of the residue, altered his will in some respects, and confirmed it in every other. Next day he made a second codicil, by which he gave some pecuniary and specific legacies, and concluded thus: "All the rest and residue of my property, not herein before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew, C. P. Y. and to Sir C. E. D., their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them."

Held (the Lord Chancellor dissentiente), that the above clause of the second codicil was a revocation of the gift, by the will, of the residue to Sir C. E. D., and that he was accordingly only entitled to an equal share thereof with C. P. Y.¹

June 5, 6, 1837. July 30. August 10, 1840.

THE Right Honourable Charles Philip Yorke, second son of the Honourable Charles Yorke, and next brother of Philip, late Earl of Hardwicke, had, at the time of making his will, and at the time of his death, a power, under a settlement executed in May, 1813, of charging Lord Hardwicke's property at Wimpole, in Cambridgeshire, by will, with the payment of the sum of 12,000*l.*, to be raised upon the death and failure of male issue of the said Lord Hardwicke.

On the 19th of April, 1827, Mr. Yorke, in accordance with this power, made a will (attested by three witnesses, and in all respects duly executed in manner required by the settlement of

1813), by which, after making a provision for his wife, and bequeathing to her the sum of 500*l.*, to be paid to her within six calendar months next after his decease, and giving

* 796 * her the use of either his house in Bruton Street, London, or at Bonningtons, in Hertfordshire, together with the furniture belonging to it, for her life, he directed that the whole of the sum of 12,000*l.* should be raised, in pursuance of the said power, and paid to his executors, as soon as conveniently might be after the decease and failure of male issue of the said Lord Hardwicke; and that it should be considered as part of his general personal estate. The testator then bequeathed the said sum of 12,000*l.*, and also all his leasehold estates in Bruton Street, and at Bonningtons, or elsewhere, and all his moneys and securities for money, household goods, furniture, plate, pictures, books, goods, chattels, and other personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, subject to the bequests before made in favour of his wife, and also to the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and such legacies as he might thereafter bequeath, by any codicil or codicils to his will, unto his said wife, Harriet Yorke, and his friends, C. W. Manningham, Sir E. Hyde East, W. M. Leake, and T. Atkinson, and their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust that they, and the survivors and survivor of them, &c., should, as soon after his decease as they, she, or he should think proper, sell and dispose of such parts of his said leasehold and residuary personal estates and effects respectively as should be in their nature salable, and get in and receive such parts thereof as should not be in their nature salable, and invest the moneys to arise from such sale or sales in their, her, or his names or name, in the public stocks or funds, or upon real or government securities in England; and should stand possessed of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and also of all such

* 797 * part of his residuary personal estate and effects as * should consist of stocks, funds, or securities at his death, upon trust, during the life of his said wife, to receive and pay to her, or permit her to retain for her own use, all the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds of the said several stocks, funds, and securities, trust moneys and premises respectively, when and as such dividends, &c., should become due. The will then proceeded: "And from and after the decease of my said wife, Harriet Yorke, upon trust, to assign, transfer, and pay all the said stocks, funds, and securities, trust moneys and premises, and every of them, and every part thereof respectively, unto my natural son, Charles Eurwicke Douglas (wishing him to use the name of Eurwicke only), his executors, administrators, and assigns, for his and their own absolute use and benefit, in case he the said Charles Eurwicke Douglas shall be living at my death, and shall then have attained, or shall afterwards live to attain, the age of twenty-five years, or be married with the previous consent of my said wife, Harriet Yorke, during her life; or after her decease, with the consent of the said C. W. Manningham, Sir E. Hyde East, W. M. Leake, and T. Atkinson, or the survivors or survivor of them, his executors or administrators."

The testator then proceeded to dispose of his residuary property (in favour of the appellant), in case C. E. Douglas (the respondent) should die in the testator's lifetime, or under the age of twenty-five, without having been married with consent; and he appointed Mrs. Yorke executrix, and the other trustees executors.

The respondent attained the age of twenty-five years in 1831; and in December, 1832, he married Miss Des Vœux, daughter of Sir Charles Des Vœux, baronet, with the testator's consent and approbation. The lady's fortune was, upon the marriage, settled by an indenture *dated the 22d of Dec., 1832; *798 by which the testator, a party thereto, settled upon the respondent and Lady Douglas, and upon the issue of their marriage, the sum of 10,000*l.*, invested in securities, which had been transferred into the names of the trustees of the settlement for that purpose; and he, as a further provision for the respondent, covenanted that his executors should, upon the decease of himself and Mrs. Yorke, pay the trustees an additional sum of 10,000*l.*, or transfer to them securities of that value, to be held on the same trusts as those declared respecting the previous sum of 10,000*l.* It was provided, however, that if the testator should give the respondent in his lifetime, or bequeath to him by will or any codicil, any sums of money, stock, or personal estate, such gift or bequest should be applied in satisfaction of the covenant for the payment of the additional sum of 10,000*l.*

On the 1st of May, 1833, the testator made a codicil to his will, which was likewise attested by three witnesses. He thereby (after reciting that part of his will relating to the charge of the sum of 12,000*l.*) confirmed the charge upon the property specified in his will; and further charged all his brother's estates, which he had power to charge, with the payment of that sum; but directed that it should not be raised during Mrs. Yorke's life, provided interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent was punctually paid. He directed that 5000*l.*, part of the charge of 12,000*l.*, should be paid, after the death of Mrs. Yorke, to the trustees named in the respondent's marriage settlement, in part satisfaction of his covenant for payment of 10,000*l.*, and directed that the remainder of the 10,000*l.*, should be paid out of his general personal estate; that 2,000*l.* other part of the 12,000*l.*, should be

* 799 * paid to T. Atkinson and the respondent, upon certain trusts; and that the remaining 5000*l.* should not be raised if any son or grandson of the testator's late brother, Sir Joseph Sydney Yorke, should be entitled in possession to the estates charged; and that they should be altogether discharged from the payment of that portion. And he "ratified and confirmed his said will in every other respect whatsoever."

On the following day the testator made another codicil to his will, entirely in his own handwriting, (a) and unattested, commencing thus: "This is a codicil of specific and pecuniary legacies, to be also added to my will." By this codicil he added the appellant's name to the number of his executors, and bequeathed to such of them as should act the sum of 20*l.* for mourning. To several relations he gave pecuniary legacies, to be paid to such of them as should be living at Mrs. Yorke's death; among them was a legacy of 100*l.* to the appellant. The testator then, after bequeathing several small annuities to different persons, and several specific articles to different friends, concludes as follows: "I give all my swords and other arms to Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, knight (the respondent), together with my gold watch, chain, and seals, and the sum of 100*l.*, to be paid to him as soon as convenient after my decease. All the rest and residue of my property, not herein before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew, Charles Philip Yorke, and to Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, knight, their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them; and I leave it

* 800 at the option of Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas * to assume or not the name of Eurwicke singly, or to bear it as at present, without alteration.—Signed by me, C. P. Yorke, 2d May, 1833."

At the time when both the codicils were made, the appellant had become, by the death of his father, Sir Joseph Sidney Yorke, next heir presumptive, after the testator, to the earldom, and to the estates upon which the sum of 12,000*l.* was charged ; and so continued till the death of the testator, which took place on the 13th of March, 1834, without his having altered or revoked his will or codicils, except so far as the will was altered or revoked by the codicils. Shortly after his death, his will and codicils were proved by the respondent and Mr. Leake and Mr. Atkinson, with the usual power to the other executors likewise to prove them when they should think fit ; and the personal estate was ascertained to be of considerable value.

(a) The will and first codicil were prepared by his solicitors.

The respondent, considering himself entitled under the will to the whole of the residuary personal estate in remainder expectant upon the decease of Mrs. Yorke, applied to his coexecutors to account for all the testator's personal estate and property, not specifically bequeathed. They alleged that, by reason of some difficulties in the construction of the will and codicils, they were unable to act without the direction of the Court of Chancery, especially as the appellant claimed, under the last codicil, an equal share with respondent in the residuary property.

On the 4th of July, 1834, the respondent filed his bill in the Court of Chancery against Messrs. Leake and Atkinson, Mrs. Yorke and the appellant, praying that the usual accounts might be taken, " and that the clear residue of the testator's personal estate and effects might be ascertained, and might be invested * and secured upon the trusts of the said will ; * 801 and that the rights and interests of the respondent and of all other parties in or to the same might be ascertained and yet declared."

The several defendants appeared, and put in their answers to the bill. The appellant, in his answer, insisted that he was entitled to an equal share of the testator's residuary estate with the respondent, on the decease of Mrs. Yorke, under and by virtue of the second codicil. The appellant, while the cause was pending, succeeded to the earldom, by the death of his uncle without male issue.

The cause came on to be heard on the 16th of November, 1835, before Sir C. C. PEPYS, Master of the Rolls ; and his Honor, by his decree, (a) on the 19th of Nov., 1835, declared that, according to the true construction of the said will and codicils, the respondent was entitled to the clear residue of the testator's personal estate, subject to the life-interest therein of Mrs. Yorke; and his Honor ordered that the bill should be dismissed as against the defendant, the Earl of Hardwicke.

Against that decree the Earl of Hardwicke appealed to this House. The appeal was argued on the 5th and 6th of June, 1837. (a)

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Knight, for the appellant. — The only question in this appeal is, whether the benefit given by the will to the respondent exclusively in the testator's residuary personal estate, on the death of Mrs. Yorke, is not taken away by the last clause of the second codicil, and divided between * 802 * the respondent and appellant. It is not of any consequence that this codicil is not attested. The effect of the decree is to strike out the whole of the last clause: "All the rest and residue of my property not herein before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew, C. P. Yorke, and Sir C. E. Douglas, their executors, &c., after the decease of my dear wife, equally to be divided between them." The decree is at variance with two well established rules in the construction of wills and codicils: 1st, that the Court is not to reject any, but, if it can, to give effect to all parts of the instruments, so far as they are not inconsistent; and secondly, where a subsequent gift by codicil is inconsistent with a former gift by will, that the subsequent gift shall prevail. The very reverse of those rules has been adopted in the construction put by the decree on these instruments. By the words, "not herein before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of," the testator merely meant to except out of the residuary bequest in the codicil the pecuniary and specific legacies therein before given; and by adopting this construction, effect will be given to all parts of the will and codicils, except that part of the will which it was the intention of the testator to revoke. That such was his intention will more clearly appear by considering what took place in the family between the dates of the will and codicils. In that interval the respondent was married to a lady of large fortune; and the testator, by the marriage settlement, to which he was a party, made a very handsome provision for the respondent and his family. Having done so, he naturally enough reasoned thus with himself: "I have provided for my son; I shall now provide for my nephew, who is the presumptive heir to the family title and honours, which, the more dignified, are the more burdensome also to the wearer." He accordingly, in addition to the other provisions for the nephew contained in the codicils, divided the residue of the personal estate between him and the respondent. The words of ratification, which are often words of course, have here a peculiar propriety in a clause, altering part of the will, and confirming it in all other respects.

The case made for the respondent, in opposition to the natural and recognized rules of construction, is, that the testator, when he wrote the second codicil, forgot that he had by his will disposed of the residue of his property. But it was impossible he could have forgotten the will; he had it before him; and it was to meet the residuary gift in it, and after adverting to the circumstances that had taken place, that he penned this clause in the codicil. Why should he be supposed to make a codicil wholly inoperative? This alteration of the will was probably present to his mind when he signed the first codicil; but then, intending to reserve for another codicil the small pecuniary and specific gifts, and the directions about his remains, which he did not wish to publish to others while living, he reserved, for the same reason, the introduction of this alteration of the gift of the residue. He was himself fully competent to do this, and did not require the aid of solicitors or of witnesses.

The construction adopted in the decree, by extending the exception in the residuary clause of the codicil beyond its natural and necessary meaning, nullifies the whole clause for the sake of giving effect to a part. The testator had before, in his will and codicils, elaborately described and disposed of every species of personal estate to which he could possibly become entitled; the decree imputing to the testator the intention of giving by this clause in the codicil what he had not given before by the will or codicils, having given all before, makes him talk nonsense in the most excellent grammar.

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Solly Flood, for the respondent. — The bequest in the will in the respondent's favour is clear beyond dispute; it is expressly ratified and confirmed by the first codicil: and not only are there no words in the second codicil calculated to show any animus revocandi on the part of the testator, but he appears, by the most emphatic language, to have guarded against such construction being put upon it. He might have apprehended that there were still some articles of property not disposed of, and for the greater caution he added this clause.

Besides the two rules of construction referred to in the argument for the appellant, there is a third rule as fully recognized by the Courts; which is, that where a gift is made in a will in clear, unequivocal terms, it will require words equally clear to take it away. It must also be borne in mind that the province of a Court of Appeal is to correct the errors of the Courts below, but not to reverse their decisions because some doubt may be entertained of their correctness. That is the principle on which the Court of Chancery deals with appeals from the Rolls or Vice-Chancellor's Court.

It has been argued that it was in consequence of the change made on the respondent's marriage that the testator made the alleged alteration in the gift of the residue. But there is no appearance of any alteration in the testator's regard for his son ;

* 805 the provisions made for him by the will are recognized in the deeds * and settlement subsequently executed, and are expressly confirmed by the first codicil. The effect of the codicil is to make the will speak as from that date ; and accordingly down to the 2d of May, 1834, there is an unqualified gift of the residue to the respondent. That residue, given to five trustees for the benefit of the testator's wife and of the respondent, cannot be the same residue given by the codicil between the respondent and appellant ; nor can the latter be a substitution for the former : that would be contrary to all the rules of construction. The residue disposed of by the codicil is the residue, "not before disposed of," of things ejusdem generis, with the other articles bequeathed by that codicil. Those words of qualification and restriction must be explained away before the appellant can make out his case. This was a sweeping clause added by the testator ex majori cautela, to provide for the disposition among those two legatees of any of his property, if any might by accident remain undisposed of ; and the decree, instead of revoking or nullifying any of the testamentary instruments, gives effect to them all.

The testator had recourse to his solicitors in disposing of his property generally by his will and first codicil ; but in giving the small pecuniary legacies and specific gifts of particular articles to friends and relations, he took upon himself to distribute them without calling for any assistance. The words of the second codicil are not ambiguous, or in any way difficult to be dealt with. What the testator by them gave to the appellant and respondent jointly is, "all the property which he had not by that, the second codicil, or by his will, or any other codicil, disposed of." To all that, it is conceded, the appellant is entitled equally with the respondent; but under * the residuary gift in the will, * 806 which the testator ratifies, the respondent is entitled to the whole residue; so that, in fact, there is nothing left for the formal words of the residuary clause in the second codicil to operate upon. It is impossible to suppose that the testator, having confirmed his will by the first codicil, except as therein stated, on the 1st of May, should on the next day make so very material an alteration in it as is contended for by the appellant.

Mr. Pemberton replied.—The first and second codicils may be said to be contemporaneous. There was no change of intention on the 2d of May, for the intention then carried into effect was entertained on the 1st of May. But what remained to be done on the 2d was so easy, and at the same time so proper to be kept private, that the testator chose to do it alone and at his leisure. There was, however, a change of intention between the times of making the will and the codicils. The first codicil materially changed the will; and why should not the second also? Why should this eminent person put this clause in the codicil, if he did not intend it to have effect? The alterations of the will by both codicils are consistent with the changes which took place in the son's circumstances by his marriage settlement after the date of the will. It must be admitted, that if the words "not herein before, &c., disposed of" be struck out, the clause would operate on the residue. But the introduction of these words does not make the clause useless. What is "rest and residue" but what is not before disposed of? Having before in his will given the benefit of the residue to his wife for life, he does not repeat that gift in the codicil, but gives the residue after her death to his son and nephew. The testator, when he * gave the * 807 whole residue to his son, imposed a name on him; but afterwards, on taking half the residue from him, he released him from that obligation.

and Lord BROUGHAM, said their Lordships entertained some doubts on that question.

The case was postponed for consideration.

July 30, 1840.

Their Lordships having required further argument by one counsel on each side,—

Mr. Pemberton, for the appellant. — The provisions in the will were not framed with a view to Sir Charles Douglas's attaining the age of twenty-five and marrying in the testator's lifetime. Had the testator died before these events happened, without altering the will, Sir Charles Douglas would not have immediately taken an absolute interest in the residue, but only contingent on his living to attain twenty-five, and marrying with consent; and the appellant would have a contingent interest on either event not taking place. But the testator lived to see both events accomplished; and accordingly, on the occasion of his son's marriage with his entire approbation, he made for him those provisions which were to supersede the provisions made by the will. Most of the clauses in the will become inapplicable to the respondent's altered condition. At the date of the will, he was a student of St. John's College, Oxford; so the testator describes him in a deed executed by him the same year; but he was settled in life when the codicil was made, and to the change of circumstances the testator adapted the testamentary disposition of his property.

* 808 * Mr. Wigram, for the respondent. — The only difficulty in this case is as to the meaning of the words "rest and residue not herein before nor by my will or any other codicil disposed of." But the whole residue was disposed of by the will. The words must be taken to have the same meaning as if the testator said, "except the residue which I have disposed of by my will." It is asked why should Mr. Yorke add so useless a clause: but it is far better to hold words to be inoperative or useless, than to give them a meaning which they cannot bear.

They cannot be referred to the residue disposed of by the will, because the whole of it is given to Mrs. Yorke for her life: it is therefore some other residue that the testator intended to divide equally between the appellant and respondent.

[LORD BROUGHAM. — Can there be such a thing as a residue excepted out of a residue? which is the meaning you put on this clause.]

It certainly appears absurd; but it is an absurdity of the testator's creating. It may be said that "residue" is, like "surplus," a word of flexible meaning. In Page v. Leapingwell, (a) Sir W. GRANT, M.R., said, "It is no new thing to put a different construction on the word 'surplus' from that which it commonly bears;" and again, "Why may not I infer, from the expressions in this will, that the testator did not mean what the word 'overplus' usually imports, viz., whatever shall turn out to be the overplus; but that he was contemplating a certain overplus, and was making his disposition accordingly?" Mr. Yorke may have meant by the word "residue" any sort of property that he might acquire after making the codicil, and which would in his own opinion remain undisposed of.

* Mr. Pemberton, in reply. — It is admitted that the two * 809 codicils are to be taken as contemporaneous expressions of intention: it is also admitted that the testator, at the time he wrote the second codicil and introduced this second residuary clause, had before him both the will and the original residuary clause: and lastly, it is admitted that the effect of the construction which is put on this clause in the codicil by the judgment of the Court below will be to make this clause inoperative; not inoperative because he left no residue, but necessarily inoperative at the very time that the residuary clause was written. Now is it possible to believe that, with the knowledge of all that he had before done, the testator then intended only to do what he knew would be inoperative; and if not, is it not clear that he meant to alter the former residuary clause?

August 10.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Lords, the question in this appeal arises upon the construction of the will and codicils of the late Mr. Yorke, brother of the half-blood of the late Earl of Hard-

wicke, uncle of the whole blood of the present earl, the appellant, and putative father of the respondent; and it turns mainly upon the concluding paragraph or clause of the second codicil. The case appears to stand thus: There are legacies in the will, and there is a gift of the residue: there are legacies in the codicil; and then there is the clause in question: "And all the rest and residue of my property not herein before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew, Charles Philip Yorke, and to Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, knight, their executors, administrators and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them, and I leave it at the option of Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas to assume or * not the name of Eurwicke singly, or to bear it as at present without alteration."

It is certain that the testator had the will before him when the second codicil was made; when he wrote it, which he did himself. It is more particularly clear that when he added the clause in question, he had before him the gift of the residue in the will; for he makes an alteration in one portion of the residuary clause in the will, viz., a direction respecting the name to be borne by the respondent. Then take the terms of the clause, "all the rest and residue of my property." Thus far all is plain. The question is, whether these residuary words are altered by what follows: "not herein before disposed of." This, too, would still raise no doubt, because by "herein before" he means "in the second codicil;" as seems plain from the words which come immediately after, "or by my will or any other codicil." But it makes no difference if the two codicils are taken as one; and then "herein before" means both of the codicils together, and has no reference to the will. Now, neither in the one codicil nor in the other is there any thing like a residuary gift before the clause in question: therefore there can no doubt be raised as to the sense of the words, "all the rest and residue of my property," by the qualification "not herein before disposed of;" and consequently up to this point all is plain enough. But he adds, "or by my will;" and the question is whether these words do not qualify the preceding ones, or except from the gift the residue given by the will: if they do, they wholly annul the words and destroy the gift. The testator had the residuary gift in the will before him: therefore, to support this construction, it must be contended that, being aware of having given the residue

than the residue already given," or "all the residue over the residue already given;" which is not a sensible construction. If we read it, "all the residue other than or over the legacies given," it is only tautology, but a very usual tautology. If we take the clause as a gift with an exception, "all the residue of my property except what I have given in my will," we must read the exception so as not to destroy the gift; or suppose it is not a gift with an exception, but only a qualification in a description of the thing given; still it is more reasonable and more according to all just rules of construction to give such a sense to the qualification as shall not make the whole a nullity. The one construction makes the testator give "all the residue of his property over the particular legacies given in the will and codicils;" which is a sensible construction, and leaves something for the words to act upon. The other construction makes him give all the residue over the legacies and over all the residue; that is, all that remains after the legacies and after what remains over these legacies; which is not a sensible construction, and leaves nothing whatever. And it is material to observe that this is not a mere mistake of the testator, or an eventual defeat of his intention: it is not that he may have supposed he was giving something by the words when he had nothing to give; but the construction assumes him to have intended this absurdity, for he had the former residuary clause before him; and therefore, if he meant by the reference to the will a reference to that clause, so as to qualify by such reference the residuary gift now made, he must have known that he was making an exception or qualification which left nothing to give, and must have been aware of the absurd construction. It seems very difficult to suppose * that he would frame a clause of this kind. The clause * 812 is framed with sufficient care, and indicates that he was aware of giving something material by it. He gives the thing, whatever it is, with reference to the time of its vesting in possession, namely, after the death of his wife, to whom he had before given it for her life; and he gives it to the parties, "their executors, administrators, and assigns, to be equally divided between them." It seems a less strained construction to take the words in the parenthesis as they have now been taken, than in the sense put upon them in the Court below; and it seems a less violence to the instrument to hold, that the testator, having before him the residuary gift in the will, altered it in the manner supposed, than to hold that he made a gift to the parties, in equal moieties, of what amounted to nothing, and could not possibly amount to any thing. The alteration which the construction now put upon the clause supposes, is in the persons who are to take an interest in the residue expectant upon the determination of the life-interest given to the wife. By the will, the residue, after the wife's life-interest, had been given to one of the parties: the codicil gives it to both equally.

I abstain from entering into any of the other arguments connected with the case, and from one or two observations which might be made in support of the view now taken, for this reason: the substance of what has been now stated was reduced into writing and agreed to by Lord LYNDHURST and myself; and we both deemed that it led to the conclusion at which, after considerable doubt, we have arrived. It was the conclusion to which we were inclined on the first hearing. The doubts occurred afterwards, but we now consider them to be removed. In these

* 813 circumstances, * as Lord LYNDHURST is absent, I prefer only stating the argument which he has seen, and in which he concurs. Although there has been no difference of opinion between us upon any of the other less important matters, yet these not having been reduced into writing and considered by us in that shape, I have thought it better to omit them. The consequence is, that in concurrence with my noble and learned friend, who is unavoidably prevented from attending to-day, I shall now move your Lordships to reverse the decree below, and to make a declaration different from that which was made below as to the true meaning of the will and codicil, by substituting for that a declaration, that the true meaning of the codicil is, that the appellant and the respondent should take the residue equally divided; and to reverse that part of the decree which dismisses the appellant from the suit. The accounts must of course go on; in fact, that part of the decree is not appealed from; the only part appealed from is the declaration.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lord LYNDHURST and my noble and learned friend having come to a conclusion upon these testamentary papers in favour of the appellant, as the opinion which I have formed differs from that at which they have arrived in their superior judgment, I think it right, as it involves a question of principles, to state to your Lordships the ground on which I originally formed an opinion in favour of the respondent, and on which I still consider that that is the sound construction of these testamentary papers. I think it is much more probable that the conclusion to which my noble and learned friends have come is consistent with what the testator intended. I think the great probability is, that having *given by his will the *814 residue to Sir Charles Douglas, what he intended to do by his codicil was, instead of giving the whole residue to him, to divide it between him and another object of his bounty. The difficulty is, how far we are justified in coming to a conclusion which shall give effect to that probable intention; and I must say I find no words in this codicil which can lead to such a conclusion. It is more from the situation of the parties and the probability of the case that I infer that that probably was the intention of the testator, than from any thing I find in the testamentary papers; but if the words do not bear it, it is contrary to all rule to speculate upon the intention; for the ground of conclusion ought not to be found in any thing but the expressions which are used.

Now, what actually is the state of the testamentary disposition? The testator gives the residue by the will to trustees, in trust, to pay the income to his wife for her life, and after her death to transfer the residue to Sir Charles Douglas; in the event of Sir Charles Douglas dying under a certain age, to go over; that, however, is immaterial, because he attained that age. Then by his codicil he gives various descriptions of property to different persons, — money legacies to some, and specific articles to others; and then comes this clause: “All the rest and residue of my property not herein before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew, Charles Philip Yorke, and Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, knight, their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them.” In construing these words, the obvious course is to look back to the will to see what property there is not by that or any other codicil given, because to that subject-matter *the testator has by *815 this codicil confined himself. Now, if you look back, you will find there is no property that is not included in the will; because there is a clause in the will which carries with it all the property. The result is undoubtedly, therefore, that if the construction to be naturally put upon this residuary clause in the codicil be adopted, there are two residuary clauses, — not a very uncommon thing to be found in a will: it frequently happens that there is found such a residuary clause, and that for greater caution, and to avoid the possibility of not having included some things, you find words which, though altogether of a general residuary kind, are not intended to apply to an antecedent gift. Then there is no ambiguity in these words; they become useless if the residuary clause in the will is to take effect; they fail, not from any ambiguity in the expressions used, but because the subject-matter is disposed of by the residuary clause in the will.

It is not, according to my impression of the rule upon which the Courts have acted, consistent with the principles of construction to set aside the effect of clear and unambiguous words because there is reason to suppose that they do not produce the effect which the testator intended they should produce. If there be any ambiguity, then of course it is the duty of all Courts to put that construction upon the words which seems best to carry the intention into effect; but if there be no ambiguity, however unfortunate it may be that the intention of the testator shall fail, there is no right in any Court of justice to say those words shall not have their plain and unambiguous meaning. Taking this clause by itself, there can be no difficulty in coming to a conclusion, because what the testator gives is not given by any codicil or will.

* 816 * But there is considerable difficulty in supposing the testator to have intended revoking the former gift, because the residue by the will was given to trustees upon trust; and what he might have intended to do, and, I think, very probably did intend to do, was to say, "That interest which Sir Charles Douglas would have taken under the will, I intend to give equally between him and Mr. Charles Philip Yorke:" that would be the object which the testator must be presumed to have had, if the construction which my noble and learned friends put upon this clause, in order to carry out the supposed intention, is to prevail. Certainly, the words employed do not, in my opinion, indicate any such intention. If one were to take the trouble of seeing how he would have expressed that intention which is now contended for, and what would be the way of carrying it into effect, meaning to revoke what he had given to any individual, and then intended for that individual and another, he would naturally have revoked that disposition, and have given all the rest and residue of his property, which rest and residue had been given to trustees, the ultimate trust being in favour of Sir Charles Douglas, to the trustees, for the benefit of those he then meant to favour. Under these circumstances, I certainly have not been able to see that the expressions used are so flexible and so capable of being adapted to the intention supposed to be entertained by the testator, as to justify the construction which my noble and learned friends have thought themselves at liberty to adopt; but which, if adopted, would very likely carry his intentions into effect.

(It was ordered, that the decree be reversed; and it was declared, that the appellant was entitled to an * equal * 817 share of the testator's residuary personal estate with the respondent, on the decease of Mrs. Yorke, under and by virtue of the second codicil of the testator. And it was further ordered, that, with this declaration, the cause be remitted to the Court below.)

The Right Hon. CHRISTIAN BROWN, Countess of Dalhousie, and the Right Hon. JAMES ANDREW, Earl of Dalhousie, her son	} Appellants.
JAMES M'DOUALL, Esq., of Logan, (a)
	Respondent.

Domicile. Legitimation. Marriage.

A Scotch marriage can legitimate the previously born children of the married persons, so as to enable them to succeed as heirs to real estate in Scotland.¹ The child of a Scotchman, though born in England, becomes legitimate for all civil purposes in Scotland, by the subsequent marriage of the parents in England, if the domicile of the father was and continued throughout to be

(a) This and the following case of Munro v. Munro were argued about the same time. Judgment was pronounced in both on the same day, and the noble and learned Lords who spoke in moving the judgment united the two cases in their observations. The arguments in each case are given separately; but as each noble and learned Lord made but one speech relating to both cases, the judgment in both will be printed entire at the end of the second case. See post, p. 894.

Neither the place of the marriage nor the place of the birth of the child will, under such circumstances, affect the status of the child.² In matters to be determined by the domicile of the parties, it is a principle of law that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile and acquiring another as his sole domicile.³

By marriage the domicile of the husband becomes that of the wife.⁵

In 1796, a Scotch gentleman of fortune came with his regiment into England, bringing with him a young Scotchwoman then in * a state * 818 of pregnancy. Her child was born in England, and he gave the usual bond to indemnify the parish against the chargeability of the infant. The young woman continued to reside with him and had other children by him, and in each instance a similar bond was given. His regiment was disbanded, and he was then returned to Parliament as member for a Scotch county. He took a house, for the purposes of the children's education, in Penrith, in Cumberland, and, when not in London attending his parliamentary duties, was frequently staying at Penrith. In 1808 he executed a marriage contract, in which he was described as "of Logan" (Scotland), of the one part; and she was described as "M. R." (her maiden name), "residing at Penrith, Cumberland, South Britain, of the other part." No other ceremony of marriage took place, but he shortly afterwards carried her to Scotland, and introduced her and the children as his wife and children.

Held, that he had not lost his Scotch domicile; that his marriage was a Scotch marriage, and that his children were consequently entitled to succeed as heirs to Scotch estate.

March 2, 3, 5, 9, 10, 12. August 10.

THE late Colonel M'Douall, of Logan, was, in 1795, employed to raise a regiment of fencible cavalry. It was embodied at Dumfries, and he marched with it into England on 9th April, 1796. At that time Colonel M'Douall was a domiciled Scotsman.

Some time in the course of the year 1795, Mary Russell went to reside with Colonel M'Douall, at Dumfries and elsewhere in Scotland, and she became pregnant. She continued to reside with him, and accompanied him into England, when he went there with the regiment in April, 1796. She was a Scotchwoman, and till then never had been out of Scotland. She was at this time visibly with child, so that the overseers of the poor of Carlisle obliged Colonel M'Douall to grant a bond, dated 28th April, 1796, that her child should not become a burden on the parish. In that bond she was described as "Mary Russell, single woman."

James M'Douall, the pursuer, was born at Chester, on 19th October, 1796, and, of course, the period of his conception * 819 took place when both his parents were in * Scotland.

Other children were born, and in every instance Colonel M'Douall gave the ordinary bond to indemnify the parish against liability. In each of these bonds the mother was described as "Mary Russell, single woman." The regiment was afterwards disbanded, and Colonel M'Douall was then returned to Parliament for the county of Wigton, and frequently resided in London in discharge of his parliamentary duties. But Mary Russell and her children lived at Penrith, in Cumberland, where he had taken a house for them, and where he constantly visited them.

Colonel M'Douall and Mary Russell executed, at Penrith, in Cumberland, on the 9th March, 1808, a marriage contract in the Scotch form, by which they accepted each other as lawful spouses, and by which he settled upon her, if she should survive him, an annuity of 400*l.*, payable from his entailed estates. In this contract he was described as "of Logan," in Scotland, and she was called "Mary Russell, residing at Penrith, in the county of Cumberland, South Britain." Immediately after this, Colonel M'Douall returned with Mary Russell as his wife to Scotland, and sasine was taken on this contract, on 12th April, in favour of "Mrs. Mary Russell, now spouse of Lieutenant-Colonel Andrew M'Douall, of Logan;" and they continued to live as man and wife constantly in Scotland, and were so known and recognized from that period forward. The marriage was thus constituted by declaration and open cohabitation alone in Scotland, and no ceremony of marriage took place either in England or in Scotland.

Colonel M'Douall was heir of entail to certain lands in Wigtonshire, to which, in default of lawful heirs to the colonel, the present appellants would *succeed. The colonel and * 820 the present respondent, in 1832, brought a consistorial suit for declarator of the legitimacy of the present respondent. The conclusion of the summons was, "And it ought and should be found and declared, by decree and sentence of the Lords of our Council and Session, that the said James M'Douall, pursuer, is the eldest lawful son of the said Andrew M'Douall, and, as such, is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a child born in lawful wedlock, and particularly, that he is entitled to succeed to his said father in his said heritable estate : and the said defenders ought and should be prohibited and discharged from interfering with the rights of the said James M'Douall, as eldest lawful son of the said Andrew M'Douall." The suit was continued by the present respondent after his father's death. The Judges of the first division of the Court of Session ordered the opinions of the other Judges to be taken. The consulted Judges agreed that the marriage, being that of a domiciled Scotchman, had legitimated the respondent ; and Lords GILLIES, MACKENZIE, and COREHOUSE concurred with them. The Lord President dissented, on the ground that the domicile of the putative father could not affect the case, and that the mother had lost her domicile of origin and acquired an English domicile ; so that the children, who must, as illegitimate children, follow the mother's domicile, were subject to the law of England, and by that law were indelibly impressed with the status of bastardy at birth. The following interlocutor was pronounced by the Judges of the first division, in accordance with the opinions of the majority : "The Lords having resumed consideration of these conjoined processes, and advised the same, with the opinions of the consulted Judges, find it proved and established that the pursuer, James M'Douall, is the legitimate *son of the said late Andrew * 821 M'Douall, of Logan : therefore find, decern, and declare in terms of the conclusions of the original and supplementary summons of declarator, in so far as respects the question of the said James M'Douall's legitimacy. Quoad ultra, remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary, to proceed farther as shall be just in respect to the other conclusions of the said conjoined actions.

“C. HOPE, I. P. D.”

This interlocutor was the subject of the present appeal.

Sir F. Pollock, for the appellants.—The first question is, whether a child born in England, under the circumstances of this case, is rendered legitimate, according to the law of Scotland, by a subsequent marriage, so as to be capable of taking under an entail as the heir of the person last seised. It is clear that the respondent was at his birth illegitimate; and that status being fixed on him at his birth by the law of the country where he was born, cannot afterwards be removed by the subsequent marriage of his mother with his putative father. The law of England must govern the present case. The respondent, being born in England, was, by the law of England, an English subject. He became possessed by birth of all the rights which that law confers, and incurred all the consequences which followed from them. If the birth had occurred before the union of the two Crowns, he would have been an English subject, and might have been punished as a traitor had he taken up arms for the Scottish monarch. The law of domicile, which is not a head of law recognized by any English statute or English writer, would not * 822 have affected his condition. By the English law * he bore the character of a bastard; he was “not only begotten but born out of lawful matrimony.” (a) By the same law he was a natural-born subject of the kingdom. (b) He could no more change the character of bastard, thus impressed upon him, than he could have changed his allegiance. He was a natural-born subject of England, being born within the realm of England; and that rule arising from the place has but one exception, which is that of the children of ambassadors. Had he been born in Calais, he would for the same reason have been an alien. This is a principle of public law. But what did all parties consider his condition in private? How was he treated by Colonel M'Douall? As a bastard. The repeated bonds given by Colonel M'Douall to the parish officers show that the colonel always treated the children of Mary Russell as bastards. It is said that that was done to conceal the marriage; but the same mode of speaking of Mary Russell as an unmarried woman continued throughout, even in the matrimonial contract which was executed in 1808, and where she is described as "Mary Russell, residing at Penrith, in Cumberland, South Britain." The character of bastard once acquired by the respondent under the law of England cannot be afterwards changed. If domicile could have any thing to do with the matter, it is clear that the domicile of the mother of an illegitimate child is the only domicile that the English law could recognize. The law here recognizes no relationship between the putative father and the illegitimate child, except for one single purpose, which does not affect this case. Then what was the domicile of the mother? Mary Russell, at * the time of the respondent's birth, held the * 823 situation of the colonel's servant. The domicile of the master is not conferred upon the servant, except perhaps in the single case of an ambassador's servants. If the question of domicile is to be introduced here, then it is plain that a person's living at a particular place is prima facie proof of his being domiciled there. Annandale Peerage Case. (a) The probability arising from that circumstance may be rebutted by evidence, but only in that way. Try this case by that rule. Where was the domicile of the mother? In Chester or in Penrith. Where even (if that could be at all important) was the domicile of the supposed father at the time of the birth? In Chester. But his domicile cannot affect the question. The domicile which must govern the case, if domicile is to be resorted to, is that of the mother: it was that which fixed on the child an English character, and gave it all its rights, and imposed on it all its disabilities. If so, then the character thus fixed on the child by the law of England cannot be altered by the law of any other country whatever. Story on the Conflict of Laws. (b) That author adopts (c) the doctrine of Boullenois, who says, (d) "L'homme est partout de l'état, soit universel, soit particulier, dont sa personne est affectée par la loi de son domicile." "Habilis vel inhabilis in loco domicilii, est habilis vel inhabilis in omni loco." The character being fixed at the birth, by the law of the place of the birth, the place of the subsequent marriage of the parents is not important. The Strathmore Case (e) shows that a marriage does not legitimate children previously born in England, so as * 824 to give them rights as * legitimate children in any part of the United Kingdom. That was a case in which the question was as to the heirship of a title. The heirship to land is governed by rules no less strict. Story, giving the result of the opinions of Boullenois and several other writers, says, (a) "Personal capacity or incapacity, attached to a party by the law of his domicile, is deemed to exist everywhere. Thus a minor or other person deemed incapable of transacting business sui juris in the place of his domicile, will be deemed incapable everywhere." And a very strong illustration is added by Story, drawn from the laws of the United States. This is so according to the public law of all nations. The principle that the place of birth must govern the condition of the child was fully recognized, and indeed distinctly asserted by Lord BROUGHAM in Doe & Birtwhistle v.

Vardill; (b) and his Lordship then goes on to declare that the status thus ascertained in the place of the birth, belongs to the child all over the civilized world. Then comes the case of Rose
v. Ross, (c) in which a Scotchman by birth settled here, and had connection with a woman, by whom he had a son; and he subsequently went to Scotland, with the child and the mother, and after a residence of fifteen days, he married her and then returned to England. In that case it was found by this House, reversing the judgment of the Court of Session, that the child was not entitled to the benefit of legitimation by the subsequent marriage of its parents. There is not one case in which a person born in England, and having at the time of his birth the character of illegitimacy stamped upon him, has been permitted to become legitimate by the subsequent marriage of his parents.

* 825 * On all these grounds, therefore, the judgment of the Court below must be held to be erroneous, and must be reversed.

Mr. K. Bruce, on the same side. — It is impossible to see how the domicile of Colonel M'Douall can in any way influence the decision of this case. It may be true that the mere circumstance of a man being out of his own country does not change his domicile. But here in this case there was much more than that: the colonel was resident in England for some years, and at that time he could only have a domicile of residence and not a domicile of estate, for he was not then the owner of Logan ; he had no house in Scotland, his lares were not set up there, for his father still lived, and Logan was in his father's possession. The long residence even of a military man, in a particular country, gives him a domicile there. That is in effect the opinion of Pothier ; (a) and Lord THURLOW, in Bruce v. Bruce, (b) expressly stated that "a person's being at a place is prima facie evidence of his being domiciled there ;" an inference which might be rebutted by proof, but must otherwise be taken as settled. Thus, he said, a person remaining in a foreign country after his necessary business there was at an end, afforded prima facie evidence of domicile ; which was not affected by a mere intention to return, but would become the settled domicile of the party if he should die before changing it. The same rule was adopted by Sir JOHN NICHOLL, in Stanley v. Bernes, (c) in the case of the will of an Englishman made in Portugal according to the English and not the Portuguese form. The delegates there held that the long * residence of the testator showed that he must be taken * 826 to have been domiciled in Portugal, and therefore that the will was not available, as it was not made according to the Portuguese form. So that if even the domicile of the putative father could affect this case, it would leave the right of the respondent in no better situation than at present. But the domicile of the mother must govern the case ; and if it should be said that she is a minor, the answer is, that the civil law and the law of Scotland recognize the right of a minor to a choice of domicile. Graham v. Erskine, (d) Robertson on Personal Succession, (e) citing Patterson v. Wallace as the authority ; and Marshal v. M'Douall. (g) Mary Russell had therefore an English domicile at the time of the birth of her children. If so, the status of the children is undoubted. The condition of the mother at the time of the birth governs the condition of the child. (h) Thus if she had been a slave at the time of the conception, but had become free before the time of the birth, the child would have been free. But the converse would not hold, that being excepted from the rule in favour of freedom. Ulpian is (i) to the same effect.

That shows that the supposed conception of the respondent in Scotland will not affect the case, the place of birth being that to which the law alone looks. (a) Suppose this child had been born out of the English dominions, he would not have been entitled to inherit land here even though he could be proved to have been conceived here. Had he been legitimate, his birth here would have secured him that right of inheritance.

* 827 * If so, it equally fixes on him the status of illegitimacy.

The marriage, if any, took place in England. The law of England must, therefore, govern the status of the child. Suppose a man and woman crossed the Tweed for the purpose of marrying, but without any intention of staying in Scotland, and they did not stay there, but after a short visit returned to England; the children born here would be English, though the marriage was a Scotch marriage, and though even circumstances might show that the conception of the first child occurred in Scotland. Hogg v. Lashley, (b) Rose v. Ross, (c) and Conty's or Du Quesnoi's Case, (d) all show that the place of the birth is most material in fixing the status of the child. In the case of Shedden v. Patrick, (e) the status of illegitimacy having been impressed on the child at birth by the law of an American state, in which, as in England, a subsequent marriage would not legitimate the children, the status thus impressed was held to be irremovable, and the children were not allowed to succeed to a Scotch estate. Warrender v. Warrender (g) is an express authority of the highest kind to show, that though the wife may be an Englishwoman, yet if the domicile of the husband is clearly Scotch, and if the contract of marriage has reference only to Scotland, and is to be fulfilled there, the Scotch Courts, though such marriage was in form solemnized in England, may inquire into a charge of adultery with a view to dissolve the mar-

* 828 riage. But it shows no more. It does *not affect this case. In Merlin (h) is an ancient case where a child was begotten in adultery, but was born after the marriage of its parents, and the question was raised whether it was legitimate or not. The parliament of Paris held that it was legitimate, on the ground that the time of the birth must fix its condition. That rule has been adopted by all the tribunals of the civilized world, and it is decisive of this case. It settles the fact that this respondent is an Englishman, and therefore in him the status of illegitimacy received at his birth is indelible. To adopt a different rule would be to decide that any child born under whatever circumstances, out of Scotland, can be legitimated by a subsequent marriage in Scotland. This House, which has been for years struggling to keep within the narrowest limits the mischievous principle of legitimation by subsequent marriage, will not adopt a different course, and give it the very alarming extension now demanded.

The Attorney-General, for the respondent. — This case comes before the House with the opinion of nine of the consulted Judges in favour of the respondent. It is not intended to rely on any marriage before 1808, though there is reason to believe that sufficient could be proved to show a marriage valid, according to the laws of Scotland, contracted before that time. The judgment of the Court below proceeded on the validity and the effect of the marriage of 1808, and that is sufficient to support the present claim of legitimacy. It is not denied by the appellants that a valid Scotch marriage then contracted between parties on whom the Scotch law properly attached, would have conferred legitimacy * on the respondent. The whole therefore de- * 829 pends on the question of the law which is to govern the case; or, as it is called, on the presumed indelibility of the status acquired at the time of the birth. But though a bastard here, the respondent might become legitimate in Scotland. The general rule of law is in favour of legitimacy: the English law offers an exception. The appellants have, therefore, to show that the exception necessarily attaches on this case: there is no ground for saying that it does. The Scotch law admits of an exception where the parties could not have contracted marriage at the time of the birth: that ground of exception does not exist here. The respondent relies on the following facts in favour of his claim: First, his father was born and domiciled in Scotland, and was to all intents and purposes a person subject to the Scotch law. Secondly, the mother was likewise subject to the law of Scotland. Thirdly, as a consequence of the two former propositions, the respondent himself was at the time of his birth domiciled in Scotland. Fourthly, the marriage in 1808 was a Scotch marriage, and had all the effect of one: and fifthly, that the respondent was in utero before the mother left Scotland. As to the first point, it is clear that the father originally possessed a Scotch domicile, and there is no ground for saying that he lost it. He was heir to an entailed estate there, and he had taken a house which was kept up there while he continued in this country. After a military service of two or three years in this country, he returned to his establishment in Scotland, and was then returned one of the members for the county of Wigton, and he continued to serve in Parliament till after the marriage.

His domicile could not be lost by his military service in * 830 this * country, for domicile can only be changed animo et facto. For the same reason it could not be lost by his parliamentary services. Warrender v. Warrender. (a) The house he afterwards took at Penrith was for the accommodation of his children, and of course he sometimes resided there, but during all this time his home was in Scotland. There he was domiciled in virtue of his property; there he had his household gods, and there was the centre of his affairs. All these circumstances show a Scotch domicile, and a subjection to Scotch and not to English law. The cases of Bruce v. Bruce, (b) Ommaney v. Douglas, (c) and Lord STOWELL's decision in the case of the Harmony (d), do not affect the present, for in each of them there were acts which showed the suspension, not the destruction, of one domicile, and the creation of another. Similar reasoning will apply to the case of the mother. Her original domicile was undoubtedly Scotch, and she did nothing to lose it and acquire another. A servant who follows a master for a particular service does not thereby lose his domicile of origin. She was in itinere; and by the effect of various English cases, where a person dies in itinere, his goods are not to be administered according to the law of the place where the death happened, but according to that of the place of the deceased's domicile. Had Mary Russell died in October, 1796, her property would undoubtedly have been administered according to the law of Scotland. That shows that the child she then bore must be subject to the same law. Her afterwards living at Penrith being a matter of mere convenience, was not a forfeiture of her original domicile. Then it follows clearly that the third proposition * is established; namely, that the respondent at the moment of his birth was domiciled in Scotland. It may be admitted that the domicile of the putative father cannot be communicated at the birth to the illegitimate child, but it may be communicated by the subsequent marriage of the parents, and at all events the domicile of the mother is so communicated; so that, if she still retained her Scotch character and domicile, it was at once acquired by her child. Bell's Principles. (a) The appellants themselves admit this principle. In their case (b) is this sentence, put forward as an argument by their counsel: "Her children, being illegitimate, follow her domicile." If so, then it is clear that her domicile being Scotch, theirs was Scotch also, and in all respects they were subject to the operation of the Scotch law. The condition therefore impressed on the children by the foreign law to which it is thus admitted they were subject, is a condition which the English law will recognize. Rex v. Brampton. (c) The Waldegrave Peerage Case. (d) This brings the case to the fourth position; namely, that this marriage was a Scotch marriage, and had effect as such. It was so because both the parties were Scotch, and had a Scotch domicile. A marriage may be considered a Scotch marriage, though the form of celebration takes place in England. Warrender v. Warrender. (e) In this case, as in that, the intention of the parties had reference to a domicile in Scotland. Story, in his book on the Conflict of Laws, (g) puts the question "what is to be deemed the true matrimonial domicile?" and answers it by showing, in the several succeeding sections, that it is the * place where * 832 the parties intend to fix their residence, and not that in which, while in transitu, the marriage happened to be celebrated; and he quotes all the most distinguished jurists in support of his opinion. (h) That entirely distinguishes the present case from Strathmore v. Bowes, where there could be no doubt that the marriage was an English marriage: now it is not pretended that any but a Scotch marriage would have the effect of legitimating the children. The fifth position is one of fact, about which there can be no doubt. From that fact it follows that if the marriage in 1808 is, as it must be by the law of Scotland, referred back to the time of the conception, it must be treated as having occurred before the mother left her native country. A Scotch marriage will render legitimate all the children, wherever they were born, and the respondent must, on this view of the case, be declared to be legitimate. No distinction can be taken on account of the place of birth of any of the children, for if any could be taken the most absurd consequences would follow. Could any such distinction be taken, then if one child was born in Scotland, another in England, and a third in France, the first and third would be legitimate and the second a bastard,—a piece of absurdity that could never be seriously contended for. The place of birth, therefore, can have no effect in determining the legitimacy. The question of allegiance cannot determine that of legitimacy; the two things depend on distinct grounds. It is admitted that if a French ship was driven into Dover harbour, and while there a woman on board was delivered of a child, that child, though the vessel sailed from Dover within an hour afterwards, would

* 833 be an English subject; he might sit in Parliament, * be a member of the Privy Council, and hold real property. But that has nothing to do with the legitimacy, which is a mere personal status, quite independent of state or political considerations, while on them alone is the law of allegiance founded. Besides, this law of allegiance, operating in the way now described, is peculiar to this country, and it depends, too, altogether on the place of birth, which legitimacy does not. It is said that illegitimacy once fixed on a person in England, is indelible. The expression is too general; it may be indelible in England, but it cannot be shown that a person illegitimate in this country is incapable of being rendered legitimate all over the world. So far is that from being the case, that Boullenois and Merlin show that English bastards may be rendered legitimate in France. Boullenois says, (a) “If after the birth of a child born in England of English father and mother, the father and mother were to be naturalized in France with their child, and they were afterwards to contract marriage, that child would be considered as rendered legitimate by such subsequent marriage;” and in another place he says, “I should consider it would be the same if the marriage had been contracted in England, provided that the father and mother were naturalized in France with their child.” In taking the opinion of M. Merlin on the case of Rose v. Ross, this question was put, “What in France is the status of a natural child born in England of an Englishman and Englishwoman, who have married in their own country after his birth?" and "what would be the status of that child if he was born not in England but in France?" The answer was, "The law which refuses to a subsequent marriage * the effect of legitimating natural * 834 children, is to be considered a personal law. Thus, it is true, is regulated the personal status of the individual, and the laws follow the individual whose status they regulate; and it is on this principle that the civil code declares that the law of the status follows a Frenchman residing in any foreign country. So it is impossible to consider in France a man to be legitimate, when his parents have been married in England after his birth; and it is that which decided Boullenois to give a similar answer to a similar question." He added, "it would signify a great deal that the father and mother were married in England." The following question was then put: "What in France is the status of a natural child of a Frenchman and a Frenchwoman who are married in England after its birth?" and then the same question with this difference, "who are married in France after the birth in England?" the latter being, in fact, the same question as that raised in the present case. The answer was, "the second question ought to be resolved on the same principles, respectively applied in the inverse sense. The child would be rendered legitimate in France." On the authority of these answers, it is clear that had the parents of the respondent been French instead of Scotch, the respondent would, under the circumstances which occurred in this case, have been legitimated by the marriage. What, then, is to make the difference? It is not true that the status fixed on an individual by the laws of a particular country is indelible. A Frenchman may be naturalized here; and though, as to France, he may not be permitted by its law thus to put off his country, yet as to England he acquires a new status, and, in respect of it, new rights. The judgment here would * have been in favour of the respondent if the Lord Presi- * 835 dent had been of opinion that the mother was domiciled in Scotland. The Lord President was of opinion in favour of the legitimacy in the case of Rose v. Ross, on the ground that there had been no change of domicile; so that it being clear, as it is submitted to be, that here there was no change of domicile, but that the domicile of the mother continued Scotch, the learned Lord may be added to the rest of the Judges as in favour of the legitimacy of the respondent, and the judgment appealed from becomes then an unanimous judgment of the Court below. On no merely doubtful ground of apparently conflicting laws will this House set aside such a judgment.

The Lord Advocate (Rutherford), on the same side.—The respondent has been legitimated by the effect of this marriage of his parents. They have completely fulfilled the two conditions which are requisite for rendering a subsequent marriage capable of conferring legitimacy on previously born children. In the first place, it is necessary that the parents should have been capable of marrying at the time of the conception, or of the birth of the child. In the next place, there must not have been any intervening marriage between the birth of the child and the marriage of the parents. This marriage being perfectly valid in both these respects, what is there to prevent its having its full effect in legitimating the respondent? It is said this must be considered an English marriage, and that the bastardy once impressed on a child in England is indelible. That is a strong expression, but it means nothing more than that, in England, a man who has

 * 836 from it by the effect of any proceeding * under the English law, for the English law does not acknowledge a subsequent marriage as imparting a change in the condition of the child. But the English law itself recognizes certain legal rights in a bastard, as in the case of the bastard eigné. In that respect it favours the bastard more than does the law of Scotland. But this is not in any respect an English marriage; it is a Scotch marriage, and must have all the incidents of one. The Scotch law allows the status of an illegitimate person to be changed by the act of his parents. Has that been done here? It has, if the law of Scotland should be held to prevail. And it does prevail; for the law which must determine what are to be the consequences of the marriage, must be that of the domicile of the father, or that of the intended performance of the marriage contract. Warrender v. Warrender. (a) Thus a Gretna Green marriage between English parties is a good English marriage. The questions of alienage and allegiance have nothing to do with this case. It is said that the respondent is a natural-born English subject, and therefore his birth and status must be determined on by the laws of England. But to make out the argument for this purpose, it should be carried to this extent, that if born in Scotland, the respondent would have been an alien. Such an argument is not, however, put forward. It could not be maintained for a moment. His allegiance is the same, and his citizenship the same, whether born on the north or south side of the Tweed. But his personal status as to certain civil rights may be different according to the place of his birth. If the respondent was seeking any thing from the English law, the rigid rules of that law might perhaps be * applied to him. * 837 But he is not doing any such thing. He is seeking something from the Scotch law, and by that law his claims are to be decided. The respondent has a right to go to the time of conception, in order to try the question by which of the two laws his status is to be decided.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — Are you aware of any case in which parties have been held to legitimate a child by their marriage, when that child must necessarily have been conceived at a time when the parties were not competent to marry? If you went back to the time of the conception, there might be an impossibility of their marrying.]

No such case is known ; but if one such case should exist, it might be fairly argued that the parties were not compelled to go back to the time of the conception, for that that point is only to be considered with a view to the benefit of the child ; and at all events no such objection exists here. It is not true, that because the child was born in England, his status is to be determined by the law of England. Even if treated as a bastard at the time of his birth, his status must be determined by the law of the country of his mother, and that country was Scotland. There is nothing here to show that she had any animus of giving up her native domicile and adopting any other ; and she could not lose her domicile of origin except animo et facto. She was only staying in England for a temporary purpose. But even if it is possible to say that for a time she lost her Scotch domicile, it is beyond all doubt that she resumed it before the marriage, and her domicile at the time of her marriage is the only one that can affect the child. The law of England is, as it is admitted on the other side, silent on the question of domicile. Under such circumstances, the case of * Pottinger v. Wightman (a) * 838 shows that where the law of England is silent, the Courts will not refuse to look to the doctrines of civilians and canonists. But the law of England has nothing to do with this case, which is, in fact, to be governed by the law of Scotland. By that law it is clear that there has been a valid marriage of two persons competent to marry, and that that marriage has had the effect of legitimating their previously born children.

Sir F. Pollock, in reply. — This is not a question of inheritance, which is regulated by a particular law, but of personal status, which must be determined on much more general principles. The rule stated on the other side would go to this length, that if an Englishman and Englishwoman go to Scotland and settle there, and marry and die there, their children, wherever born, would be legitimate, for the marriage would be a Scotch marriage. What is a Scotch marriage? It is, even according to the other side, not simply a marriage had in Scotland, but a marriage had there by parties permanently residing in Scotland; or by parties who, marrying elsewhere, look to that country as the place where the marriage is to be carried into effect, and who may be said to be domiciled there. If that view of the matter is correct, there is no pretence for considering this as a Scotch marriage. There can be no good ground for saying that a marriage in fact celebrated in England, is by a fiction of law to be dealt with as a Scotch marriage, and to legitimate previously born children. If that could be done, any English issue born * 839 before the parents' marriage * would be legitimated, should those parents think fit to go to Scotland, and settle and marry there. This would afford an easy mode of evading the English law. This doctrine of legitimation by subsequent marriage is itself a novel one. It is not to be found in Stair, though he wrote so late as 1590; and in the "Regiam Majestatem" the law is expressly stated to be different, and this now prevailing doctrine is spoken of there with as much abhorrence as in the English statute of Merton. It first crept in by the bishops and the Commissary Court, under the authority of Queen Mary. Where, then, is the consuetudo, which, as the old settled law of a kingdom, is to have so much respect paid to it? If it really exists at all, it must be strictly confined to Scotch births and Scotch persons. So confined, it could have no operation in the present case; for here the birth and the form of marriage, such as it was, were both English. The civil law gave a bastard rights independent of the father. The English and the Scotch law refused to do this; and in that, as in many other things, such as the disposition of property by will, there was the greatest difference between the Scotch and the civil law. The one cannot, therefore, be universally cited as authenticating or justifying the other.

The Attorney-General, interrupting the reply, asked leave to read the following passage from Balfour's Practices, (a) in order to show that at the time of the publication of that work, the doctrine of legitimation by subsequent marriage was well known in Scotland, and the mode of proceeding in the Courts settled: * "If any children be begotten and born between * 840 ane man and ane woman, not being at that time joined in the bands of marriage, and thereafter it shall happen that the same man shall lawfully marry the same woman, the bairns begotten and born before the completion of the same marriage are made lawful, and may sue as right heirs to their parents. And if any controvert or question whether they were begotten or born before the completion of the said marriage, the same shall be discussed before the Spiritual Judge, as is immediately before said of bastardy."

Sir F. Pollock continued. — That quotation proves the previous assertion. The law was introduced by the Spiritual Judges. It must of course be taken, on Balfour's authority, that such was deemed to be the law at that time. That was in the time of Queen Mary, who had directed this law to be administered by the bishops. Still it is curious that it is not found in the subsequent authority of Lord Stair. The question of domicile is as little known in the Scotch as in the English law: in both it has only been recently introduced, and introduced for certain purposes. It has not been borrowed from the civil law: it could not exist there, for the universality of the Roman empire prevented such a doctrine from being of any importance. The argument respecting allegiance has not been fairly met. It was put on the supposition of a case like this arising before the union of the two crowns. In such a case it is clear that birth here would constitute the child an English subject, and his status would in all respects be settled by the English law. In Rose v. Ross, Lord LYNDHURST said, "It is sufficient that the child should have

 * 841 *no subsequent marriage could render him legitimate.”

If that principle should not be adopted, if any rule to ascertain the status of a person should be allowed besides the intelligible rule of the place of his birth, the greatest confusion will be introduced into the law, and every case will be made to depend on the doubtful issue of various and conflicting laws.

MARY SEYMOUR MUNRO *Appellant.*GEORGE MUNRO, and CHARLES MUNRO, his son Respondents. (b)

Domicile. Legitimation. Marriage.

A Scotch gentleman of rank and fortune left Scotland in 1794, and came on a visit to London. In the course of that year he became acquainted with an English lady. In 1795 he took lodgings for her in London, where, in 1796, a child, the fruit of their intercourse, was born. He then took a house on lease and furnished it, and continued to reside in that house with her till 1801, unmarried. In September of that year he married her in an English church. In 1802 he returned to Scotland, taking with him his wife and child, and settled himself in his patrimonial mansion. During the whole period of his residence in London he had been accustomed to write letters to Scotland, declaring from time to time his immediate intention to return, and desiring things to be done which could only be necessary on that account.

Held, that he had not lost his Scotch domicile, and therefore that his marriage was in all respects a Scotch marriage, and his child capable of succeeding as his lawful heir to entailed estates.¹

(a) The case immediately following was argued about the same time; and as it involved the same points of law (though the facts in the two cases varied from each other), both were considered and adjudicated upon together. The judgment in both will be found at the conclusion of the arguments in the next case.

March 17, 19, 23, 24, 26, 30. August 10.

THIS was an action of declarator of legitimacy, brought by the appellant for the purpose of establishing that she was the lawful daughter of Sir Hugh Munro, of Fowlis, bart., and as such the heiress of entail entitled to succeed to the estates of Fowlis. Sir Hugh held those estates under an entail to him and the heirs male, and failing heirs male, then to the heirs female of his body. The respondents, in the event of failure of heirs of the body of Sir Hugh, would succeed to the estates. Sir Hugh Munro succeeded on the death of his father, in 1781, to the estates at Fowlis, and to the dignity of a baronet, but was then under age: he attained his full age in 1784. He took an active share in the management * of his own estates, and was frequently * 843 an attendant at the sittings of the town council of Fortrose, to which he was admitted a member soon after becoming of age. In 1785, 1787, and 1788, he visited the Continent, but always returned to Scotland, where he resided, not at the family mansion, Fowlis Castle, but at Arduilie, a house belonging to his mother. He resided with her till 1794, when, in consequence of some differences with her, he left Scotland professedly on a short visit to London. In November of that year he became acquainted with a Miss Mary Law in London, and an attachment arose between them. In October, 1795, her pregnancy being declared, he took apartments for her in Balsover Street, Oxford Street, where, on the 14th of May, 1796, the appellant was born. He afterwards took a house on lease in Gloucester Place, Portman Square, where he and Miss Law resided together till 1801. In September of that year he married her at the parish church of St. Mary-le-bonne, according to the form of the ritual of the Church of England. He continued to reside in London for some months after his marriage, but then broke up his establishment in Gloucester Place and went to Scotland, and there introduced his wife and daughter to his friends and connections. In August, 1803, Lady Munro and two female attendants were drowned while bathing on the shore near Fowlis Castle. As some rumours had been raised of the legal incapacity of Miss Munro to succeed as heiress to the entailed estates, the suit for declarator was brought to determine that question. The conclusion of the summons was, that "it should be found and declared that the pursuer, the said Miss Mary Seymour Munro, as lawful daughter, and at present only lawful child, of the said Sir Hugh * 844 Munro, is entitled, * failing her said father and heirs male of his body, to succeed to the estate of Fowlis and others, in virtue of the clause of destination and other clauses in the entail aforesaid; and that she has a vested interest therein, and jus crediti over the same, as heir female procreate of the body of Sir Hugh Munro." The Lord Ordinary (COREHOUSE) reported the case to the Lords of the first division of the Court of Session, by whom the other Judges were consulted. In this, as in the preceding case, the Lord President thought that the domicile of the father had nothing to do with fixing the status of the child; but he was also of opinion, that if it had, then the domicile was altogether English, and therefore the child was indelibly impressed by the law of England with illegitimacy. Six of the other Judges thought the child legitimated by the subsequent marriage, on the ground that the domicile of the father was Scotch; six others thought the domicile was English, and therefore that the appellant was illegitimate. In accordance with the opinion of the majority of the Judges, a decree was pronounced relieving the defenders (the respondents) from the conclusions of the libel. This was the decree now appealed from.

Mr. Pemberton, for the appellant. — The arguments here will be confined as much as possible to those points in which this case differs from that of Dalhousie v. M'Douall, and to those which the discussion in that case has suggested. The first distinction between the two cases is to be found in the conclusion of the summons, which in the present case does not seek for a declarator as to the status of the appellant, but, according to the terms of the entail, prays that she may be declared entitled, * 845 as persona designata, * as immediate heir in succession after the death of Sir Hugh, to the estate of Fowlis. If by the Scotch law the appellant is the heir of Sir Hugh Munro, she is entitled to have the judgment of the Court below reversed, and the declarator directed to be in her favour. The question of the domicile of Sir Hugh Munro, at the time of the birth of the appellant and at the time of his marriage, is most important. All the circumstances here show it to have been a Scotch domicile. Six of the Judges were of opinion that it was an English, six that it was a Scotch domicile ; but all twelve agreed, that if the domicile was English, Miss Munro was not entitled ; if it was Scotch, she was entitled to the declarator prayed for. The thirteenth Judge, the Lord President, was of opinion that domicile had nothing to do with the matter, which must be decided by the place of the birth of the child, and that that being English, the status of illegitimacy had indelibly attached itself to her. This case, therefore, is unprejudiced by any thing which has occurred in the Court below ; and if this House should be of opinion that the domicile was Scotch, the course will be to affirm the judgment of the twelve Judges who thought that that would of itself entitle the appellant to the declarator which she sought to obtain. It may now be assumed, for the purposes of this argument, that the place of the marriage is immaterial. The foundation of this appellant's title is the domicile of Sir Hugh Munro, her father. If that is Scotch, she is entitled to what she asks. The principle is laid down very clearly in the case of Somerville v. Somerville, (a) where it was held that the mere place of birth or death does not constitute the domicile, the * domicile of origin, which arises from birth and * 846 connections, remaining until clearly abandoned and another taken. The Master of the Rolls there said, (b) “ The third rule I shall extract is this, that the original domicile, or, as it is called, the forum originis, or domicile of origin, is to prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile and taking another as his sole domicile.” In England, the domicile of a family follows that of the father ; his domicile is that of his family. We propose here to show by the evidence that Sir Hugh was clearly by domicile of origin Scotch ; that he retained that without interruption or doubt until 1794 ; that when he left Scotland in that year he did so with no intention of abandoning his Scotch domicile, but merely to pay a visit, as any other gentleman might do, to another country, and to return at the end of his visit ; that though he remained in England from 1794 to 1802, he had never any intention of abandoning his Scotch domicile, but looked on himself and required others to look upon him as a person who was temporarily absent from his home, but who, though constantly prevented from executing his intention, had the most settled intention of speedily returning to it. On attaining his full age in 1784, the first thing he did was to make use of his newly acquired power, in order to sever the only tie he had with England. He had succeeded to the estate of Woodlands, in Dorsetshire; his father got that estate through Sir Hugh's grandmother. His father died indebted. The Scotch estates were equally liable with the English estates to the payment of those debts;

* 847 * but the first thing he did was to sell the English estates for the payment of those debts. That was a strong indication of intention, and the more so as the estates sold for 30,000*l.*, being considerably more than the amount that was necessary for the purpose of the payment, and the surplus of the money thus obtained he invested in property in Scotland. [The learned counsel here went through a series of letters written by Sir Hugh when on his travels before he was of age, upon his attaining twenty-one, and while residing in London after 1794, with the view of showing that he had always considered Scotland as his home, and that when staying away from Fowlis he was perpetually writing to say that in a few days he should return, and directing alterations in his house, and in the arrangements of his family, which could only be needed on account of the presence of the master.] On the law as applied to these facts there can be no doubt. Sir Hugh had a domicile of origin which he never lost. Such a domicile can only be lost in consequence of a clear intention to abandon it. An absence, however long, if not accompanied by such an intention, can have no such effect. To acquire a new domicile, there must be both residence and intention; to retain it, intention alone is sufficient. This may clearly be taken as the result of Sir J. LEACH's opinion in Munroe v. Douglas; (a) and it was also the opinion of Sir JOHN NICHOLL in Curling v. Thornton. (b) According to Pothier, (c) the original domicile must prevail if it be even doubtful where the domicile is; and Denisart (d) is of the same opinion. All the authorities are collected by Mr. Burge, (e) and the result of them seems to

“par le concours de la volonté et du fait;” that having been once acquired, it may be retained by intention, without actual residence; that residence alone, however long, will not

acquire it; but that, however short that residence, domicile may be acquired if the intention to acquire it is clearly manifested. All these positions were fully shown in Van Leuwen's Case, (a) referred to by Mr. Burge. (b) He was a citizen of Utrecht, who resided for ten years, from his fourteenth to his twenty-fourth year of age, in Spain, whither he had been sent to trade, but he did nothing to show an intention of acquiring a domicile there. On his return he took a room in Utrecht, and performed certain things required by the custom there to constitute citizenship; but he did not permanently live there, and he died intestate in Amsterdam. It was held that his property must be distributed according to the laws of Utrecht, in which he was to be considered as domiciled at the time of his death. On the same principle, a marriage celebrated at Smyrna between a Dutchman, who held the office of Dutch consul there, and resided at that place for a great many years, was held to be regulated in its consequences by the law of Amsterdam, his residence at Smyrna not having put an end to his domicile of origin. (c) The case of Madame Justina Gunterroth (d) was decided on the same ground that residence of any length would not acquire a domicile "nisa voluntas et animus accesserit." A change of domicile is not easily to be presumed, says Voet; (e) and *the same author * 849 there expresses in the clearest manner what will constitute a domicile. "Illud certum est neque solo animo, neque destinatione patris familias, aut contestatione sola, sine re et factæ domicilium constitui: neque sola domus comparatione in aliqua regione, neque sola habitatione sine proposito illic perpetuo morandi." And the general definition of a domicile is given by the same author as the place where a man "larem rerumque ac fortunarum suarum summam constituit," — a definition at once the most expressive and the most exact, and one which has ever since been recognized as authoritative by all the tribunals of the world. Vattel (g) has expressly adopted it. If these authorities establish, as it is submitted they do, that the mere leaving home for however long a period will not, without the intention to change the domicile, have that effect, then it is submitted that Sir Hugh's residence in England did not affect his domicile, but that it all the while continued to be Scotch. The evidence in this case does not justify, it contradicts, the assumption of any such intention. Then what is the effect of the domicile on the question of legitimacy? It is an admitted principle that a Scotch marriage will legitimate previously born children. What is to prevent the application of that principle in the present case? Certainly not any loss of Scotch character by a change of domicile. The authorities already quoted abundantly show that there has been no change of domicile in this case. But then it will be said that the marriage was contracted in England, and consequently cannot have the effect of a Scotch marriage; then that the mother was at * 850 the time of the birth domiciled in England, and that * the child, being then illegitimate, must follow the domicile of the mother; and, lastly, that the birth took place in England, and consequently that the status of illegitimacy was thereby indelibly impressed on the child. But the great answer to all these arguments is, that the husband was a domiciled Scotchman; that the marriage was therefore a Scotch marriage, and being so, that all the incidents of a Scotch marriage attached upon it. One of the great incidents of such a marriage is to legitimize children by having relation to a period antecedent to the birth, so that the marriage is considered to have taken place (there being no lawful impediment to the marriage) before the birth of the child. The rule is, “Retrotrahitur ad tempus nativitatis liberorum, ut sic taliter legitimated, ab initio legitime nati censeantur.” (a) In that rule no restriction exists as to the place of the birth or the domicile of the mother. The only qualification which this rule of law admits of, is that of a previous impediment so well known in the law of Scotland, but which need not be considered here, because no one pretends that it existed. The effect of this subsequens matrimonium in legitimatizing the children is so great that a grandson will have the benefit of the legitimacy of his father, conferred by the marriage of the grandfather and grandmother even after the father’s death. That was a principle of the civil law, (b) and the law of Scotland has adopted that principle to its fullest extent; (c) Craig says (d), “Legitimos vocamus, qui in tanta enim vis est matrimonii subsequentis, ut de priori delicto inquiri non sinat, et illud omnino tollat, et purget." Several other eminent Scotch law writers adopt this opinion. (a) The exceptions to this otherwise universal rule arise out of incest and adultery. Such being the law of Scotland, it is binding on all Scottish subjects, and conclusive as to their rights. The respect which is due to the principles of the Scotch law, however they may be opposed to English notions of law, has been clearly asserted in this House in the case of Birtwhistle v. Vardill: (b) "It is not more alien to the English law to adopt the fiction that such children are born in wedlock, than it is alien to the Scotch law to exclude that principle. The English rule being statutory can make no difference. A fixed and known principle of common law has exactly the same force as a statutory provision." But then it will be said that the fact of the marriage having taken place in England makes a great difference in this case. It is not denied that there are some dicta to be found in the cases of Shedden v. Patrick, (c) Strathmore v. Bowes, (d) and Rose v. Ross, (e) which do seem to render that matter of importance. But they are merely dicta. And after the case of Warrender v. Warrender, (g) it cannot now be doubted that the right to inquire into alleged adultery with a view to dissolve a marriage had in England, the lady being an English lady, is possessed by the Courts of the country in which the husband's domicile is, and where *the contract of marriage was intended to be per- * 852 formed. It was so decided on the ground that, in contracting a marriage, the wife acquires the domicile of the husband. Domicile in all these cases rules other considerations. There is no one decision that depends on the mere place of the marriage or that of the birth. In the cases of Conty du Quesnois, (h) Shedden v. Patrick, (c) Strathmore v. Bowes, (d) Rose v.

Ross, (a) and in Warrender v. Warrender, where all the previous cases were considered, every thing was made to depend on the question of domicile.

There is no such thing as the indelibility of illegitimacy: not even in England does that indelibility exist. It may, for instance, be at once removed by an Act of Parliament. It cannot, therefore, be indelible, since an Act of Parliament may make a bastard legitimate in England, as a subsequent marriage will make him legitimate in Scotland. Nor is there any valid argument to be drawn from the supposed doctrine of allegiance; for taking the statements in the books as to allegiance to be conclusive, still it is clear that the distinction between allegiance and domicile is very great. The first can never be put off; the other can be put off and resumed at pleasure: the first depends on a principle of state policy, which is unalterable; the next depends on the sole exercise of the will of the individual. The rule of domicile must govern this case, and it must most especially do so since the subject-matter of the litigation is the title to real property, which depends entirely on the lex rei sitæ. The municipal law * 853 of Scotland is therefore that which * can alone be applied to the case: and the appellant being fully brought within the operation of that law, she is entitled to be declared the lawful heir of entail.

Sir W. Follett, on the same side.—It is true that the word domicile has not been found in any of the writers on English law; but that does not show that English law would not admit the doctrine of domicile and its consequences, when properly presented as a subject of adjudication, but merely that our law writers have hitherto confined themselves to the municipal law of their own Courts. Munro v. Sandhurst (b) may be added to the cases already cited as decided on the question of the domicile of the party. Boullenois, (c) after observing that, where the laws of a kingdom allow a bastard to be legitimated by a subsequent marriage, as in France, his legitimacy thus lawfully acquired in his own country must be recognized by all other nations; or if the law of his own country does not allow of this legitimation, as in England, his continued illegitimacy must in like manner be recognized; proceeds to say, “J’applique encore cette decision à un enfant Anglois, né en Angleterre d'un concubinage, et dont le père et la mère seroient venus demeurer en France, et y auroient maries sans s'y être faites naturaliser, parceque étant véritablement étrangers, et comme tels soumis aux lois d'Angleterre, leur enfant ne peut pas être, suivant ces lois, bâtard en Angleterre de naissance, et être regardé comme légitimé en France parcequ'il porte partout l'état et la condition dont il est par les lois de sa nation." And this opinion has been completely adopted by Merlin. (a) In this passage it is *clear * 854 that naturaliser may be taken as synonymous with domiciled; the condition of the parties at the time of the marriage, and not the mere locality of the marriage, being that which is to govern the case. And to show this the more strongly, he adds, that the naturalization must be before and not after the marriage, for otherwise it will produce no such effect. That the place of the marriage cannot affect the question, but that the domicile of the parties must decide, is manifest. Try it by this test:—An Act exists in this country to declare the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister void. Suppose, after the passing of that Act, two such persons were to go to France for the purpose of being married, such a marriage not being forbidden in France, and should there marry and a child should be born, by the law of France that marriage would be legal and that child legitimate. Would the child be legitimate in England? By the law of this country the disability is permanent, and the marriage would have no effect. In this country, therefore, it is clear that the child would be illegitimate; and it would be so because the parties marrying were domiciled in England, and the marriage (except for the mere question of the due observance of the forms required by the law of France) would therefore be an English marriage. The solution of these questions, if referred to domicile, is plain and easy; if put on any other ground it would be most confused and difficult. On the ground of domicile, twelve out of thirteen Judges have decided that this appellant is entitled, if in fact her father was domiciled in Scotland. It is that question as to where he was domiciled that alone created doubts in their minds. The other important question, then, is as to the fact of the domicile. That domicile was *Scotch. It was not changed by * 855 the residence in this country of Sir H. Munro. That was his domicile by birth, and all the authorities show that that is to be presumed to continue till the contrary is shown. Denisart and Pothier (a) lay down this principle, and Mr. Burge (b) cites a number of other authorities, all in support of this proposition.

Warrender v. Warrender (c) is the strongest case which can be imagined in support of this doctrine of domicile. There the marriage took place in England, the lady was an English lady, the husband resided for years in England, and was member of Parliament for an English borough, and yet his domicile of origin was held not to have been lost, and in virtue of that domicile the Scotch Courts were held by this House entitled to inquire into a cause alleged for the dissolution of the marriage. The English authorities, agreeing with foreign writers, show that the question of domicile depends on the mind of the person. In Stanley v. Bernes, (d) Sir J. NICHOLL declared that there must be a residence sine animo revertendi, in order to change the domicile of origin. How strong must be the circumstances establishing that animus may be seen in that case. There the party had left this country and resided in Portugal for fifty-six years; he renounced his religion and became a Roman Catholic; he married and had a son in Lisbon; he asked for admission to Portuguese allegiance, and got it, and was treated by the French in 1808 as a natural-born subject; yet even in his case it was doubted whether he had done that which showed a determination to change

* 856 his domicile of origin. The same principle * was adopted in what is called the Annandale Case, Bempde v. Johnson; (e) and all these cases, with many others, were referred to in Somerville v. Somerville, (g) which was itself founded on the previous decisions in this House of Ommaney v. Bingham (h) and Bruce v. Bruce, (i) and that case was followed by Curling v. Thornton; (k) so that it is difficult to conceive a more continuous course of decisions establishing any one point of doctrine. It may, therefore, be assumed that every presumption is to be made in favour of the domicile of origin. Secondly, that no change of it can occur without an actual residence in a new place, and an intention to fix a residence permanently there; and thirdly, that no new domicile can be acquired without a clear intention of abandoning the old. These two last propositions completing the doctrine of change animo et facto. Now, it cannot be pretended that any one of these circumstances exists here. If this was the case of a Scotchman in ordinary circumstances in life, without any property, or any thing at all beyond the mere circumstances of parentage and birth to connect him with the country, there would not be sufficient to show that there had been any change in his domicile: but when it is recollected that he was a gentleman of fortune and rank; that his fortune was in Scotland, that his rank was altogether Scotch, that even his personal property was in Scotland, and that his money was in a Scotch bank; that all his connections were in that country; that his domus mansionalis was there, and that from time to time, almost from day to day, during his continuing here, he was directing alterations with regard to that * mansion, and fitting it for his * 857 permanent residence,—no one can doubt that his domicile of origin remained; and that there existed neither the fact of his having a settled residence in this country, nor his intention to have one, and to abandon the land of his birth. Under these circumstances, the law to be administered in the case is Scotch; and by that law it is clear that his marriage was a Scotch marriage, and that his daughter is the lawful heir to his entailed estate.

Mr. Knight Bruce, for the respondent. — Fortunately there is no dispute as to the facts of this case, so far as the marriage and the birth of the appellant are concerned. The domicile of the mother is not in question, so that as far as that is concerned the domicile of the child at the time of birth was English. With these facts settled beyond dispute, the question is, whether this case is distinguishable from those of Shedden v. Patrick, (a) Strathmore v. Bowes, (b) and Rose v. Ross. (c) These three cases were all decided in this House, and are therefore binding authority not only on the Courts below, but on this House itself. The case of Rose v. Ross is very strong in favour of the respondent. The man there was a native of Scotland. He had a child born to him in England; it was illegitimate; he brought the mother of the child to his own country, Scotland; he stayed there fifteen days before he married her; he then had a lawful marriage celebrated; he remained in Scotland some time after the marriage, and then returned to England. This House, sitting as a Scotch Court of Appeal, decided that the child * 858 of parents who were thus married, * though married in Scotland, could not succeed to Scotch landed estate. If that case cannot be distinguished from the present, there is an end of the appellant's argument. But it is said to be distinguishable on the ground that the marriage in Rose v. Ross was English, but that the marriage in this case, though actually taking place in England, was in law a Scotch marriage. On what is that argument based? On the assertion that at the time of the marriage Sir Hugh Munro was in law, though not in fact, domiciled in Scotland. This assertion cannot be supported. The domicile of origin of Sir Hugh Munro is not denied; but he had lost it by a long residence on the Continent and in England. [He referred at considerable length to the evidence and to the letters written by Sir Hugh Munro while in England.] If, therefore, domicile was to govern this case, the domicile was English, and not Scotch. But the mere fact of a man's domicile has alone no effect on a case like the present. Connected with other things, it becomes of importance; and when it is found that here Sir Hugh Munro passed the greater part of his life absent from Scotland, it is clear that the inferences sought to be drawn from expressions in his letters are much overcharged, if indeed they are at all justified. It may not be improper, with regard to those inferences, to remark that if some of the expressions in the letters indicate an intention to return to Scotland (an intention that, however frequently expressed, was left for years without even an attempt to carry it into execution), there are others which speak of the journey to Scotland as he might have spoken of a journey in the summer to Brighton or to Cheltenham. Thus, for instance, in one he deliberately speaks of the discomforts of * 859 "a tour" in Scotland, and in another he says * that he shall make "a jaunt" thither. These expressions indicate a feeling that his home was elsewhere than in Scotland, and they are the more important since they are in accordance with his conduct; while those relied on by the other side are altogether opposed to it. It is likewise to be remarked, that up to the period of his marriage, though he was frequently writing to Scotland, he had not a house fit to receive him there. That circumstance, if intention is to be relied on, is a strong indication of intention, and in a very marked manner distinguishes this case from that of Warrender v. Warrender, (a) where the husband not only had a mansion in Scotland befitting his rank and fortune, but frequently went thither, taking his wife and family with him, in the intervals of public business. The letters of Sir Hugh, so much relied on, are the ordinary letters of a careful man of business, who was fond of giving the most particular directions to his agents, and not unfrequently stimulated their attentiveness by the declaration that he was coming down to see the progress of the matters which were the subjects of his directions. The same conduct is pursued by Englishmen who have large estates in Ireland which they never visit in the course of their lives, but about which they are incessantly writing directions and orders to their agents. No one would affect to say that the fact of their possession of property in Ireland makes them domiciled Irishmen. If intention is to be taken as fixing domicile, then it must be admitted that conduct is the best evidence of the existence of intention; and, tried by that test, it is clear that the intention of Sir Hugh, up to the time of his marriage, was to live in England as an Englishman. Every time he declared that he should go to * Scotland, and yet delayed * 860 carrying that intention into effect, he gave by the very declaration and the delay to execute it a fresh proof of his preference of an English residence. The reason for his keeping a Scotch banker is shown in one of his letters, in which he uses these words: "Procure me a 500*l.* credit on that one of the Scotch banks which shall appear to you most liberal in dealing." He was a sharp man of business, and dealt with the Scotch banks because he thought his doing so was to his own advantage. [The learned counsel again referred to the letters.] What is the result of all these letters? They show, combined with the conduct of Sir Hugh, an intention to remain and be settled in England. The cases, then, of Somerville v. Somerville, Bempde v. Johnson, Balfour v. Scott, and Bruce v. Bruce, do not apply for the purpose for which they were cited for the appellant; but they do apply for the respondent, and Balfour v. Scott (b) is strongly in point here. That was a case of a Scotchman, a great landed proprietor, who, like Sir Hugh Munro, had dismantled his house, and had lived for years in London; and there, though exactly the same arguments which have been used here, were applicable, and were applied to his case, he was held to be domiciled in England. In

Curling v. Thornton (a) the question of domicile never was decided. The decision there merely was as to the sufficiency of a responsive allegation, and the dicta thrown out, however entitled to respect, have no authority, since they did not amount to a judicial decision. The decision, in fact, amounted only to a recognition and application of that principle which the

* 861 supreme legal authority in * this country had clearly laid down, that an Englishman is not entitled, by acquiring a foreign domicile, so far to throw off his country as to dispose of his English property by a will otherwise than in the English form; and that the Courts here cannot reject a will made by an Englishman in the English form, merely because it is made in a foreign country. The principle really deducible from that case is in favour of the respondent; for it amounts to this, that wherever an Englishman is domiciled, his will must be dealt with as the will of an Englishman. The same learned Judge, in Stanley v. Bernes, (b) upon exactly the same principle, gave effect to two codicils made in Portugal by an Englishman, good in their form and attestation, according to the English law, though bad according to the Portuguese law, and though it was there admitted that the testator had in fact resided for years in Portugal. (c) These cases show that domicile has not the force attributed to it by the appellant. In Bruce v. Bruce, (d) an Englishman went to India, with the intention of returning here; but as he had only an indefinite hope of returning, that did not affect the question of domicile. Lord THURLOW there said, (e) "The true ground on which the case turned was the deceased being domiciled in India. He was born in Scotland, but he had no property there. A person's origin, in a question of "where is his domicile?" is

* 862 to be *reckoned but as one circumstance in evidence, which may aid other circumstances; but it is an enormous proposition that a person is to be held domiciled where he drew his first breath, without adding something more unequivocal. A person's being at a place is primâ facie evidence that he is dom-

(c) But this decision was reversed by the delegates, 3 Hagg. 465. These two codicils had been made with a view to pass English property. The testator had executed a will and codicils in the Portuguese form, to dispose of his Portuguese property. Unfortunately, the reasons of the delegates are not given, and the manner in which the case was viewed by them does not appear.

iciled at that place; and it lies on those who say otherwise to rebut that evidence.” This question of domicile came especially under the consideration of Sir W. Scott, in the case of the Harmony, and there that learned Judge made the following most important remarks: (a) “Of the few principles that can be laid down generally, I may venture to hold that time is the grand ingredient in constituting domicile. I think that hardly enough is attributed to its effects; in most cases it is unavoidably conclusive. It is not unfrequently said, that if a person comes only for a special purpose, that shall not fix a domicile. This is not to be taken in an unqualified latitude, and without some respect had to the time which such a purpose may or shall occupy; for if such a purpose be of a nature that may probably or does actually detain the person for a great length of time, I cannot but think that a general residence might grow upon the special purpose.” The texts of the civil law on the question of domicile have already been cited. Their effect has been well given by Domat: (b) “Le principal domicile de chacun est celui qu’il a dans le lieu où il tient le siège et le centre de ses affaires, où il a ses papiers, qu’il ne quitte que pour quelque cause particulier, d’où, quand il est absent, on dit qu’il est en voyage, où, quand on revient, on dit qu’il est de retour, où il passe les principales fêtes de l’année, où il porte les charges, et où il jouit les privilèges de ceux qui en * sont habitans;” and he adds, “Il * 863 est égal pour ce qui regarde le domicile d’une personne qu’elle reside ou fasse sa demeure dans sa maison propre, ou dans la maison d’une autre tenue a loyer ou a aucun autre titre. Et par cette même raison, que la residence fait le domicile, celui qui a une maison en propre dans un lieu où il ne reside pas, n’y est pas pour cela domicilié.” And the Code Napoleon (c) says, “Le domicile de tout Français, quant a l’exercice de ses droits civils, est au lieu où il a son principal établissement;” and that the change of domicile shall be effected by the fact of adopting a real habitation in another place. The “Larem ac fortunarum suarum summam” is in this case to be found only in London, which here answers the description given by Domat and by the Code Napoleon of that “real habitation” which constitutes a domicile. So that, even taking the rule from the other side, that the contract must be governed in its consequences by the law of the place where the spouses intend to reside, as laid down in Warrender v. Warrender, (a) it is clear that London was that place, for there is not in the evidence in this case any thing to show that at the time of the marriage there was any intention to perform the contract in Scotland. The marriage took place in September, 1801, in an English parish church. On the 21st of October, 1800, Sir Hugh had written a letter which showed the possibility of his being prevented from going to Scotland in the course of the next year, and on the 16th December, 1801, was written the next letter which had any reference to that subject, and in that he merely says, "It is my resolution, please God, to go early * 864 next summer into Scotland. I wish, if possible, to * reside at Fowlis while I am in that country, and I hope I shall without difficulty be able to accomplish that wish; but be that as it may, nothing but death or violent sickness shall prevent my affording you an opportunity of seeing me." In the next letter on the same subject, dated in January, 1802, he says, "I am anxious, during my visit to Ross-shire, which must be very short, to avoid business as much as I can." No one can say that these letters show that intention of possessing a Scotch domicile, which, even by the argument on the other side, is necessary to retain the domicile of origin. On the contrary, all the letters show an intention to make London his "real habitation," the "centre of his affairs," and the spot on which he constituted his "larem ac fortunarum suarum summam." It is a most important circumstance that the house in Gloucester Place was taken by Sir Hugh on a lease. The respondent being right as to the fact of the domicile, the law is decided by the cases of Strathmore v. Bowes, Shedden v. Patrick, and Rose v. Ross.

(c) Code Civil, §§ 102, 103.

But even supposing the matrimonial domicile to be Scotland, that would not, under the facts of this case, render the appellant legitimate. The birth was in this country, and it occurred before marriage. By the law of this country, legitimacy cannot be conferred by a subsequent marriage. The status of the child, which it will not be denied depends on that of the parent, cannot be afterwards changed. The expression that, by the law of England, bastardy is indelible may be correct or not, but it is plain that by that law legitimacy, or the capacity of legitimacy, existing in a person is indelible. That characteristic of the individual must be taken from the law of the place of his birth; and if bastardy is by the law of that * place indelible, the * 865 status of the individual is indelible. The authorities of Lords ELDON, REDESDALE, LYNDEHURST, BROUGHAM, and WYNFORD, all go to show that the place of the marriage and the birth determine the status ; and they are all founded upon the judgments of Courts or the authorities of the most recognized text writers. If that is so, then the status here has been so determined. If Merlin, (a) as it is supposed, really makes the question depend on the acquisition of the right of citizenship, he is in error ; for all the authorities show that domicile, such as is acquired by long residence and having the centre of a man's affairs in a particular spot, and nothing else, can be considered as affecting it. Domicile, again, is not decided, as Merlin intimates, by the residence being with or without the esprit de retour. It is constituted, as Lord STOWELL said, by the permanency of the habitation. But domicile does not decide the question of legitimacy, which depends on other circumstances. After reviewing all the authorities, Lord BROUGHAM, in Birtwhistle v. Vardill, (b) says, speaking of the question of legitimacy, "the whole inclination of a man's mind must be towards that law which prevails where each man is born and where his parents were married, supposing the countries to be one and the same ; and if they differ, I should then say the law of the birthplace must prevail." There can be no authority for giving to a child born out of Scotland the benefit, or imposing on it the liabilities, of the Scotch law : so that, even admitting, for the sake of argument, that the domicile of the father before marriage, and, since marriage, that of the mother of the appellant is to be treated as Scotch, and the marriage as a Scotch marriage, * still it is confidently sub- * 866 mitted that, on every authority, the child, having been born in England and born illegitimate, must so remain.

Mr. Fleming, on the same side. — The case divides itself into two parts, the first of which is the question of domicile. It is admitted, that if the domicile is not decided to be Scotch, the appellant has no right to the declarator now prayed. The second point relates to the status of the appellant, and amounts to this : can she, under any circumstances, be considered legitimate ? The 1st Will. 4, c. 69, gives jurisdiction (c) in these matters to the

(c) Sect. 33.

Court of Session, instead of the Court of the Commissary. Unless the latter Court could before that statute have entered on the consideration of this case, the Court of Session cannot now have any authority to do so. The old authorities are therefore applicable here. The law relating to domicile, as stated by the other side, cannot be supported. Intention is not every thing; or if intention is to govern, it must do so when ascertained by the acts, and not by the expressions of the party. The chief authorities declaring what is domicile are the Code Napoleon, (a) Denisart, (b) Pothier, (c) Story; (d) and they are all collected in Burge. (e) Vattel (g) has defined domicile to be a fixed residence in any place with an intention of always staying there; but Story (h) truly observes, that "it would be more correct to say that that place is properly the domicile of a person in which his habitation is fixed, without any present intention of removing therefrom." Taking all these authorities * together, it is impossible to say that the appellant here can bring herself within their operation. Sir Hugh Munro gave the strongest intimation of his intention as to domicile, by taking a lease of the house in Gloucester Place. His intention is therefore against the appellant's title. But the mere fact of a long residence in a particular place, without any expression of intention as to domicile, has been declared by Lord ELDON sufficient to induce him to declare that the domicile was in that place. Such were the circumstances as stated by his Lordship. Tovey v. Lindsay. (i) That doctrine agreed with the opinion of Lord STOWELL, in the case of the Harmony. (k) Boullenois gave a direct opinion (l) that the status of legitimacy or illegitimacy was one of those states or conditions of people which do not change with the change of domicile: an opinion which is adopted by Mr. Burge in his very learned work. (m) And Lord Chief Baron ALEXANDER, in delivering the opinion of the Judges in Birtwhistle v. Vardill, (n) says, "The character of legitimacy or illegitimacy attached to the persons of English or American claimants by their own law, accompanies them everywhere, and would prevent their being received as heirs everywhere within the limits of the Christian world." There can be no partial legitimacy; it must exist everywhere if it exists at all. Now it is impossible to say that the appellant is legitimate in the Courts in England. If so, she cannot, according to these authorities, be legitimate anywhere. Supposing the domicile of the father and mother at the time of the marriage to have been Scotch, that * would * 868 not affect the question of the legitimacy of the child which had been born in England some years before that marriage. It will be said, however, that to this remark the law of Scotland furnishes an exception, by conferring legitimacy on the children through a marriage of their parents celebrated at any distance of time after their birth. But that proposition, if so stated, is not correct. The subsequent marriage will only confer legitimacy under peculiar circumstances. The parties must be Scotch, the marriage must be Scotch, and there must have existed no impediments to the marriage. It is submitted, too, that a subsequent marriage in Scotland will not confer legitimacy on a child previously born out of Scotland. The doctrine of legitimation by subsequent matrimony has only been the law of Scotland during the last two or three centuries; nor has its operation been admitted in any decided cases except where all the parties have been Scotch, and the events have taken place in Scotland. It is said to have been borrowed from the canon law, but it was at first somewhat doubtfully recognized by the law writers of Scotland; they put it forward, but in general terms. Such was the mode in which Lord KAINES treated it. (a) In ancient times it was certainly unknown. It is not mentioned as a law of Scotland in the "Regiam Majestatem;" and it has not been introduced by the authority of any statute. It exists alone upon comparatively recent custom. And even in modern times, the best writer on the law of Scotland shows that the operation of this peculiar law is not so universal in itself, nor so easily applied, as it is contended to be in this case. Bell, in his "Principles of the Law of Scotland," (b) says, that * where the * 869 domicile of the parents at the birth and the marriage is Scotch, the child is legitimated, but that it does not become so by the parents going to Scotland to marry. This mode of speaking of the parents in the plural number must be taken, in so careful and accurate a writer, as an indication of his opinion that it would not be sufficient if only one of the parents fulfilled these conditions. That would show that the domicile not of one but of both must be Scotch. The appellant here must contend not that she was legitimated by the marriage, but that she was legitimate from the beginning. But such an argument would at once be fatal to her claim; for at the beginning, namely, from the moment of birth, and for some years afterwards, it is clear that, both in fact and in law, by the law of Scotland as well as England, she was not legitimate; yet to the extent of that argument she must go, in order to bring herself within the Scotch law, for such was distinctly stated to be the Scotch law in the case of Birtwhistle v. Vardill: (a) a doctrine most fully borne out by all the principles deducible from preceding cases. From all the authorities it is clear that the status of the person, especially the status of legitimacy, must be judged of by the law of the country where that status originated. The subsequent domicile of the parents cannot affect it. That domicile will not confer on the child the capacity to acquire legitimacy. And when Boullenois and Merlin are quoted to show that a child, bastard in England, may become legitimate in France, the expressions of the latter must be attended to, and they clearly prove that in his opinion such a change could only take place after the

 * 870 naturalization of both parents and * child. That word does not mean, as it has been contended, domicile, it means naturalization in the ordinary sense of that term; an act of the supreme authority of a country, adopting as native-born citizens persons who had hitherto been foreigners in it. Such an important change may be worked in that country by its supreme authority, but it cannot be the result of the mere act of the parties themselves. In this case all that has been done is the act of the parties, and it has no such force as to change the status which the law of the country where the appellant was born fixed upon her at the moment of her birth.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. — The domicile of the father is that of both the spouses. The incidents of the marriage are not governed by the place of the marriage nor of the birth, but by the domicile of the spouses. If there is a conflict of law here, as the matter to be affected is Scotch estate, the Scotch law must govern. The declarator asked is, that the appellant is, as persona designata under an entail, entitled to be declared the heir of Sir Hugh Munro, according to the law of Scotland: it is, therefore, solely a question to be decided by that law. Domicile must decide this case. Residence is one of the indications of intention as to domicile, but it is not conclusive. Intention is superior to mere length of residence. Here the intention was clear. Never for one moment did Sir Hugh Munro show an intention to abandon his domicile of origin; on the contrary, he always manifested his sense of Scotland being his home, though London was his temporary residence. While in London, he might, in the words of the Code, be described as travelling. His fortune, his rank, his habits, all connected him with Scotland; and family * differences first, and afterwards the attachment he had * 871 formed in this country, only persuaded him to delay a return to his native country: but with his agents there he kept up a continual communication, and his Scotch domicile was never lost. His domicile made his marriage a Scotch marriage, and conferred on his child all the benefits of such a contract.

August 10, 1840.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, in these cases the first point to be considered is the rule of the law of Scotland, as to the effect of a subsequent marriage of a domiciled Scotsman upon the issue of the parties born before the marriage, when the birth of such issue and the ceremony of marriage took place out of Scotland. Not that all those circumstances occur in the case of Lady Dalhousie v. M' Douall; but as they do in that of Munro v. Munro, it will be convenient to consider the whole of the proposition, and then apply the result to the particular circumstances of each case.

To whatever principle the law of legitimation by subsequent marriage be attributed, there can be no doubt of the generality of the rule where the parents were capable of contracting marriage at the birth or conception of the child. Wherever, therefore, a marriage follows the birth of children procreated of the parties to the marriage, all the requisites concur which are required by the terms in which the rule is laid down, assuming always that the circumstances are such as to bring the case within the operation of the law of Scotland; and as the laws of every country generally affect all those who have their domicile in such country, it would appear that, in order to bring any particular case within this rule of the law of Scotland, it could only be necessary to show that the domicile of the parties was Scotch.

* 872 * The consideration is of much importance in a case in which it is said that no precedent can be found in which the particular facts of this case occurred; because if the case falls within the terms of the general rule, such rule must govern it, unless it can be shown that there is principle or authority for making it an exception to the general rule, and withdrawing it from its operation.

The two circumstances relied upon for that purpose are, first, that the child was born out of Scotland; and secondly, that the marriage took place out of Scotland. If it should appear that neither of these circumstances would, by itself, take the case out of the general rule, the union of the two cannot have that effect. It can hardly be contended that the country in which the marriage takes place is material: it has never been considered material by the writers upon civil law, nor so treated in the decisions of the Courts. In De Conty's Case, (a) the marriage, although it took place in England, conferred legitimacy on a child whose domicile of origin was in France. The law of the country where the marriage is celebrated ascertained its validity; the law of the country of the domicile regulated its civil consequences. But if the place of the marriage be not material, still less can the place of the birth be so considered. The law of Scotland assumes that what in that country is considered as equivalent to a marriage, took place before the birth or conception of the child. If that be assumed, how can it be material in what country the child was born? This assumption is adopted for the purpose of legitimatizing the issue: why is it to be abandoned when it is of bastardy, and seems to have its origin in the circumstance of some very learned persons having used expressions applicable to English law upon a question of purely Scotch law. If English parents have a child born in another country, could the legitimacy of such child in England be affected by any law of such country? The effect of a Scotch marriage must be judged of with reference to Scotch law, and that law not only does not admit the doctrine of the indelibility of bastardy, but, on the contrary, holds that no bastardy is indelible, unless the parents were at the time of the birth incapable of marrying. If, therefore, the law of England be imported into the consideration, the effect of the Scotch marriage is judged of, not by the law of Scotland, but by the law of England.

* 873 peculiarly necessary * for that purpose? If a domiciled Scotchman be in the habit, for business or pleasure, of passing part of his time beyond the border, and some of his children are born within and some without the limits of Scotland, can it be the law that a subsequent marriage should legitimize some only of his children, and leave the rest illegitimate? It has been assumed in argument, that any of such children, born in a country which allowed legitimation per subsequens matrimonium would be legitimate in Scotland, but not if born in England, or in any other country which did not recognize such legitimation. This argument is founded upon the supposed indelibility

In this view of the law of Scotland, all the learned Judges of the Court of Session, with the single exception of the Lord President, concurred; and he founded his dissent upon the rule of the law of England as to the indelibility of bastardy, and upon expressions of English lawyers. But he adds, "In the case of Rose v. Ross, I stated in my opinion that I would not take * the law from such an extreme case as that of a woman * 874 taken suddenly, and perhaps prematurely, in labour, whilst travelling in England with or without her paramour, and brought to bed of a bastard there and then; returning with it on her recovery to Scotland. That is an extreme case; and what might be the law as to it, we must endeavour to settle when the case occurs." Beyond all doubt, a child so born would be affected with indelible bastardy in England; and if that is to regulate his status in Scotland, the peculiar circumstances referred to would not make an exception in his favour.

For these reasons, and upon these authorities, if the question were to be decided upon the general principles of the civil law, or upon the law as established in Scotland, there would not, I think, be any difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the child of a Scotchman, though born in England, would become legitimate for all civil purposes in Scotland, by a subsequent marriage of the parents in England, if the domicile of the father was, and continued throughout to be, Scotch. It remains to be inquired whether there are authorities against such a conclusion.

In Shedden v. Patrick, (a) the question did not arise, because the father was there held to be domiciled in America. In that case, therefore, there was wanting that only circumstance upon which rests the title of the child to claim the benefit of the laws of Scotland.

In Strathmore v. Bowes, (a) if it was not assumed that the domicile of the father was English, it certainly does not appear to have been proved to be Scotch; Lord ELDON saying the
 * 875 domicile was principally * in England; but the decision seems to have turned upon this, that the claim was to a British peerage. Whatever expressions may have fallen from Lord REDESDALE, for none can be quoted as coming from Lord ELDON, the decision of that case cannot be quoted as an authority in a case respecting Scotch property, in which the domicile of the father was Scotch.

In Rose v. Ross, (b) the domicile of the father was English. Lord LYNTHURST stated, as the ground of his opinion, that although the marriage was in Scotland, it was a marriage of persons having an English domicile, and coming into Scotland for the purpose of the marriage only. If this case proves anything bearing upon the present, it is that it is not the place of the marriage, but the domicile of the parties married, which regulates the civil consequences of the marriage.

For the same purpose, and for that only, the case of Warrender v. Warrender (c) has application to the present, because in that case it was assumed, and I think correctly, that for civil purposes in Scotland, a marriage in England of a domiciled Scotchman was to be considered as a Scotch marriage.

These decisions, therefore, do not establish any principle or lay down any rule inconsistent with the proposition that the child of a Scotchman, though born in England, becomes legitimate for all civil purposes in Scotland, by the subsequent marriage of the parents in England, if the domicile of the father was, and continued throughout to be, Scotch. If this be the rule of law in Scotland, it embraces the case of Munro v. Munro, and
 * 876 therefore includes that of *Lady * Dalhousie v. M'Douall*, and renders it unnecessary to consider some of the minor points discussed; such as whether the mother had or had not lost her Scotch domicile, and whether the fact of the conception having been in Scotland might not of itself have led to a decision in favour of the legitimacy. In both cases the question of fact remains to be considered, namely, what was the domicile of the father. In both cases the domicile of the father was originally Scotch; and the question is whether, in either instance, he had at the time of the marriage lost this domicile of origin.

Questions of domicile are frequently attended with great difficulty; and as the circumstances which give rise to such questions are necessarily very various, it is of the utmost importance not to depart from any principles which have been established relative to such questions, particularly if such principles be adopted, not only by the laws of England, but generally by the laws of other countries. It is, I conceive, one of those principles that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile, and acquiring another as his sole domicile. Such, after the fullest consideration of the authorities, was the principle laid down by Lord ALVANLEY, in Somerville v. Somerville, (a) and from which I see no reason for dissenting. So firmly indeed did the civil law consider the domicile of origin to adhere, that it holds that if it be actually abandoned, and a domicile acquired, but that again abandoned, and no new one acquired in its place, the domicile of origin revives.¹ * To effect this abandonment of * 877 the domicile of origin, and substitute another in its place, it required le concours de la volonté et du fait; animo et facto; that is, the choice of a place; actual residence in the place then chosen; and that it should be the principal and permanent residence; the spot where he had placed "larem rerumque ac fortunarum suarum summam;" in fact there must be both residence and intention. Residence alone has no effect per se, though it may be most important as a ground from which to infer intention.² Mr. Burge, in his excellent work, (b) cites many authorities from the civilians to establish this proposition. It is not, he says, by purchasing and occupying a house or furnishing it, or vesting a part of his capital there, nor by residence alone, that domicile is acquired, but it must be residence with the intention that it should be permanent.¹ In allegations depending upon intention, difficulties may arise in coming to a conclusion upon the facts of any particular case, but those difficulties will be much diminished by keeping steadily in view the principle which ought to guide the decision as to the application of the facts.

If, then, it be the rule of law of Scotland that the domicile of origin must prevail, unless it be proved that the party has acquired another by residence, coupled with an intention of making that his sole residence and abandoning his domicile of origin, — I cannot think that there will be much difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion upon examining the evidence in these cases with reference to this rule. In the case of Lady Dalhousie v. M' Douall, there is really no difficulty at all. There is nothing in that case which can raise a question as to the father

 * 878 * having abandoned his Scotch domicile. In the case of Munro v. Munro the difficulty is apparently greater, because there was a residence in England of many years; but the only period to be considered is from the father quitting Scotland in 1794, to the time of the marriage, 1801. There was a sufficient reason, independently of any intention of changing his domicile, for his leaving Scotland in 1794. His family house was not in a fit state for residence, and he had failed in effecting a proposed arrangement with his mother by which he wished to obtain for his own use the house where she lived. There is no ground for supposing that he at that time intended to abandon Scotland; the reverse is proved by the first letter he wrote after his arrival in London (3d of September, 1794), in which he gives directions about keeping some land in grass, the only farming he takes pleasure in, and about clothes-presses for his dressing-room at Fowlis. In November, 1794, he occupied the office of deputy-lieutenant of Ross-shire. In 1795, on the 9th of February, he gave directions for the preparations of a will in the Scotch form; and in a letter of the 14th of June, he states his intention of being in Ross-shire at the end of the month, which by subsequent letters it appears was prevented by an attack of illness. He, in a letter of the 1st of September, 1795, expresses his regret at having been prevented going to Scotland; and in a letter of the 14th of September, he says he shall be there early next summer; and in a letter of the 18th, he says that he shall, after Whitsuntide next, take the management of his estate into his own hands. Similar expressions occur in many letters of 1795 and 1796. In a letter of the 7th of October, 1796, he says, "I shall be in Ross-shire next year, and should unforeseen * events oblige * 879 me to defer my journey," &c.; and in a letter of the 27th of October, he directs the payment in kind of hens and eggs to be continued, saying, "when at home I shall have occasion for them." Many letters in 1797 speak of his intended journey to Scotland; and in one of the 25th of November, 1797, he says, "my journey to Ross-shire, so long and often retarded by circumstances which I could not foresee, is now, by the advice of my friends here, given up till next summer."

It appears that before this time, that is, in 1794 or 1795, the connection between the appellant's father and mother had been formed, and she was born in September, 1796, which may well account for the continued postponements of his intended journey to Scotland; but he does not appear ever to have abandoned the intention; for in a letter of the 28th of March, 1798, to a person in Scotland, he says that he expects very soon to be able to write him the time at which he proposed himself the pleasure of seeing him. In 1799, 1800, and 1801, he gives directions for the fitting up of his family residence in Scotland, and for that purpose sends large quantities of furniture from London; and in September, 1801, he marries the appellant's mother, and by letter of the same year speaks of his intention of coming to Scotland. In a letter of the 15th of April, 1802, he says: "I have resolved to be at Fowlis as soon as the house, which is painting and papering, can be inhabited; but as these things do not depend upon my wishes, I cannot fix positively any time. I hope to be in Edinburgh in July or August." He accordingly went to Scotland that year with his family, and resided in his family house at Fowlis, and there continued till 1808, the appellant's mother having died * there in 1803. Lord COREHOUSE, who entered much * 880 into this part of the case, in commenting on this correspondence, asked this question: "Do these expressions, when read in connection with the context, import that he was to return to Scotland, with a view to settle permanently there, and to live at the castle of Fowlis during the rest of his life? The very reverse is manifest." And then he observes upon expressions used, indicating that the promised visit to Scotland would be short. Those observations would be highly important if the question was, whether by his subsequent residence in Scotland he had acquired a new domicile there ; but they do not appear to me to touch the question whether he had abandoned the domicile of origin in that country, which can only be effected by evidence of an intention to do so, accompanying the act of a residence elsewhere. If he even formed such an intention, to what period is the adoption of that resolution to be referred ? In order to be of any effect upon the present question, it would be at some time prior to September, 1801, the date of the marriage.

That he took a lease of the house in Gloucester Place, and formed an establishment there, has been much relied upon, and, in the absence of better evidence of intention as to his future domicile, might be important as affording evidence of such intention, but cannot be of any avail when from the correspondence the best means are afforded of ascertaining what his real intentions were. The having a house and an establishment in London is perfectly consistent with a domicile in Scotland. This fact existed in Somerville v. Somerville, and in Warrender v. Warrender.

Taking, therefore, the rule of law as to the domicile of origin * 881 to be what I have before stated, and applying the * evidence to that rule, I do not find it proved that the appellant's father acquired a new domicile in England with the intention of making that his sole residence, and abandoning his domicile of origin in Scotland.

If that be a correct conclusion from the evidence, it follows that the appellant in Munro v. Munro, being the child of a domiciled Scotchman, had, at the moment of her birth, a capacity of being legitimated by the subsequent marriage of her parents for all civil purposes in Scotland, and that she accordingly, by the subsequent marriage in 1801, became legitimate, and as such capable of succeeding to the property in question.

The consequences of the opinions I have expressed are these : — I propose to your Lordships to affirm the interlocutor appealed from in Lady Dalhousie v. M'Douall, with costs ; and to reverse the interlocutor appealed from in Munro v. Munro, and to remit the cause back to the Court of Session, with a declaration that the pursuer (the appellant) is the lawful daughter of Sir Hugh Munro.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Lords, I had not the good fortune to be present when this case was argued ; and therefore, were it an ordinary case, I should not have expressed any opinion whatever. Nevertheless, from the part I have so frequently taken in cases of this kind, a reference to which has been made in disposing of the present case, both in the Court below and by my noble and learned friend in delivering judgment here, I think it right that I should not suffer the decision of the House to be come to without saying a few words.

There are two questions for the consideration of *your * 882 Lordships, as there were for the consideration of the Court below. The first is, whether, supposing the domicile of the parties at the time of the marriage to have been in Scotland, that marriage had the effect of legitimatizing issue born in England before the marriage; with reference to the question raised before the Scotch Court as to the title of the party to be considered an heir of tailzie to a Scotch real estate, quasi an estate tail, as one of the children of the heir of entail then in possession of that estate. The next question is, whether the domicile was English or Scotch.

My Lords, on the first of those two questions it is, no doubt, fit to observe that this is at present, for the first time, undergoing decision. It has frequently been mooted in argument by text writers, in discussions at the bar, and occasionally by learned Judges arguing on the Bench, but up to this time no decision has ever been made either in Scotland or here upon the point; namely, whether legitimization is affected by the subsequent marriage of the parents of a child born out of wedlock, that child being born in a country, and that marriage being celebrated in a country, where no such law holds, but the parties, though being in that country, yet, of course, at the time of the marriage being domiciled in Scotland, where the question arises touching the succession to real estate situated in Scotland. That question is now about to be decided for the first time one way, having been disposed of in Scotland upon the fact only the other way; because, as I shall presently observe, and it is with great satisfaction I state it, the great majority of the learned Judges in the Court below, who dealt with the question of law, came to the same conclusion as that to which I trust your Lordships, on the recommendation * of my noble and learned friend, are now * 883 about to come; but they did not feel themselves called upon to decide the case on that point. It is needless to add that this decision does not run counter to the previous authorities, but, as far as any previous decision approaches the present case, all the weight of authority is in favour of the judgment.

I have now to remind your Lordships of the weight of judicial authority in the Court below upon this question; in order that it may be by no means supposed that, because your Lordships are reversing this judgment, you are laying down principles of law contrary to the opinion of the learned Judges from whose decision the appeal comes.

The five learned Judges who formed the majority whose decision you are about to reverse, but to reverse on the ground of fact, — those five learned Judges, in the first part of their statement, seem rather to save the question. They seem not to dispose of the question, but give afterwards a very plain opinion in the affirmative, — I mean the Lord Justice Clerk, and the other four who agreed with him. They state the difficulties which they think exist, in the first place, on the supposition of Sir Hugh being a domiciled Scotchman: “Even upon this supposition, however, we think the pursuer must have had difficulties to encounter which have not yet been resolved by any clear authority in the law of either country. Some of the dicta in the ultimate decision of the cases of Shedden, of Strathmore, and of Ross, seem to point to a conclusion against her; while others of the very highest authority, in the more recent case of Sir George Warrender, have rather a contrary bearing. But holding, as we do, that the domicile of the husband was also English, we humbly conceive * 884 that there is no authority * on which the claim of the pursuer can be supported.” Had it stopped there, I should have said, as I did some time ago, that their Lordships being of opinion that the fact of the Scotch domicile was not established, they had no occasion to dispose of the question of law at all, as the question of law did not arise unless the fact of the Scotch domicile was proved; but what follows seems clearly to intimate that those learned Judges were of the same opinion upon the point of law with the majority, though they differed from them in point of fact; for they say, “The law, therefore, under which they themselves intended to live as married persons, may very well be allowed to settle the extent of their rights and duties as with each other, but cannot affect the condition of children previously born, which we think must be determined by the law of the country where the parents were domiciled at the birth and the marriage. If the domicile was not the same for both parents at these two periods, we should hold that that of the father at the time of the marriage should give the rule. But as they were the same in this case, the question does not arise;” thus agreeing clearly upon the point of law with the majority of the learned Judges, though they differed in point of fact. They all agreed, with the exception of the learned Lord President. Lord COREHOUSE, who differed upon the question of fact, delivered a very clear judgment upon the point of law; but, with the exception of the learned Lord President, all the Judges of the Court below held that the subsequent marriage of the parents would legitimate the issue before marriage, provided the parties were domiciled at the time of the marriage in a country the law of which recognizes legitimation per subsequens matrimonium.

My Lords, the learned Lord President has given a * very able, and in my opinion a very striking judgment, * 885 particularly striking from that manly straightforwardness which characterizes all the judgments of that right honourable and learned Judge. He has applied himself to the question, and has entered into an argument which had a very considerable effect on my mind when I first came to read it: and if I had not looked very carefully into the authorities to which he refers, I should have found great difficulty in differing from his Lordship as to the conclusion at which he arrives; but when I look at those cases which have been shortly referred to by my noble and learned friend, Shedden v. Patrick, the Strathmore Case, and Rose v. Ross, I really cannot see how they are to be taken as laying down the rule upon which the Lord President founded his judgment; namely, a status indelible through life being affixed upon the party by the law of the country where that party was born, that character being one of indelible illegitimacy if he was born in England, the law of England being against legitimation by subsequent marriage. My noble and learned friend, who unfortunately is not now present, who bore a principal part in the last of those cases, Rose v. Ross, (a) expressly saves the question with respect to the domicile, and says that he gives no opinion upon that part of the case; and the result of what he says plainly is to show that he did not mean to say how it would have been if the domicile had been Scotch, the domicile in that case plainly being English, and the question therefore no more arose there than it would have arisen here had the fact of a Scotch domicile failed the pursuer; but the majority of the learned Judges were agreed in the early part of their judgment that it did not arise at all. I am * upon the whole of opinion that we must adopt * 886 the authority of these cases, or the dicta of these cases. It is chiefly perhaps what is said by Lord REDESDALE, which may the law of that country the illegitimacy was indelible, and therefore a subsequent marriage could not have the effect of rendering the child legitimate. A distinction might possibly be made between a marriage in Scotland and one in America; but I do not enter into that distinction, for this reason, that if a marriage be celebrated according to the law and usage of the country in which it takes place, and is according to that a complete marriage, it is complete everywhere; and therefore I do not see very distinctly why marriage in Scotland should have a greater effect than would be attributable to marriage in America, with respect to a child who had been previously born. It appears to me, therefore, unnecessary to go into that point: it is sufficient that, the child being born in a country where the illegitimacy is indelible, that fact in any country whatever would have the effect of rendering that child illegitimate. I collect that opinion to have been expressed by some of the learned Judges in Shedden v. Patrick. I collect this also from the judgment of Lord REDESDALE, in the case of the Strathmore peerage, where the noble and learned Lord commented on the case of Shedden v.

Patrick was decided in this House, that noble and learned Lord was a member of it. In the Strathmore Case these are his observations: 'I do not enter into the question whether, if this marriage had been celebrated in Scotland, it might have had the effect of legitimating the child, because I think it unnecessary; but I must say that I cannot conceive how it would have had that effect. I apprehend that this child was born illegitimate, according to the law of the country in which he was born, according to the condition of his mother of whom he was born, and according to the state of his father, who was at the time a person unquestionably domiciled in England.' Taking the whole of the judgment of the noble and learned Lord together, I should conclude that he was of opinion that if the child was illegitimate at the time of his birth, and according to the law of the country where he was born, that character was stamped upon him indelibly, and that no subsequent marriage could render him legitimate. But it is not necessary to decide that question here. These parties were domiciled in England, the child was born in England; it is true that the marriage did not take place in England, but the parties went to Scotland expressly for the purpose of being married, and having been married, they returned to England, the place of their former domicile." The present case, if decided on the principles thus laid down by the Lord Chancellor, and adopted by this House, must be decided in favour of the plaintiff in error. Assuming that the child must be born ex justis nuptiis, the question arises, what are justæ nuptæ? and that is a question which in the present case must be decided by the law of Scotland. These may in that country be perfectly * good for * 902 all legal purposes, though not celebrated in the face of the church. So far, therefore, it is clear that a marriage between these parties by mutual consent may be good, though not performed with all the ceremonies incident to a regular marriage solemnized by ecclesiastical authorities: and a child born of such a marriage may be an heir. Then comes the question, who is an heir? He is a person pointed out by the law as the eldest legitimate son of his father. And it is not true to say that the heir by the law of Scotland is so in consequence only of a fiction, and that no such fiction exists in the English law. The fiction does exist; for if a marriage takes place here, and a child is born one hour afterwards, the English law treats that child as if begotten in lawful wedlock, and it is held to be legitimate for all purposes whatever. This can only be, as is the case with the Scotch law, by permitting the doctrine of relation to set up a prior contract, evidenced by the subsequent marriage.

What will be some of the consequences of holding that John Birtwhistle, the plaintiff in error, is not legitimate as heir to his father in England? Suppose there had been a mortgage in fee-simple to his father, the Judges here say that he, though legitimate, is not heir; he would not, therefore, be the real encumbrancer: but he would be entitled, as next of kin, to the benefit of the mortgage. Again, suppose he himself purchased lands in England, and died intestate and without lawful issue, those lands would not go to his father, but to the Crown. Again, a person legitimate in Scotland, like this plaintiff in error, might succeed to a Scotch peerage, and by virtue of that peerage might come to sit in Parliament and make laws for England, but yet would not be entitled to inherit English lands. Such injurious and contradictory * results cannot be tolerated by any system * 903 of law. But, great as are these inconveniences, they are not all that are chargeable on the law, if it is as contended for on the other side. Suppose a person entitled to a barony by tenure to have two sons, both born in Scotland, where the father was constantly domiciled, and one born before and the other after the marriage; which would succeed to the barony? Or again:

riage (a) gives the history of that law. It is not of very ancient date in Scotland, and it is wholly opposed to the law of this country. But when the question is merely as to the personal status of an individual, the tribunals of this country have consented, under certain circumstances, to recognize the status thus conferred. Countess of Cunha's Case. (b) And this recognition of the status conferred by marriage, if such marriage is performed according to the law of the foreign country where it took place, is admitted by our law. (c) But the recognition of the legitimacy acquired by a subsequent marriage has never been made in this country for any purposes whatever. For even in the case of bastard eigné and mulier puisne, which may be supposed to afford an instance of such a recognition, it is clear that the permission given by the law to the issue of bastard eigné to remain in possession after the death of their father, was not in recognition of any right derivable to him from that character, but only for the purpose of quieting disputes. No case can be cited in which the right to inherit English lands has been admitted as the consequence of legitimation by subsequent matrimony. As an analogous instance, the case of Conty (d) has been referred to, where a Flemish lady and a native of France intermarried in England after the birth of a son, and that son was held by the Courts * 907 in France entitled to succeed as heir to his father. * The case is cited to show that such a principle of succession exists. But it shows still more strongly that that principle in Conty's Case was applied because it was the law of France, because the law of France holds that its provisions follow the persons of French subjects everywhere; (e) and finally (for that is the principle for which the defendant in error will contend), because the descent of real property is strictly regulated by the law of the country where that property is situated. The case of Conty, therefore, is decisive in favour of the judgment of the Court below. The same inference may be fairly deduced from all those cases in which, as in Conty's Case, a marriage celebrated in a foreign country has had effects in the country where the property of the married persons lay, different from those which the law of the country of its celebration would have given it. If, then, the law of the country where the land lies is, as a general rule, to govern the descent of that land, can there be any reason for creating an exception to the rule? Is there not in the law of that country everything to forbid such a course? For all purposes whatever, the law of this country requires that a marriage celebrated here shall be celebrated in facie ecclesiæ; (a) and all the authorities show that in ancient times the clergy were the persons who tried and decided the fact of general legitimacy by marriage.

The rule that antenati cannot by the laws of England succeed to the inheritance of land here, has long been known and recognized by foreign law writers. Ducange states it (b) as a well-known law, and quotes * the English authorities for * 908 it: and Staundeford (c) mentions as well known the distinction between the succession to lands in Normandy and in England. There has been nothing to change the law from what it was in those ancient times. On the contrary, the recent cases have recognized and enforced the ancient law. In Shedden v. Patrick. (d) The law of domicile may govern the personal status of the party, but it cannot govern the rights which in many cases are consequent on that status: another principle of law intervenes. It may be true that this may be productive of inconvenience, but considerations of inconvenience alone will not suffice to set aside positive law. Now is there any such positive law in England, or is the English law silent on the subject? It is submitted that the law is not silent; on the contrary, its provisions and principles are positive, and have long been known and recognized. The rule of excluding antenati from the inheritance was a rule of the common law; so that when it was proposed at the Parliament of Merton, by all the great clergy present, to allow that “nati ante matrimonium essent legitimi, sicut illi qui nati sunt post matrimonium, quantum ad successionem hereditariam, quia ecclesia tales habet pro legitimis,” the barons with one voice answered, that they would not change the laws, “quæ hucusque usitatæ sunt et approbatæ.” In fact, therefore, this was but the legislative declaration of an ancient law. And that law was in constant and well-known oper-

* 909 ation. * When Edward III., being possessed of a large part of France, to quiet the doubts of his English subjects settled in his French dominions, caused laws (a) to be enacted in their favour, declaring that their issue born in those dominions should inherit lands in England, “comme,” or as well as those born in England, he did not confer, nor was it ever thought he conferred on his subjects born abroad privileges distinct from those enjoyed by his English-born subjects. The Acts merely meant to give English citizenship to those who it was doubted might otherwise become aliens. Another statute passed long afterwards, (b) but with a similar purpose, enabling natural-born subjects to derive title to land in England through alien ancestors, is subject from the first to the same construction. The title could not be derived through an alien in any other way than it could have been derived through a natural-born subject. The statute did not put aliens in a better position than natural-born subjects, but exactly elevated the former to a level with the latter. If, therefore, the alien ancestor had been a bastard, descent could no more be traced through him than through a bastard that was native born. Nor do any of the subsequent statutes, 7 Anne, c. 5, 4 Geo. 2, c. 21, and 13 Geo. 3, c. 21, at all infringe this principle. They only put certain foreign-born persons on the same footing as English-born subjects. It is impossible to conceive that the legislature could have intended to do more. It could not have been intended to give foreign-born subjects privileges relating to land in England, which were not conceded to the natives of the country. Directly, therefore, the law of England is opposed to the claim of an ante-

 * 910 natus * to inherit land here; and indirectly there is no provision in his favour, but every one provision of the statutes passed to benefit foreign-born persons, being properly construed, must be taken to carry out the provisions of the general law against such exceptional rights. In several parts of the dominions of the Crown of England, this law of legitimation by subsequent matrimony exists, yet there is not one instance to be found in the law-books of England showing that a person so legitimated had been admitted to the inheritance of English land. Is not this of itself decisive against the claim? The cases must have arisen, yet the claim never has been put forward; the sense of the whole profession must ever have held it unsustainable. This unbroken practice of the law is now confirmed by the deliberate opinion of the Judges of England. Is there any reasonable ground for saying that that opinion is not well founded? It is confidently submitted that there is none.

(a) 25 Ed. 3, c. 2; 45 Edw. 3, c. 10.

From what has already been advanced, it is clear that as the law of Scotland is now settled, it is on this point directly at variance with the law of England; it is at variance with the clearest and best settled principles of our law. According to the general principle of the independence of each other, enjoyed by the laws of each sovereign state, it is impossible to consent that the laws of England should on this vital question give way to the laws of another country. The subject of the independence of the laws of foreign states enjoyed by every sovereign state, which indeed on that account alone is called a sovereign state, is ably treated by Mr. Justice STORY. (a) To his remarks the House may with propriety be referred. * Personal * 911 status alone cannot decide this case. Story, (b) quoting Voet, (c) affirms "that it is certainly the doctrine of the common law that a man may have a capacity to take real estate in one country, when he is totally disabled to take it in another." And Boullenois (d) states his opinion that in all cases the real laws of each country are to have effect within the territory of that country. Nay, this principle is so plainly admissible, that even in the same country there may be two fora for the laws regulating real property. Such is the case in England with regard to gavelkind and borough-English, and the ordinary mode of holding land. No one would pretend to say, that because a man married and had children within that part of England where gavelkind did not prevail, his lands held under that tenure must be disposed of according to the law of the place where he resided, and not where the lands lay. The distinction between real and personal property is of constant occurrence. The same words in a dower will have one effect with respect to freehold, and another with respect to leasehold property; see the cases cited in the argument of Doe d. Cadogan v. Ewart; (e) and other authorities are to the same effect. (a) Story, (b) on a review of all the authorities, declares, "that the law of the situs shall exclusively govern in regard to all rights, interests, and titles in and to immovable property;" and he adds, "of course it cuts down all attempts to introduce all foreign laws, whether they respect persons or things, or give or withhold the capacity to acquire or to dispose of immovable property." On all

* 912 * these grounds, it is submitted that the law of England differs from the law of Scotland; and, though recognizing the personal status of legitimacy in a Scotch person legitimated by a marriage of his parents after his birth, will not allow that status to be followed by all the incidents of ordinary legitimacy: that it requires, for the purpose of inheritance of land, a legitimacy existent at the time of the birth, and is not satisfied with one subsequently created: that this law relating to real property cannot give way to any foreign law, because, by a universal principle of law, the law of the situs of real property is necessarily dominant over every other; and that, as the plaintiff in error cannot fulfil the conditions of this law by proving himself within the terms of it to be the "lawful heir," he is not entitled to succeed to English estates, and the judgment of this House must be given for the defendant in error.

The Attorney-General, in reply. — The English law does not refuse to admit the status of the plaintiff in error. Can it, then, be guilty of the gross inconsistency of admitting for some purposes and refusing it for others? It cannot do so. It cannot inquire how and to what extent a man is legitimate. If it admits him to be legitimate at all, it admits him so altogether. It takes his character from the foreign law; it cannot, it does not, inquire how that character was conferred. Such an inquiry would involve proceedings for which this country possesses no adequate machinery. The law of a foreign country is received here in proof as a matter of fact. Our law does not inquire into its principles; but the case arising where that law is to be applied, the English law applies it in the same way that it would apply * 913 the stipulations of a private * contract. The only instances in which foreign law is not of force, is when it is opposed to the positive institutions of a country. Thus it is not of force for the purposes of legalizing polygamy or slavery. In the cases of Shedden v. Patrick, and Strathmore v. Bowes, and Rose v. Ross, the foreign law was allowed to prevail. Here that law declares that the plaintiff in error is the legitimate heir of his father, and as such entitled to succeed to his father's estates in Scotland, that country being the place of his father's domicile, of his father's marriage, and of the birth of the child. The English law can have no more right to say that he is not the lawful son to take by heirship, than it would have to say that a person declared the lawful heir of his father took by purchase and not by heirship. It is not pretended that it could do that. This subject received a complete exposition in the discussion it underwent among the members of this House in 1835. (a) The absurd consequences to which the decision of the Court below must lead were then fully exhibited. Those consequences will not be introduced under the sanction of this House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, your Lordships have had the advantage of having had this case — raising certainly a most important question — argued with the utmost learning and ability, and we have now to consider in what way the question is to be submitted to the learned Judges. The mode in which it was put to the Judges in 1830 seems to me to state the facts very accurately, and I think, therefore, I cannot do better than put it in the following form : —

A. went from England to Scotland, and resided * and * 914 was domiciled there, and so continued for many years till the time of his death. A. cohabited with M., an unmarried woman, during the whole period of his residence in Scotland, and had by her a son B., who was born in Scotland. Several years after the birth of B., who was the only son, A. & M. were married in Scotland, according to the laws of that country. By the laws of Scotland, if the marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child takes place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland before the marriage is equally legitimate with children born after the marriage, for the purpose of taking land and for every other purpose. A. died seised of real estate in England, and intestate; is B. entitled to such property as the heir of A. ? (b)

(a) Ante, Vol. II. p. 582 et seq.

(b) See as to the statement of the facts and of the law of Scotland, the note, ante, Vol. II. p. 572.

That, therefore, is the question I propose to your Lordships to submit to the learned Judges upon this occasion.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Lords, I certainly concur with my noble friend that the question of 1830 is much better than any other which can be put. It raises the point upon the facts stated in the special verdict. That verdict unfortunately did not find, particularly and in every respect, what the law of Scotland is upon the subject; consequently the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant pro tanto is damnified. It would have been better if it had been put as the learned counsel Mr. Murray (now Lord MURRAY) stated it, whose evidence was believed by the Judge and jury; namely, that the marriage is, by the Scotch law, supposed to have been antecedent to the birth, by * 915 fiction. But the legitimacy, * as contradistinguished from legitimation, is sufficiently put for the purpose of the argument; and, with the assistance of the authorities, it can leave very little doubt what the Scotch law is upon the minds of the learned Judges.

My Lords, I am desirous that the attention of the learned Judges should be directed to that which, moved by the anxiety I felt upon the subject, I stated as the opinion I entertained in 1835, and to the argument I then held. I do not know that it throws any great light upon the question, but it states the points, and refers to the authorities as well as to the principles.

My Lords, I entirely agree that this is a question of very great importance, and of very considerable difficulty: I quite agree with the Attorney-General that it is of peculiar importance as affecting the law of Scotland; the question being, whether the lex domicilii, the lex loci contractus et nativitatis, or the lex loci rei sitæ, should prevail, — from the time of Huber downwards, from the time, indeed, when the distinction between real property and personal arose, the law governing the one being generally the lex loci rei sitæ, that governing the other being the lex loci contractus et domicilii.

I feel great anxiety that this case should be well considered for another reason, — I mean out of regard for the credit of our English Courts. I concur very much in the statement of the Attorney-General, that if what has been laid down in this case be law, the bounds of that law are very narrow. If it is law anywhere, it prevails assuredly only as the law within the bounds of Westminster Hall. I know, wherever I go in Europe, it is boldly denied to be the law. I know the opinion of Dr. Story and other American *jurists also is against us; and I do not think I * 916 could easily overstate the degree in which all these jurists dissent from the judgment of the Court below in this case. A considerable argument against it is to be gathered from the total diversity of the grounds upon which the judgment has at different times been maintained. It was first rested on one ground in the Court of Queen's Bench; then upon another and very different ground at the bar here in 1830; again, upon a third ground, that stated by Lord Chief Baron ALEXANDER, in giving the opinion of the Judges to this House; and lastly, upon a different ground from all the three former, by the counsel to-day at your bar; and if the Judges are to give their opinions now upon some fifth ground, the discrepancy may support the judgment better in their minds than it will support the judgment or give weight to it in the eyes of any other persons; for assuredly a decision resting upon so many different grounds will be likely rather to sink in the estimation of those who come to a calm consideration of its merits. I cannot help feeling the greatest regret that these questions should be raised here so frequently as they have lately been. Dispose of this as you may, we shall have no end to such cases, unless we adopt the only satisfactory mode that can be devised for settling the controversies and doubts, namely, some legislative measure to relieve the law of this country from the opprobrium which rests upon it in the eyes of all mankind. That there should be a set of questions incalculably important, perhaps the most important to the interests and feelings of individuals which can ever arise in Courts of Justice, and that these questions should be left surrounded with doubt, and incapable of decision for want of some statutory enactment regarding the subject-matter, is * truly lamentable, and not a little discreditable * 917 to our jurisprudence. Can any thing be more discreditable to the law of a civilized country than that it should be extremely difficult to tell whether a man is married or not; nay, what is worse, whether a woman is married or a concubine; that it should be still more difficult to tell whether a person, the issue of a questionable marriage, is a bastard or legitimate; and that, owing to the conflict of laws, or the discrepancy of the law, it should be declared in one part of the country that a man is a bastard, and in another that he is legitimate; in one part that a divorce has taken place dissolving a prior marriage, and if that person afterwards crosses the Tweed, and intermarries with another woman, he is deemed not to be in the honourable state of wedlock, but in a state of felony; and having committed bigamy, he may be sentenced to transportation to Botany Bay, which actually has happened? and still more, that if the same party had intermarried again in Scotland, he would be held to be in the comfortable state of matrimony, and not of felony; but if he had English estates, the question would arise whether, though the children were legitimate in Scotland, their birthplace, the law of the country where the property is situated would yet pronounce them bastards; nay, that in one Court of England they would be treated as bastards, and in all other Courts acknowledged to be legitimate? There are peers sitting in this House affected by the question,—the issue of noble families,—their parents having been married in Scotland after previous divorces, they themselves being of the most spotless character, possessing the most ample estates and the highest honours. It is a very dreadful state of things,

* 918 affecting the feelings and the character, as well as the property of individuals, that there should * be this uncertain state of the law. It is still worse to think that all the learning and skill in Westminster Hall, if you were to consult it, and all the Scotch law in the Parliament House of Edinburgh, would not make you sure of getting two opinions to agree upon such questions as these. I hope this state of things will at length be put an end to.

I have agreed all along with what has from the first been said as to the conflict between the laws of England and Scotland. I have always thought the law of Scotland, respecting the marriage contract, exceedingly objectionable, compared to ours. If a divorce is allowed there between parties bonâ fide, it might be made good universally. If it is done in fraudem legis Anglicanæ, whereby it is also in fraud of the rights of others, you might enact that it should be void universally, and then a man would know whether he was married or not, and a woman whether she was a concubine or a matron, and the child whether he was a bastard or legitimate. If your Lordships, with the aid of the Judges, decide the present question, or any of these questions of status, it does not follow that the general question will be settled. The difficulty just now suggested will arise, and you will have another series of doubts and difficulties, which will not now be removed, because they cannot be anticipated. I would remind your Lordships more particularly of one: we all say that marriage depends upon the lex loci contractus; that is to say, a marriage good by the law of the country where celebrated, is also good all the world over. A divorce takes place: we do not go so far as to say (though, generally speaking, the rule of law is unumquodque dissolvitur eodem modo quo colligatur), yet we do not go so far as to say that an English marriage may be validly dissolved by a Scotch divorce, though English * parties may * 919 contract a Scotch marriage in Scotland, which shall be good all the world over. We do not say that the same law which is applicable to the constitution of the contract, applies also to its dissolution. But there is on this point a conflict, and a real conflict, of laws: the Scotch lawyers say that the Scotch divorce is good to dissolve an English marriage, and that a man so divorced may intermarry again. But this divorce, by our English decisions, is null if he comes to England. The Scotch Courts maintain the efficacy of the divorce, and consequently the validity of the second marriage; and they will maintain this to the end of time. All the Scotch lawyers and Judges, without any exception, say that the second marriage is good in Scotland. I do say that this conflict of law seems to make an absurdity, which no judicial decision can reconcile to itself. It is self-repugnant; and nothing but an Act of the legislature can reconcile it upon sound principles. A man comes here with a Scotch wife, and with issue born in Scotland, — that Scotch wife is held to be a concubine, for aught I know, in England. The decisions go, at all events, to this extent, that the English law does not acknowledge the validity of the Scotch divorce. He may come here, then, and after the Scotch divorce he may intermarry in England, and then there are two wives, each claiming this husband. This is the conclusion either way. It is the conclusion from adopting the well established and well-known principles of allowing the lex loci contractus — the law of the country where the marriage was contracted — to prevail universally; and yet not allowing the law of the country where the divorce is had to regulate the dissolution of the contract. But if the second marriage was good in Scotland, and, * because good there, good in England also, * 920 then is the man a husband, and prevented marrying a second wife in England. If, on the other hand, the Scotch marriage is good here, and the divorce bad, he has two wives here, both acknowledged by law.

Now, what is the real origin of all this embarrassment? A great deal arises from a country possessing one system of law, being connected with a country possessing a different system, like England and Scotland, and these countries being contiguous. But much the greater part of the inconvenience has arisen from another source, and it shows the danger of departing from sound, solid, and uniform principles. If you had held, originally, that a marriage celebrated in Scotland, not bonâ fide, by parties really resident there, but by parties who could not be duly married here, and who went to Scotland in fraudem legis Anglicanæ, to escape the provisions of the English Marriage Act, was a bad marriage in England; if, as you ought to have done, you had held by that opinion generally, and declared that it was a bad marriage, and that you would not allow persons who could afford to go to Scotland, for the purpose of evading the Marriage Act (and who were really the only people contemplated by that Act), to escape its provisions by this Scotch journey; if, instead of holding that to be a good proceeding, and giving it effect, you had said, as you have done in most other cases, "this is done in fraudem legis, and shall not prevail," — then nine parts in ten of the difficulties we now labour under would not have arisen. Lord MANSFIELD always spoke of these marriages as void in England; instead of following his opinion, when Crompton v. Bearcroft (a) came into the Consistorial * Courts, it was decided, or is supposed to have been decided, in favour of the Scotch marriage. I have often lamented that we have no account of that important case, except in a passage of Mr. Justice BULLER's Nisi Prius. In the Court of Delegates, a judgment was pronounced in favour of the marriage; but on what argument, or by what Judges, I know not. I only know that there have been doubts expressed concerning the decision.

Then came Ilderton v. Ilderton, which first brought the question before a Court of Common Law. If you look, my Lords, into that case, as reported in 2d H. Blackstone, you will find the case of Crompton v. Bearcroft cited. It was a writ of dower, to which ne unques accouple was pleaded; and there was a replication by the demandant of a marriage in Scotland, to which the tenant demurred. This demurrer was upon two grounds: the first denied the validity of a Scotch marriage in an English suit; and this ground was given up as an untenable point. The party never dreamed of arguing it, but confined the argument to another point, whether there ought not to have been a place for the venue, and whether the replication ought not to have concluded to the bishop's certificate, instead of concluding to the country. The question upon the marriage was then abandoned, and the judgment makes no mention of it. Ever since that case, the point has been held to be clear that a Scotch marriage, however plainly and grossly in fraudem legis Anglicanæ, was a valid marriage. You went wrong in deciding that, as many of us think ; but having once gone wrong, when other kindred questions arose, as upon the validity of Scotch divorces, you ought either to have retraced your steps, so as to get right again, or you should have continued acting * upon the same principles. There was * 922 no middle course ; either come back from your error in Ilderton v. Ilderton and Crompton v. Bearcroft, or go upon the same principle ; either hold that the going to Scotland in fraud of the English law does not avail in any way, or hold that the Scotch proceeding, however fraudulent, does avail ; and if it makes the contract valid, that it also validates the dissolution of the contract. Instead, however, of following up your error, you choose to hold the marriage good, but the dissolution of the marriage bad. See what interminable confusion you have thus got into. Now, in Lolley's Case, the Judges had an opportunity of retracting Ilderton v. Ilderton and Crompton v. Bearcroft ; or they might have said, " the cases have ruled that the marriage is good ; then so must the divorce be." But, instead of this, they maintained the validity of a Scotch marriage, though in fraud of the English law, and yet they held that a Scotch divorce in the same circumstances is utterly invalid ; and hence arise all the difficulties and disagreements by which we are now surrounded. I am sure this is a good reason why Judges, in deciding important questions, should adopt the course, when they have gone wrong, of at once, in an open and manly way, retracing their steps, rather than persist in their error ; but, if they do persist in their error, they ought to do it out and out, though to the inconvenience of parties, and not, by way of saving their own consistency, inflict on the people what is proverbially the most miserable of all thraldoms, — that of a vague and uncertain jurisprudence. Instead of leaving it uncertain, and subjecting the people to this annoyance, it may be made at least intelligible, by being made consistent ; and though the principle was originally wrong, it may * be made to tally with itself. At present it is incon- * 923 sistent with itself. The principles are in one direction upon one ground, and in another direction upon another.

I do hope that the result of this inquiry will be the settlement of the law; and I cannot speak too highly of the ability with which the argument has been conducted. The question is now ripe for decision. I hope that, when it is considered, we shall have the assistances of the learned Judges in giving our opinions. We shall give our opinions with all due deference to their authority, and all the disposition possible to avail ourselves of their useful aid, but without losing the regard we conscientiously owe to our own opinions; not forgetting, certainly, the impression which may be made upon us by the opinions of the learned Judges, but coming to a deliberate and an unfettered consideration of a question of such paramount importance. When the law, as it now stands, has been thus settled, then those ulterior steps may be taken, which, I apprehend, can alone be satisfactory to the people of both countries: I mean, the final settlement of the law by an Act of Parliament, declaratory in some respects, and enacting in other respects; thus laying down what principles of law shall be fitting to be established for the two countries.

LORD WYNFORD.—My Lords, since I have been at the bar, now nearly fifty years, I have never heard a case argued with more ability than this case has been argued to-day.

My Lords, the question which was put to the learned Judges upon the former occasion, was drawn up by Lord LYNDHURST;

* 924 and I do not think it can be now submitted in a better form. I wish my noble * and learned friend to accomplish his object of reconciling the law of Scotland and England in cases similar to this, but I fear there will be great difficulties in his way. I cannot help thinking that it would be better settled by different decisions, as the questions arose, than by an Act of Parliament. We shall, however, have an opportunity of considering the question when the Judges have delivered their mature opinions on the case that is now under our consideration.

The question, in the form proposed by the Lord Chancellor, was agreed to, and put to the Judges, who required time to answer it. On Monday, the 20th of July, their unanimous opinion was delivered in the following terms by

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TYNDAL.—My Lords, the facts of the case upon which your Lordships propose a question to her Majesty's Judges are these: "A. went from England to Scotland, and resided and was domiciled there, and so continued for many years, till the time of his death. A. cohabited with M., an unmarried woman, during the whole period of his residence in Scotland, and had by her a son, B., who was born in Scotland. Several years after the birth of B., who was the only son, A. and M. were married in Scotland, according to the laws of that country. By the laws of Scotland, if the marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child take place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland before the marriage is equally legitimate with children born after the marriage, for the purpose of taking land, and for every other purpose. A. died seised of real estate in England, and intestate." And your Lordships, upon the foregoing state of facts, found this question, viz.: "Is B. entitled to such property as the heir of A.?"

And * in answer to the question so proposed to us, I have * 925 the honour to state to your Lordships, that it is the opinion of all the Judges who heard the argument (a) that B. is not entitled to such property as the heir of A. We have, indeed, reason to lament that we have been deprived of the assistance of one of our learned brethren who heard the case argued at your Lordship's bar, the late Mr. Justice VAUGHAN; but as he had expressed a concurrent opinion upon the case at a meeting held immediately after the argument, I feel myself justified in adding the authority of his name to that of the other Judges.

My Lords, the grounds and foundation upon which our opinion rests are briefly these: That we hold it to be a rule or maxim of the law of England, with respect to the descent of land in England from father to son, that the son must be born after actual marriage between his father and mother; that this is a rule juris positivi, as are all the laws which regulate succession to real property, this particular rule having been framed for the direct purpose of excluding, in the descent of land in England, the application of the rule of the civil and canon law, by which the subsequent marriage between the father and mother was held to make the son born before marriage legitimate; and that this rule of descent being a rule of positive law annexed to the land itself, cannot be allowed to be broken in upon or disturbed by the law of the country where the claimant was born, and which may be allowed to govern his personal status as to legitimacy, upon the supposed ground of the comity of nations.

My Lords, to understand the nature and force of this rule

(a) See ante, p. 895.

* 926 of our law, "that the heir must be a person * born in actual matrimony in order to enable him to take land in England by descent," and to perceive, at the same time, the positive and inflexible quality of this rule, and how closely it is annexed to the land itself, it will be necessary to consider the earlier authorities in which that rule is laid down and discussed, both before and subsequently to the statute of Merton, and more particularly the legal construction and operation of that statute.

If we take the definition of heir which Lord COKE adopts from the ancient text writers, and which is borrowed originally from the Roman law (Coke upon Littleton, 7. b.), viz., that he is "ex justis nuptiis procreatus," the very description points at a marriage celebrated according to the rules, requisites, and ritual of the civil or Roman law. "Operæ pretium est scire quid sint justæ nuptiæ," says Huber (Lib. 23, lib. tit. 2, de Ritû Nuptinum). He adds, "In promptû est Justiniani Responsio sunt ea quæ secundum præcepta legûm contrahuntur."

But to refer to the "Mirror of Justices," perhaps the very earliest of our text books, it is there laid down in page 70 as an admitted principle, "that the common law only taketh him to be a son whom the marriage proveth to be so." Glanville, who wrote in the reign of Henry II. (probably about half a century before the passing of the statute of Merton), in book 7, chapter 13, states that "neither a bastard nor any person not born in lawful wedlock can be, in the legal sense of the term, an heir; but if any one claims an inheritance in the character of heir, and the other party object to him that he cannot be heir because he was not born in lawful wedlock, then indeed the plea shall cease in the King's Court, and the archbishop, or bishop of the

 * 927 place, shall be commanded * to inquire concerning such marriage, and to make known his decision either to the King or his justices." He then, in chapter 14, gives the form of the writ, which will be found not unimportant to the present inquiry, namely,— "The King to the archbishop: Health.— W. appearing before me in my Court, has demanded against R., his brother, certain land, and in which the said R. has no right, as W. says, because he is a bastard born before the marriage of their mother; and since it does not belong to my Court to inquire concerning bastardy, I send these unto you, commanding you that you do, in the Court Christian, that which belongs to you; and when the suit is brought to its proper end before you, inform me by your letter what has been done before you concerning it. Witness," &c.

Your Lordships will observe the form of this writ; how precisely it puts the objection against the heir's title upon the very rule of the English law, "that he was born before the marriage of his mother;" by which it is necessarily implied that the marriage of the parents had subsequently taken place. Now if the question had been put generally on the fact, whether any marriage had taken place, or upon the legality of such marriage as had taken place; to such a question of general bastardy, as it is called, the bishop would have found no difficulty in answering, for the answer to that question would have been purely and exclusively determinable by the spiritual law. But as the canon law, on the one hand, held that the subsequent marriage of the parents made the antenatus legitimate, and as the common law of England, on the other hand, held that such antenatus was not legitimate for the purpose of inheriting land in England, if the question had gone in the general form, the answer of the bishop would have certified such antenatus * to have been * 928 legitimate. The law, therefore, framed the question in the precise form contained in the writ, namely, a question of special bastardy, proving thereby how closely, and with how much jealousy, the law adhered to the rule of descent before pointed out. Now, the question so framed did obviously place the bishop in extreme difficulty in making answer thereto; a difficulty which was very much increased by the constitution of Pope Alexander III., which had been issued very recently before the time when Glanville wrote, viz., in the sixth year of King Henry II.; by which constitution (in part set out by Lord Coke, 2d Institute, 96) it was ordained "that children born before solemnization of matrimony, where matrimony followed, should be as legitimate to inherit unto their ancestors as those that are born after matrimony;" and it is upon the subject of this constitution that Glanville is commenting in his 15th chapter, when he says, "Upon this subject, it hath been made a question whether, if any one was begotten or born before the father married the mother, such son is the lawful heir if the father afterwards married his mother. Although, indeed, the canons and the Roman laws consider such son as the lawful heir, yet, according to the law and custom of this realm, he shall in no measure be supported as heir in his claim upon the inheritance, nor can he demand the inheritance by the law of the realm. But yet, if a question should arise whether such son was begotten or born before marriage or after, it should, as we have observed, be discussed before the ecclesiastical Judge, and of his decision he shall inform the King or his justices; and thus, according to the judgment of the Court Christian concerning the marriage, namely, whether

 * 929 the demandant was born or begotten before * marriage contracted or after, the King's Court shall supply that which is necessary in adjudging or refusing the inheritance respecting which the dispute is; so that by its decision the demandant shall either obtain such inheritance or lose his claim."

The bishops being placed in the difficulty of this conflictus legum by reason of the precise form of the King's writ, at length, at the parliament holden at Merton, in the 20th Henry III., the statute was framed, which will be found to have a strong and direct application to the present question. That statute has not upon the original roll the title prefixed thereto, upon which observations were made at your Lordships' bar, that it showed the intention of the law to have been no more than to declare the personal status of those who are described in such statute. In the edition of the statutes published under the commission from the Crown, there is no other than the general title "Provisiones de Merton;" and no more argument can justly be built upon the title prefixed in some editions of the statutes, than upon the marginal notes against its different sections. That statute or provision of Merton runs thus, viz.: "To the King's writ of bastardy, whether any one being born before matrimony may inherit in like manner as he that is born after matrimony, all the bishops answered that they would not nor could not make answer to that writ, because it was directly against the common order of the church, and all the bishops instanted the lords that they would consent that all such as were born afore matrimony should be legitimate, as well as they that be born within matrimony, as to the succession to inheritance, forasmuch as the church accepteth such as legitimate. And all the earls and barons, with
 * 930 one voice, answered that they would not * change the laws of the realm which hitherto had been used and approved."

It is manifest from Bracton, who lived and wrote in the time of Henry III., that shortly after the statute of Merton, this question of special bastardy ceased to be sent to the bishop, and became the subject of inquiry and determination in the King's Courts. In book 5th, chapter 19, after stating the circumstances attending the statute of Merton, and also a subsequent council holden in the same year before the King, the archbishop, the bishops, earls, and barons, whose names he gives, it is ordered that the words in which the writ shall go to the bishop shall be, "whether such a one was born before espousals or marriage, or after; and that the ordinary shall write back to our lord the King, in the same words, without any evasion or subtilty." And he then states, it was further ordered at that council, "that for the reasons before given, and of such common consent, it may be in the election of our lord the King whether he will demand that inquisition to be taken before the Ordinary, or in his own Court; because, when the exception is properly taken, the answer ought not to be obscure;" and accordingly, it will be found, by reference to the year-books, that from the time of Edward III., the distinction became settled that general bastardy shall be tried by the Ordinary, special bastardy shall be tried per pais. (See the various authorities collected in Viner's Abridgment, title Trial Bastardy.)

My Lords, the extent of the dominions of the Crown at the time of the passing of the statute of Merton, demands particular attention. Normandy, Aquitaine, and Anjou, were then under the allegiance of the King of England, and had been so at least from the commencement of the reign of Henry I. Many of * the nobles and other subjects of the King had * 931 large possessions both in England and in the countries beyond sea. Those born in Normandy, Aquitaine, or Anjou (as also, in subsequent periods of our history, those born in Guienne, Gascony, Calais, or Tournay), whilst under the actual dominion of the Crown, were natural-born subjects, and could inherit land in England. (Calvin's Case, 7th Coke, 20, b.) Many of the very persons who attended at the coronation of Henry III., the occasion on which the Parliament met at Merton and the statute was passed, bishops, and earls, and barons, are known from history, and would so appear from their very names and titles, to have been of foreign lineage, if not of foreign birth, and were, at all events, well acquainted with the rule of law which was then so strongly contested; yet — notwithstanding the rule of the civil and canon law prevailed in Normandy, Aquitaine, and Anjou, by which the subsequent marriage makes the antenatus legitimate for all purposes and to all intents; and notwithstanding the precise question then under discussion was, whether this rule should govern the descent of land locally situate in England, or whether the old law and custom of England should still continue as to such land, under which the antenatus was incapable to take land by descent — there is not the slightest allusion to any exception in the rule itself as to those born in the foreign dominions of the Crown, but the language of the rule is, in its terms, general and universal as to the succession to land in England. The question is, whether, after the declaration made by that statute, one of the King's subjects, born in Normandy, or Aquitaine, or Anjou, under the circumstances supposed by your Lordships, could have inherited land in England? It is not so much a parallel

* 932 case with the * present; it is the very case itself; and it seems impossible to contend that such would have been held to be the law. In the first place, there is no other form of any writ to the bishop than the old form given in Glanville and Bracton, which raises the express point whether the claimant was born or not before espousals and matrimony of his father and mother; and if the question was brought before a jury, as afterwards became the course of proceeding, then there was no other than that precise issue which could be raised upon the record. Further, if the question was sent to the bishop, it must have been sent to the bishop of the diocese where the action was brought, that is, where the land was situate, and not to the bishop of the diocese where the party whose legitimacy is disputed was born (see the book of Assisa, 35, pl. 7); which case seems not obscurely to indicate, that if the birth had been in France, the trial would be still before the English bishops; for SKIPWITH, a Judge of the Common Pleas, is made to say there, "you may carry your proofs before him in what place you please, in England, or from France." Again, the contest above adverted to was a contest between the ancient law and custom of England, on the one hand, and the canon law on the other, which should prevail as to the hereditary succession to land in England; canon and civil law being acknowledged and prevailing in England in all other respects, with the single exception of its application to the descent of land; the same canon and civil law prevailing in the foreign dominions of the Crown generally, and without any exception. There seems, therefore, no reasonable or probable ground for the surmise of any intention in the law-makers of that day, that, with the general refusal and repudiation of this rule of the civil and canon law as to the hereditary succession to land in England, there should be a tacit

* 933 * exception in favour of a claimant born beyond the seas.

Again, the custom would rather seem to be one which applies to the land itself, and not to the person only of the claimant, according to an observation of Bracton, in the place above cited, when, discussing the 'very point of the exception on the ground of bastardy, he says, "that every kingdom hath its own customs differing from those of others. For there may be one custom in the kingdom of England, and another in the kingdom of France, as to succession." And it would be singular indeed, if any such exception existed, that neither Bracton, who wrote with so much diffuseness on this very question at the time of this notable refusal of Parliament to alter the law, nor the author of Fleta, nor any of the other early writers, should have left the slightest vestige of an allusion to such exception in the rule.

On the contrary, the observation of Lord COKE, 2d Institute, 98, although not made in any case in a Court of law, proves, in a manner which leaves no doubt, what would have been the opinion of that great lawyer upon the point now under discussion, if it had arisen in his time. "Some have written," he says, "that William the Conqueror, being born out of matrimony, Robert, his reputed father, did after marry Arlot, his mother, and that thereby he had right by the civil and canon law; but that is contra legem Angliæ, as here it appeareth." This is in effect saying, although born in Normandy, and legitimated in Normandy by the subsequent marriage of his father and mother there, so that he could inherit land in Normandy, yet as to land in England he could not take it by descent, for the same law would be the law of descent of a kingdom and of land within it. This is the very case now put to the Judges by your Lordships.

* It therefore appears to be the just conclusion from * 934 these premises, that the rule of descent to English land is, that the heir must be born after actual marriage of his father and mother, in order to enable him to inherit; and that this is a rule of a positive inflexible nature, applying to, and inherent in, the land itself, which is the subject of descent, of the same nature and character as that rule which prohibited the descent of land to any but those who were of the whole blood to the last taker, or like the custom of gavelkind or borough-English, which cause the land to descend, in the one case, to all the sons together; in the other, to the younger son alone.

And if such be, as it appears to us to be, the rule of law which governs the descent of land in England, without any exception, either express or implied therein, on the score of the place of birth of the claimant, it remains to be considered whether, by any doctrine of international law, or by the comity of nations, that rule is to be let in by which B., being held to be legitimate in his own country for all purposes, must be considered as the heir-at-law in England.

The broad proposition contended for on the part of the plaintiff in error is, that legitimacy is a personal status to be determined by the law of the country which gives the party birth; and that, when the law of that country has once pronounced him to be legitimate, he is, by the comity of international law, to be considered as legitimate in every other country also, and for every purpose; and it is then contended that, as by the Scotch law there is a presumptio juris et de jure, that, under the circumstances supposed, the parents of B. were actually married to each other before the birth of B., such presumption of the Scotch law, by which his legitimacy is effected, must

 * 935 * also be adopted and received to the same extent in the English as in the Scotch Courts of Justice.

Now, there can be no doubt but that marriage, which is a personal contract, when entered into according to the rites of the country where the parties are domiciled and the marriage celebrated, would be considered and treated as a perfect and complete marriage throughout the whole of Christendom.

But it does not therefore follow, that, with the adoption of the marriage contract, the foreign law adopts also all the conclusions and consequences which hold good in the country where the marriage was celebrated. That the marriage in question was not celebrated in fact until after the birth of B. is to be assumed from the form of the question. Indeed, except on that supposition, there would be no question at all. Does it follow, then, that because the Scotch hold a marriage celebrated between the parents after the birth of a child to be conclusive proof of an actual marriage before, a foreign country, which adopts the marriage as complete and binding as a contract of marriage, must also adopt this consequence? No authority has been cited from any jurist or writer on the subject of the law of nations to that effect, — nothing beyond the general proposition that a party legitimate in one country is to be held legitimate all over the world. Indeed, the ground upon which this conclusion of B.'s legitimacy is made by the Scotch law, is not stated to us, and we have no right to assume any fact not contained in the question which your Lordships have proposed to us. We may, however, observe that, in the course of the argument at your Lordships' bar, the ground has been variously stated, upon which the laws of different countries have arrived at the same conclusion.

It was asserted * that, by the law of Scotland, the subse- * 936 quent marriage is not to be taken to be the marriage itself, but only evidence, though conclusive in its nature, of the marriage prior to the birth of B.; that the canon law rests the legitimacy of the son born before such marriage upon a ground totally different, viz., that having been born illegitimate, he is made legitimate, legitimus, by the subsequent marriage, by a positive rule of law, on account of the repentance of his parents: whereas, by the Scotch law, a marriage previous to his birth is conclusively presumed, so that he always was legitimate, and his parents had nothing to repent of. Pothier, on the other hand (Contrat de Marr. part v. ch. 2, art. 2), when he speaks of the effect of a subsequent marriage, in legitimating children born before it, disclaims the authority of the canon law, nor does he mention any fiction of an antecedent marriage, but rests the effect upon the positive law of the country. He first instances the custom of Troyes, “Les enfans nés hors mariage De Soluta et Solutâ puis que le père et la mère s’épousent l’un l’autre, succèdent et viennent à partage avec les autres enfans si aucuns y’ à ;” and then adds, “that it is a common right received throughout the whole kingdom.”

Now, it could never be contended by any jurist, that the law of England in respect to the succession of land in England, would be bound to adopt a positive law of succession like that which holds in France, the distinction being so well known between laws that relate to personal status and personal contracts, and those which relate to real and immovable property; for which it is unnecessary to make reference to any other authority than that of Dr. Story, in his admirable Commentaries on the Conflict of Laws. (See sections 430 and following, where all the authorities * are brought together). And if such positive * 937 law is not upon any principle to be introduced to control the English law of descent, what ground is there for the introduction into the English law of descents, not only of the contract of marriage observed in another country, which is admitted to be adopted, but also of a fiction with respect to the time of the marriage? that is, in effect, of a rule of evidence which the foreign country thinks it right to hold.

But admitting, for the sake of argument, and we are not called upon to give our opinion on that point, that B., legitimate in Scotland, is to be taken to be legitimate all over the world ; the question still recurs, whether, for the purpose of constituting an heir to land in England, something more is not necessary to be proved on his part than such legitimacy ; and if we are right in the grounds on which we have rested the first point, one other step is necessary, namely, to prove that he was born after an actual marriage between his parents ; and if this be so, then, upon the distinction admitted by all the writers on international law, the lex loci rei sitæ must prevail, not the law of the place of birth.

My Lords, in the course of the discussion, some stress appears to have been placed on the argument, that if B. had died before A. the intestate, leaving a child, such child might have inherited to A., tracing through his legitimate parent ; and then it was asked if the child might inherit, why might not the parent himself inherit ? But the answer to that supposed case appears to be, that if the parent be not capable of inheriting himself, he has no heritable blood which he can transmit to his child ; so that the child could not, under the assumed facts, have inherited, and the question therefore becomes, in truth, the same with

 * 938 * that before us. The case supposed would be governed by the old acknowledged rule of descent: “ Qui doit inheriter al père, doit inheriter al fitz.”

My Lords, the two decided cases that have been relied upon in the course of argument, that of Shedden v. Patrick, and that of the Strathmore Peerage, do not, upon consideration, create any real difficulty. Those cases decide no more than that no one can inherit without having the personal status of legitimacy ; a point upon which all agree ; but they are of no force to establish the main point in dispute in this case, viz., that such personal status is sufficient of itself to enable the claimant to succeed as heir to land in England.

Upon the whole, in reporting to your Lordships as the opinion of the Judges, “ that B. is not entitled to the real property as the heir of A., ” I am bound at the same time to state, that although they agree in the result, they are not to be considered as responsible for all the grounds and reasons on which I have endeavoured to support and to explain such opinion.

LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, the subject upon which your Lordships have had the opinion of the Judges is of so much importance, and the learning contained in that able opinion is of such a description, as, in my opinion, to require further consideration. I shall therefore propose to your Lordships, that the further consideration of this case be postponed.

LORD BROUGHAM.—My Lords, I perfectly agree in opinion with my noble and learned friend. It is quite impossible to express more strongly than I desire to do, the obligations which I think your Lordships and the law are under to the learned * Judges for the very able, elaborate, and lucid * 939 opinion they have given. My Lords, it is perhaps enough to say respecting this opinion of the learned Judges, that in a case which has undergone argument in every form for somewhere about twelve years past (both in the sister kingdom and here), first, in the different Courts of Westminster Hall, and, next, at your Lordships' bar; upon which the learned Judges in the Courts below, upon former occasions, in deciding the question submitted to them, and the learned Judges here in assisting your Lordships, have given their opinions and discussed the points,—nevertheless, at the eleventh hour, as it were, and at the very end of this long-continued discussion, very great new light, if I may so express it, has been thrown upon the question by the reasonings of the learned Judges, and very important additions have been made by the arguments to-day, to those arguments and to that learning which had been brought to bear upon that question in its former stages, in your Lordships' House, in Westminster Hall, and in the Courts of Scotland.

Under these circumstances, my Lords, it is not for me to say that the opinion, or rather the leaning of opinion, which, it is well known to your Lordships, I formerly expressed, is not materially affected by the quite new form in which the argument is now placed. I am, however, by no means prepared to state that I shall, on reconsidering the reasons of the learned Judges, now submitted to your Lordships, find a sufficient answer to the difficulties which formerly pressed upon me, which I very fully stated to your Lordships, I think, in the year 1835. (a)

Upon these grounds I entirely agree with my noble * and * 940 learned friend, in thinking that the further consideration of this case ought to be postponed. I ought to add, that in the whole of the first part of the reasoning of the learned Judges, I was prepared to agree: what I have doubted is the latter part of the reasoning. One thing, my Lords, has struck me ; that supposing your Lordships shall ultimately be of opinion that you ought to decide in favour of the defendant in error, and to affirm the judgment of the Court below, it will be absolutely necessary that the legislature should interfere, in order to allay the evils which will arise out of the conflict of laws respecting the personal status in the two parts of the kingdom.

August 10, 1840.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Lords, this was an ejectment brought to recover possession of lands situated in Yorkshire ; and a verdict being taken, subject to a special case for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench (from which the record came), with leave for either party to turn it into a special verdict, it came before this House by writ of error, and was twice argued,— first, in 1830, when the Judges attended and gave their opinion through the Chief Baron (Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER), and again, in 1839, when your Lordships also had the assistance of the Judges, who have now given their opinion through the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. The question raised by the special verdict, and argued upon these several occasions, is this, whether a person born in Scotland, of parents domiciled there and married there, but intermarrying after his birth, and who, by the law of Scotland, is legitimate in consequence of that subsequent marriage, can take real estate in England as heir ? The Court below held that he could not ; and the Judges have all agreed in this opinion.

* 941 * When, in 1835, I took the liberty of calling the attention of your Lordships to this question, I pointed out what appeared to me to have been material defects in the argument both below and here, on the part of the defendant in error ; that is, in behalf of the judgment below. The learned and elaborate opinion last given by the Judges has made very valuable additions to the clear and able, though more succinct, statement given upon the former occasion. It is now for your Lordships finally to dispose of the case ; and I deem it my duty to offer a few remarks upon the subject, on account of its great importance, and more especially of the bearing which the principles connected with it, and about to be recognized in your decision, must almost unavoidably have upon other questions.

While I willingly acknowledge the great value of the assistance which we have received from the learned Judges upon this occasion, I feel convinced that there are several matters which still remain to be considered, and some difficulties to be got over, before we can with perfect confidence rely upon the conclusion at which they have arrived. But I shall rest satisfied with referring generally to the scope of the argument which I submitted to your Lordships upon the former occasion (1835); and with observing, that a considerable portion of it is left untouched by the present argument of the learned Judges; and that I, on the other hand, as I stated on hearing their argument, should find it not difficult to reach a conclusion the opposite of theirs, while I yet admitted a very large portion of their positions. In the observations which I am about to offer upon their argument, I purposely abstain from any thing more than thus generally referring to its scope, as contrasted with that of the opposite reasoning. * What I wish further now to state relates to * 942 the detail of their statement, and must be taken as independent of any general answer to it; for which I refer to what I before submitted to your Lordships, as containing that answer by anticipation.

The authorities cited by the learned Judges, especially in the earlier part of their opinion, do not seem conclusive; as, for example, Lord COKE's definition of heir, "ex justis nuptiis procreatus," and the text in the Mirror, "that the law only taketh him to be a son whom the marriage proveth to be so." These and other authorities only prove the dependence on and connection of legitimacy with marriage, or the inheritable quality with marriage, which in no part of the argument ever could have been denied. The text in Glanville seems at first to take the distinction between legitimacy generally or absolutely, and legitimacy by being born in lawful wedlock, as connected with right to inherit; for it says, "neither a bastard nor any person not born in lawful wedlock can be an heir." But, in a subsequent chapter, the writ is given, and that sets forth the denial by the demandant of the tenant's right, "because he is a bastard, born before marriage of the parents;" which seems to indicate that the marriage was required to precede the birth only in order to negative the bastardy: the writ, indeed, adds, that it does not belong to the temporal Court to inquire concerning bastardy, wherefore it is sent to the Court Christian.

It is said that the law frames the writ for the purpose of preventing the Court Christian from answering the question according to the canon or civil law: nevertheless, the bishops were not compelled, by the exigency of the writ, to confine themselves to the question whether the party was born before or since

* 943 * marriage, because the bastardy is introduced in terms, as well as the birth and marriage.

A council, however, was held soon after the Parliament of Merton; and at that council it was directed that the writ should merely require the Ordinary to examine the date of the birth, and whether before or after marriage; to prevent, as is said, "any evasion or subtlety" on the part of the ecclesiastical authorities.

The argument of the learned Judges upon the statute (of Merton) is deserving of great attention; nor can I at all go along with those who have contended, both in the Court below and here, that it is not a statute, but a refusal to make a statute: such was the contention of the learned Chief Justice (TINDAL), in the able argument which he delivered when at the bar in the King's Bench, against the decision. (a) This statute is only different from other statutes, inasmuch as it is in substance declaratory, and in form somewhat different from that of declaratory Acts in modern times. It is a distinct declaration of what the law had ever been before the statute, and a refusal to alter it. But it is to be observed, that the bishops, in calling for the alteration, put their demand expressly on the ground that antenati are legitimate by the canon law; and it is in consequence of their legitimacy that the bishops claim the recognition of their right to inherit. The barons only affirm that such antenati had no right of inheritance by the common law, without saying whether, by the common law, they were legitimate or not; though assuredly the common law is understood to be declared by the statute against their legitimacy universally and in all respects, as well as with respect to feudal inheritance. But I agree that it

* 944 somewhat * aids the view taken by the learned Judges, when we find that special bastardy ceased from the time of the statute to be tried by the bishop, and has ever since been tried per pais.

It may be remarked that the proceeding appears, from the Grand Coustumier, to have been a writ of bastardy general, directed to the Ordinary; but the description of bastards there given is worthy of attention: "Sont bastards ceulx qui sont

engendres hors marriage ;” and then immediately it goes on to say, “ mais ceulx qui sont engendres devant le mariage, si les parens epousent depuis la naissance, ils sont legitimes ;” so that, apparently, though born de facto out of wedlock, they were in contemplation of law born within wedlock. It may be further observed that Littleton, sec. 188, in treating of villenage, gives, as the reason why a bastard is quasi nullius filius, that he cannot be heir to any “ pur ceo que il ne poit enheriter à nulluy.”

The learned Judges object to the observations made at the bar upon the title prefixed to the chapter in question of the statute ; namely, that this title showed the enactment only was intended to be a declaration of the personal status. “ This title,” say the learned Judges, “ is not to be found in the original statute :” they refer to the edition published by the Record Commissioners, where “ Provisiones de Merton ” is the only heading of the Act ; and they add, “ that no more argument can justly be built upon the title prefixed in some editions, than upon the marginal notes against the different sections.” If, however, the learned counsel at your Lordships’ bar were led into any error in this matter, they had very high example in going astray ; no less than that of the Court below, whence this writ of error is brought, and where, when the * cause was first decided, one of the * 945 learned Judges (a) argued in support of the decision now under revision, on the ground of the heading or title. “ We have no occasion,” says Mr. Justice BAYLEY, “ in order to answer the question who is hæres, to go beyond the statute. The title of it is, ‘ He is a bastard who is born before the marriage of his parents ;’ not restraining it to those born in England.” For myself, I consider the assistance to be equally slender which the one argument and the other derives from this title, even supposing it to have been the one given by the legislature to the chapter of the Act, which it appears not to have been ; which, indeed, it could not have been, for no titles at all were put on statutes till the 11 Hen. 7, as is said by TREBY, C. J., in Chance v. Adams. (b)

I am inclined to regard as the most important part of the argument of the learned Judges, their observations on the state of the Crown dominions at the making of the statute. This point had been made in the Court below, but without explanation, and not much dwelt upon. The Lord Chief Justice (ABBOTT) takes it, though only in general terms, yet quite intelligibly. (a) The learned Judges here have very usefully explained the argument, and illustrated it by important remarks. They have contended that an antenatus within the King's ligeance, but born in Normandy (which, by the way, had for above thirty years before the statute ceased to be English de facto, though it was not formally ceded till twenty-five years after), Aquitaine, and other provinces where the civil law prevailed, could not have inherited land in England under the statute, chiefly because no exception is

(b) Hard. 825; Amb. 22; 1 Bl. 95.

 * 946 there made per expressum * of such persons, although the connection of the countries would naturally call the attention of the legislature to the case, and because no tacit or implied exception can be supposed, in favour of the canon law, for Norman subjects of the Crown, when the express words of the Act refuse to adopt the same canon law for English subjects of the Crown. The silence of contemporary writers, as Bracton and the author of Fleta, is very justly referred to in aid of the same conclusion. The other reasoning of the Judges on the passage in Bracton, and which, as well as the reference to the customs of gavelkind and borough-English, was urged below, seems there to have met with a sufficient answer in the argument at the bar, that those authorities apply to English parties, and those customs to the rule of succession; none of which matters is disputed; so that the authorities may well stand with the opposite argument. No doubt, if the fact of being born within lawful wedlock be as much a necessary quality to the character of heir by the custom of England, as the fact of being youngest son is to being heir by the custom of borough-English manors,—if that fact of being born within lawful wedlock can only be judged of according to the English law, and admits of as little dispute as the fact of being eldest or youngest child, there is, and there must be, an end of the question. But unless these things are so,—and assuming them to be so is begging the whole question,—the cases put have no useful application to the one in hand.

So of the proposition repeatedly affirmed below, and now largely stated by the learned Judges here, that this law or custom is something inherent in the land,—a quality of the land itself, as it were, and not of the claimant. This, of course, would, in for the dispute will still arise, — what description of person is that to which the descendible quality of the land carries it?
 * 947 one sense, * decide the question; but then it would beg it also: in any other sense it leaves the question untouched;

The argument drawn by the learned Judges from the observation of Lord COKE, in the 2d Institute, on the title of William the Conqueror, had been used in the Court below. (a) The passage is not very clear; but where Lord COKE says, that some held William the Conqueror “to have had right by the civil and canon law” (in consequence of the subsequent marriage of his parents), he is, I presume, supposed to mean right to the Crown of England, as nearest maternal relative to Edward the Confessor; which he certainly was, being grandson to his maternal uncle, Richard of Normandy. That this could give him no right to the exclusion of the male branch, represented by Edgar Atheling, the Confessor’s great nephew, and who, being grandson of his eldest brother Edmund Ironsides, had indeed a title paramount that of the Confessor himself, is quite clear; and although the Conqueror appears to have called himself Rex Hereditarius in some charters, historians and antiquaries are agreed that this could only mean heir under the supposed will of the Confessor; for the only dispute as to his title that has ever been raised, is, whether he took by the sword, or, as conquæstor, by purchase (Spelman’s Glossary, voce Conquæstor), under the supposed will or gift of the Confessor, about the existence of which much controversy has always been held. As heir, — as one taking by inheritance, — no person has ever asserted his title; and if he took under the Confessor’s * gift or will, his legitimacy was really of as little * 948 importance as it was to the other and more secure title which he derived from his sword. If indeed Lord COKE, or rather those to whom he refers, for any reason supposed the male branch to be extinct, then we can understand the passage, always supposing, which is absurd, that a mother’s relatives could succeed; and in that case the passage might bear upon the argument; or it may bear upon it if we suppose Lord COKE puts the case hypothetically, or refers to some who did consider the male branch settled in Hungary to be extinct. Still this seems not very intelligible; for it is believed that Edward the Confessor had called them over, as his end approached; that his nephew Edward the Outlaw, or Exile, came back and died here; but wherever he died, it is quite certain that he left Edgar Atheling his son, who was notoriously in England at the Conquest, who was made to join in some proceedings to confirm William's title, and was afterwards engaged in an unsuccessful rebellion against him. The passage, therefore, is really not very easily explained; nor is any light thrown on it by the reference to the authorities cited: William of Malmsbury, b. iii.; Ingulphus, lib. vi. cap. 19; and the Grand Coustumier, cap. 27. The first of these, at the place referred to, only says that William's father married his mother "aliquando justæ uxoris loco haberet" (scil. Arlottam); and the second reference (to Ingulphus) seems erroneous, for there are no books and chapters in Ingulphus, at least in any editions which we now have, or which are known ever to have existed; but all that he says of William (who was his patron, and of whom he writes largely, and in praise and defence) is, that the Confessor, aware of Edgar's weakness, turned his thoughts towards

an expression which he repeats afterwards. The text of the Grand Coustumier (which is the third reference) merely gives the law of bastardy and legitimation generally; nor can I see any reference to William's case in the Commentaries, though I will not undertake to say there may not be some such reference. In the text cited by Lord COKE there is certainly none, and in the commentary I can find none. But the difficulties do not end here; because, even if Edgar was set aside for imbecility, still the Conqueror was not next heir, for he was only the Confessor's cousin-german by the mother once removed (Welsh nephew, as we say, or nephew à la mode de Bretagne, as the French have it; and this accounts for some writers calling the Confessor cousin, and some uncle, to the Conqueror): whereas Edgar's sister, afterwards married to Malcolm in Scotland, was his great-niece by his elder brother. And, moreover, we have now been all along supposing that the connection of William with the Confessor, being through the mother of the latter only, made no difference; whereas, suppose the whole paternal relations had been extinguished, it is difficult to see how, upon any feudal principle, any person could inherit who was not of the blood of the English royal family. William's only connection with England was, that his aunt had been married to an English king; consequently, it seems quite impossible to understand how he ever could be considered as "having right," even on the supposition that the lawful course of succession was by nomination and selection from among the whole members of a given royal family. Subject to these observations, we may consider this passage in Lord COKE as some kind of indication of his opinion, always supposing the passage to be correct; but there * can be little doubt that * 950 these observations make it exceedingly unlikely that Lord COKE ever wrote it as we now have it. The remark, too, appears in a work, be it observed, which was not published in the author's lifetime. If there were no such uncertainty hanging over the passage, its importance to the argument would be undeniable: it would amount to neither more nor less than Lord COKE's opinion upon the case at bar. But it is probable that some such considerations as those to which I have been adverting operated in preventing any attention being paid to this authority in the Court below, where it was cited, but occasioned no observation either at the bar or from the bench. Really there seems no possibility of relying on a dictum which assumes that the legitimacy of a party taking by purchase and not by descent is material to his title; and therefore, upon a full consideration of the matter, Lord COKE's supposed authority, on which so much reliance is placed by the learned Judges, must, without hesitation, be laid out of our view in deciding the present question.

The learned Judges refer to the illustration drawn from a person supposed to claim through the antenatus, he having predeceased his father; and they hold this to be disposed of by the opinion given on the principal case or question; inasmuch as, if incapable of inheriting himself, he could not transmit heritable blood to his issue; and, generally speaking, no doubt it would be so, although contrary to Lord COKE's supposed opinion as to issue of aliens inheriting to each other collaterally. It has been decided that a brother may succeed to a brother, the only connection of the two being through an alien father, who had no inheritable blood. (Collingwood v. Pace, (a) where the * opinion generally ascribed, and, among others, by Black- * 951 stone, to Lord COKE, is denied by the majority of the Judges to be his, and by none of them affirmed to be so.) But a nearer case to the present may be put. Where, by the law of the country, as in Scotland and on the Continent, legitimation per subsequens matrimonium is admitted, it seems that the authorities have agreed in holding that, if the antenatus dies before marriage of his parents, leaving lawful issue, the issue shall take as heir to his grandfather, though he must claim through a person who lived and died illegitimate.

(a) 1 Lev. 52.

Nor is this case of one who never could himself be heir, transmitting inheritable blood to his issue, confined to those countries and that law of legitimation. We have an example in our own law in the case of bastard eigné; and it is worth while to consider how this is treated, though I know not that it materially impeaches the general conclusion to which the argument of the learned Judges leads them, unless by showing how entirely the law proceeds upon the supposition that it is his bastardy, and his bastard only, which excludes the antenatus from succession.

Littleton, in sections 399 and 400, says, that the issue of the bastard eigné, who, having entered, died seised, shall have the land by reason of the colour which his father had as heir; "for by the law of holy church he is mulier, albeit by the law of the land he is bastard."

Lord COKE, in commenting upon the words of Littleton, that in such a case the mulier puisne is "without remedy," says, that the descent from the bastard eigné not only takes away the entry, like other descents which leave a party to his action, but

 * 952 makes the issue of the bastard become lawful heir; * adding that, even if the mulier be within age, he is barred, because the bastard's issue is become, in judgment of law, lawful heir; "for the law (says he) doth prefer legitimation before the privilege of infancy." Collateral heirs, too, are barred, as well as the mulier; and the bastard becoming a monk professed, which is a civil death, has the same effect; his issue succeeds during the natural life of the bastard, and the legitimate heir is barred. In the 2d Institute, Lord COKE, as a confirmation of the doctrine, gives the record of a judgment in the 18 Edward I., showing that the mulier cannot have an assize of mort d'ancestor; and upon the ground that the bastard eigné has entered as heir; and the reason assigned by Lord COKE is, that "the bastard is accounted of the blood with the mulier puisne." (2d Institute, 97.) But in Coke Littleton, 244, b., he puts the case which has been referred to from the law of Scotland and the Continent, of the bastard eigné dying in his father's lifetime, and leaving issue; this son enters as heir to the grandfather, and dies seised; the mulier is barred. "The descent," says Lord COKE, "binds him." Now, this cannot be from the laches of the mulier during the bastard's life; for by the supposition, nothing had been done by the bastard to make the mulier claim; nor could he claim, for the grandfather was still alive. The laches was in the grandson's life; so that here the reason given for the law fails, viz., that it is unjust to treat a person all his life as legitimate, and bastardize him after his death ; for here the antenatus never was treated as legitimate at all ; he lived and died a bastard ; yet his issue claiming through him, who had no inheritable blood, entered as heir to the common ancestor, and by dying seised, barred the lawful issue. Although, however, this consideration *some- * 953 what contradicts the answer given by the learned Judges to the argument at the bar, it yet furnishes another answer to that argument, by showing, that if it proves any thing, it proves too much ; since in the case of bastard eigné there is no question whatever of his right being excluded in the common case (of English marriage, birth, and domicile), unless where there has been an entry, and dying seised, without counter claim.

The short observation made by the learned Judges on the cases of Shedden v. Patrick and the Strathmore Peerage appears hardly to be satisfactory. “ These cases,” it is said, “ only decide that no one can inherit without the personal status of legitimacy ; and do not show, what is alone in dispute, that such personal status is sufficient ground for claiming English real estate as heir.” It appears that these cases establish somewhat more than the first of those positions, and, although they do not decide the second, they appear to give it much countenance. They show that the quality, whatever it is, that must be possessed by a claimant in order that he may take land or honours in Scotland, is given to, or withholden from, him, according to the law, not of Scotland, where the real estate lies, but of the country where his birth and his father’s marriage and domicile were. Whether that quality be called legitimacy or any thing else is not material ; nor is it material whether the quality is required in relation to the property by some positive statutory enactment of the country where it lies, or only by the common law of that country, or by some statute (like that of Merton) which declares what the common law always has been. The land in Scotland is impressed with a particular quality, — that of being descendible to the antenati where the parents have *intermarried ; it is of such a * 954 nature as not to descend upon the mulier puisne, but upon the bastard eigné ; while in England it is of such a nature as to descend to the mulier, and not to the bastard. The one quality is as firmly fixed in the soil of Scotland as the other is in that of England. Then, what have the Courts and what has this House decided in those celebrated cases ? That, notwithstanding the inherent descendible quality, and notwithstanding the general rule of the lex loci rei sitæ, so much relied on by the learned Judges, both below and here, through their whole argument, the law of the country where the property is must bend to the law of the domicile, marriage, and birth; and, because the latter law excludes antenati from legitimacy, they shall be excluded from the succession to which the former law calls them. The Scotch common law says, "Let the land go to the antenatus,—such is its descendible quality." The English common law says, "Let the land not go to the antenatus." The question, and the only question, is, have we a right to look beyond the fact, or to ask any but one question, namely, whether a person is antenatus or postnatus? Whether his parents were married or not at his birth? Are we bound by the simple fact, or may we look to the view taken of it by the law of the foreign country to which the claimant and his parents belonged? The decided cases say, in the instance of Scotland, that we may and must look at the foreign law; that the subsequent marriage is immaterial for succession in Scotland, if it is immaterial for legitimation in the claimant's country; and the question is, whether, according to the principle of those decisions, it is possible to exclude all reference to the foreign law, where the same kind of question

* 955 arises as to English succession. It is very * possible that the principle of the cases may be inapplicable. This may possibly be proved by argument; but it can hardly be said to have been proved by the only remark made on those cases in the statement of the learned Judges; and this scanty discussion of those cases is the more to be lamented, because, in deciding the present question below, the Court expressly referred to this House as the place where Shedden v. Patrick and the Strathmore Peerage would meet with ample attention as to their bearing upon this argument.

The learned Judges have given no opinion upon the question whether or not a person legitimated by subsequent marriage in a country where that law prevails, is therefore legitimate all the world over; nor, perhaps, was it incumbent on them to argue this for the purpose of answering the question put to them by the House. They contend that the statute, or rather the common law recognized and declared by the statute, requires something beyond mere legitimacy to make an heir to English real estate. They agree with the Court below, that legitimacy alone is not sufficient; it must be as was there said, (a) legitimacy sub modo, — legitimacy and being born in wedlock. Consequently, they appear plainly to admit, that a person may be legitimate for all other purposes, and yet incapable of taking land by descent, — that we ought not to say “a man’s eldest lawful son is his heir-at-law,” but “his eldest lawful son if born in lawful wedlock.”

In another case, Munro v. Munro, which has been decided to-day, we held here, as it had been held in the Court below, that a party is entitled to take real * estate by * 956 descent, as legitimate according to the law of the country where it lies, who is bastard by the law established in the country of the birth and marriage. In the Courts which administer that law (the law of England in the case put), would the party be considered as bastard or as legitimate, when any right unconnected with real property was claimed? If bastard, then the same person is legitimate in one country and not in another, — bastard where born, and legitimate where the parents are domiciled; though some of the Judges, with whom we agreed in that case, held this to be a solecism in law, considering it clear that the status must be everywhere the same. If legitimate, then it follows that the question of personal status depends on the law of foreign countries, and that this law is imported into England as to the consequences of the marriage contract, although the lex loci contractus alone regulates the constitution of that contract.

But which way soever we may hold as to these questions, the principles of the two decided cases referred to (Shedden v. Patrick and the Strathmore Peerage) are quite consistent with that of the last mentioned case decided to-day. Those principles are not so easily reconciled to the judgment at present before your Lordships.

Having stated what occurs to me upon the arguments of the learned Judges, again expressing my high sense of the service which they have rendered by the great attention bestowed upon the subject, I rest satisfied with intimating my opinion upon the difficulties which still beset the question, and the anomalies likely to arise from the future application of the principles countenanced in the decision; and though I shall not move your Lordships to give * judgment for the defendant in error, if my * 957 noble and learned friend should move it, I shall offer no opposition.

LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, I was not in your Lordships’

House when this case was first argued; but I was present at the argument when the learned Judges were in attendance, and I gave my attention to the opinion expressed by the Lord Chief Justice, and I entirely concur in that opinion. I am extremely satisfied with the ground upon which the Judges put it, because they put the question on a ground which avoids the difficulty that seems to surround the task of interfering with those general principles peculiar to the law of England, principles that at first sight seem to be somewhat at variance with the decisions to which the Courts have come. Under these circumstances, as my noble and learned friend does not move the judgment, I move judgment for the defendant in error.

Judgment accordingly.

* 958 * UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW v. FACULTY

The CHANCELLOR, RECTOR, DEAN, and other Members of the Senate of the UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW, and JOHN M'MILLAN, Surgeon in Kirk Street, in Calton of Glasgow, and WIL- LIAM MARSHALL, Surgeon in Cambuslang .	}	Appellants.

Corporation. Medicine. University.

The University of Glasgow possessed from an ancient date the power of conferring degrees in arts and sciences, and particularly the degree of doctor or master in all such arts and sciences as should be taught at the University. It had long exercised the power of conferring degrees in medicine. In 1599, King James VI. granted a charter to "Mr. Peter Law, our surgeon, and Mr. Robert Hamilton, professors of medicine, and their successors, indwellers in Glasgow," by which "they and their successors" were authorized to summon before them, within certain bounds therein mentioned, "all persons professing or using the art of surgery, and to examine them on their literature, knowledge, and practice," and to admit them,

&c., or to reject them; and in case they should be contumacious, to impose a certain penalty on them. This grant was in terms ratified by a Scotch Act of Parliament in 1672. The grantees assumed the name of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, and from the date of the grant exercised a supervision over persons practising surgery within the specified bounds. In 1817, the University founded a professorship of surgery, and then, as surgery was one of the arts and sciences taught at the University, conferred degrees in surgery as well as in medicine. The Faculty claimed to exercise its rights over the persons holding these degrees, if practitioners within the bounds.

Held, that the Faculty was a corporation, and had a right to this supervision; that the granting by the University of degrees in surgery, to persons who practised within the bounds, would not exempt them from the supervision of the Faculty; and that the power given to the Faculty by the charter to impose a penalty on the contumacious, did not prevent that body from proceeding against them in a court of law.

July 14, 15, 1838. August 7, 1840.

THE appellants, representing the University of Glasgow, had granted to John M'Millan, of Glasgow, * and William * 959 Marshall, of Cambuslang (who also joined in the appeal), degrees which, by the constitution of the University, were, as it was alleged, sufficient to entitle them to practise as surgeons. The respondents, claiming to be the president and visitor of the faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow, filed a bill of suspension and interdict against M'Millan, Marshall, and others, to prevent them from continuing to practise as surgeons until they had obtained proper authority to do so from the said faculty. The respondents set out, as their title to maintain the bill, the following facts: King James VI. issued a letter of gift and commission, under the privy seal of the kingdom of Scotland, dated the 29th day of November, 1599, and which bears as follows: "James, by the grace of God, king of Scots, to all provosts, bailies, sheriffs, stewarts or bailies of regalities, and other ministers of justice within the bounds following, and their deputies, and sundry others, our lieges and subjects, whom it effeirs, to whose knowledge these our letters shall come; greeting. Witt ye us, with advice of our council, understanding the great abuses which has been committed in time bygone, and yet daily continues, by ignorant, unskilled, and unlearned persons, who, under colour of chirurgeons, abuses the people to their pleasure, passing away but trial or punishment, and thereby destroys infinite number of our subjects, wherewith no order hath been taken in time bygone, especially within the burgh and barony of Glasgow, Renfrew,

Dunbritain, and our sheriffdoms of Clydsdale, Renfrew, Lanark, Kyle, Carrick, Air, and Cunningham: for avoiding of such inconveniences, and for order to be taken in time coming, to have made, constituted, and ordained, and, by the tenor of these our letters, makes, constitutes, and ordains, Mr. Peter

* 960 * Low, our chirurgeon, and chief chirurgeon to our dearest son, the prince, with the assistance of Mr. Robert Hamilton, professor of medicine, and their successors, indwellers in Glasgow, given and granted to them, and their successors, full power to call, summon, and convene before them, within the said burgh of Glasgow, or in any other of our said burghs or publick places of the foresaid bounds, all persons professing or using the said art of chirurgery, and to examine them upon their literature, knowledge, and practice; if they be found worthy to admit, allow, and approve them, give them testimonials according to their art and knowledge, that they shall be found worthy to exercise thereafter, receive their oath, authorize them as accords, and to discharge them to use any farther than they have knowledge passing their capacity, lest our subjects be abused; and that every one cited, report testimonials of the ministers or elders, or magistrates of the parish where they dwell, of their life and conversations; and in case they be contumacious to be lawfully cited, every one to be unawed in the sum of 40*l.*, toties quoties, half to the judge, and the other half to be at the visitor's pleasure. And for payment thereof, the said Mr. Peter and Mr. Robert, as visitors, to have our other letters of horning on the party or magistrate where the contumacious person dwells, charging them to poind, within twenty-four hours, under the pain of horning; and the party not having gear poindable, the magistrates, under the same pain, to incarcerate them while caution responsible be found, that the contumax person shall compear, such day and place as the said visitors shall appoint, giving trial of their qualification. It shall be lawful to the said visitors, with advice of their brethren, to make statutes for the common-weal of

* 961 * our subjects, anent the said arts and using thereof faithfully, and the breachers thereof to be punished and unawed according to the fault. It shall not be lawful to any manner of person within the said bounds to exercise medicine without the testimonial of a famous university where medicine is taught, or the leave of our or our dearest spouse's chief medicinaries; and in case they failzie, it shall be lawful to the said visitors to challenge, pursue, and inhibit them from using and exercising the said arts of medicine under the pain of 40*l.*, to be distributed, the one half to the judge, the other half to the poor, toties quoties, if they be found exercising the same, ay and while they bring sufficient testimonials, as said is. That no manner of person sell any drugs in the city of Glasgow, except the same be sighted by the said visitors, and by William Spang, apothecary, under pain of confiscation of the drugs." And the commission granted "to the said visitors, indwellers in Glasgow, professors of the said arts, and their brethren, present and to come, immunity and exemption of all weapons-showing, raids, hosts, bearing of armour, watching, warding, stenting, taxations, passing on assize, inquests in justice-courts, sheriff or burrow courts, in actions criminal or civil, notwithstanding of our acts, laws, and constitutions thereof, excepting in giving their counsel, appertaining to the said arts: ordaining all you, the foresaid provost, bailies of burrows, sheriffs, stewarts, bailies of regalities, and other ministers of justice within the said bounds, and your deputies, to assist, fortify, and concur, and defend the said visitors, and their posterity, professors of the said arts, and to put the said acts made and to be made into execution, and our letters of our session be granted thereupon, to charge them for that effect, * within 24 hours next after ye be charged thereto." * 962

The letter and commission was presented to the provost and magistrates of Glasgow, who judicially ratified and promised to maintain the same, by their act, dated 9th February, 1600. Conformably to the said letter and commission, and powers thereby conferred, thereafter the said brethren and their successors, from time to time, made various rules and statutes, anent the said arts, and using thereof. The letter of gift and commission was ratified and approved in Parliament by Act of Charles II., on the 11th of September, 1672; (a) and the brethren had

* 963 been, for more than * a century past, known and designated as the faculty of physicians and surgeons in Glasgow, and have been acknowledged and recognized as such in divers judicial proceedings, as well as acts of adjournal and of Parliament, particularly the acts of adjournal 12th October, 1709, and 24th March, 1812, and the Statute 55 Geo. 3, c. 69, sec. 4 & 5. Ever since the date of the said letter of gift and commission, the complainers and their predecessors have enjoyed and exercised the privileges, rights, and powers thereby conferred; and particularly the rights and powers of making statutes anent the said arts, and using thereof, and of convening, examining, admitting, approving, and granting testimonials to such as were qualified, and of discharging and prohibiting such as were contumacious, and did not conform themselves to the said letter and rules made in virtue thereof. The bill then stated various instances in which the complainers (the respondents), or their predecessors, had enforced the rights conferred on them by the letters-patent of James VI., and it concluded in the usual manner.

The answer for the defenders (the present appellants) set forth that the University of Glasgow was erected by virtue of a papal bull issued by Pope Nicholas V., in the year 1450. This bull, and all the powers and privileges thereby intended to be conferred upon the University, were ratified both by various royal ture, knowledge, and practice; if they be fund wordie, to admit, allow, and approve them, give them testimoniell according to their arte and knowledge to exerce thereafter, receave their oaths, and authorize them as accords; and that it shall not be leisum to any maner of persons within the foresaids bounds to exercise medicine without ane testimoniell of ane famous universitie wher medicine is taught, or at leist the persons above mentioned and their successors, under the pains contained in the said gift; and that no maner of persons sell any drogs within the city of Glasgow, except they be sighted be the foresaids persons, under the paine of confiscation of the drogs; and that no ratton poyson be sold except by the apothecaries, who shall be bund to take caution of the buyers for coast, skaith, and damage, as the said letter of gift in the selft at more length proports, in the haille heids, clauses, articles and circumstances of the samen, and after the forme and tenor thair of, in all points, in so far as the samen gift, and this present ratification thereof, can be extendit, in favours of the present chirurgians, apothecaries, and barbours within the said burgh of Glasgow, and their successors allenarlie, and no further; and his Majestie and estates of Parliament, wills, grants and declares, that this present general ratification shall be als valeid and sufficient to the saids chirurgians, apothecaries, and barbours, and their successors allenerlie, as said is, as if the said gift wer word for word heir engrossed, notwithstanding the samen be not so done, wherewith his Majestie and estates of Parliament has dispensed, and be thir presents dispenses for ever."

grants, and also by Parliament; and, in particular, by a charter of King James II., in the year 1453, and by * an- * 964 other charter of King James III., in the year 1472; but chiefly by what has been called the foundation charter or new erection, granted in the year 1577 by King James VI., enlarging and confirming the powers and privileges previously conferred; which charter was afterwards confirmed by the King, and ratified by Parliament in the year 1587.

By these grants this university was empowered to erect professorships, and to grant degrees in all the arts and sciences; and, in particular, to grant the degree of doctor or master in all such arts and sciences as should be taught at the university, to such students and others as, after due examination, should be found worthy of this honour. In some of the grants, the power and privileges conferred upon this university are declared to be the same with those enjoyed by the most ancient and famous universities of Europe; and reference is particularly made to the Universities of Bologna and Paris.

By virtue of these grants, the University of Glasgow has been accustomed to confer degrees in all arts and sciences upon those who, after due examination, have been found qualified to teach or practise those arts or sciences.

Since the foundation and endowment of a professorship of surgery in the year 1817, the University of Glasgow, following the example of the Universities of Paris, Montpellier, Strasbourg, and other foreign universities, after whose model it was formed, has thought it expedient to grant to proficient in surgery degrees or diplomas in that department. These degrees are granted after a rigid examination, and only on production of certificates of the attendance of the candidate for two courses at the class of anatomy, two courses of surgery, one of chemistry, one * of the institutions of medicine, one of mate- * 965 ria medica, and an attendance of twelve months at a regular hospital or infirmary.

The charter granted by King James VI. to "Mr. Peter Law, the king's surgeon, and Mr. Robert Hamilton, professor of medicine, and their successors," was made long after the establishment of the university, and therefore could not interfere with its vested rights to confer degrees in all such arts or sciences as should be taught at the university.

In answer, therefore, to the reasons of suspension, the defenders (the respondents) pleaded —

“ 1. That the suspenders have shown no evidence of being entitled to prosecute as a corporation; and their title, accordingly, to sue as a body corporate, or to sue in the name of their president and visitor, is denied.

“ 2. That the suspenders are not the successors of Peter Low and Robert Hamilton, mentioned in the original grant.

“ 3. That even if they were, they are not entitled to require that any person who possesses the testimonial of a ‘ famous university where medicine is taught,’ shall submit to any examination of his qualifications before them; the grant founded on expressly recognizing the privileges of the universities, and exempting all those who possess the testimonial of any university where medicine is taught from the examination otherwise required, and authorizing such persons to practise medicine without restraint.

“ 4. That the respondents possess testimonials or diplomas from the University of Glasgow, as masters in surgery; and that these testimonials are granted under the hands of the professor of medicine, and of the other professors.

* 966 * “ 5. That, in terms of the grant founded on by the suspenders, no fees or perquisites of any kind are authorized to be levied for the examinations thereby prescribed; nor is any interdict or other prohibition thereby authorized; though a certain pecuniary penalty may be levied from those who fail to appear for examination, after being regularly cited. The grant, therefore, does not authorize the claims made by the suspenders.”

The suspenders alleged that until the year 1816 the university had never conferred the degree of chirurgiæ magister, and that it had no authority by so doing to exempt any persons receiving such degree from the jurisdiction of the faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow. The persons representing the university, therefore, filed a bill of declarator against the persons representing the faculty of physicians and surgeons, and demanded that their rights should be distinctly declared by the Court of Session. The causes were heard by the Lord Ordinary (Forbes, Lord MEDWYN), and were by him referred to the Judges of the second division of the Court of Session, who directed cases to be laid before the Lords of the first division, and the Lord Ordinary, for their opinions. The majority of the consulted Judges, Lord MONCRIEFF being the only dissentient, gave opinions to this effect: that the faculty of physicians and surgeons was a corporation; that by virtue of the charter of 1599, ratified in Parliament in 1672, it had power to debar, within the limits mentioned, from the practice of surgery, persons not examined and certificated by that body ; that the degree of doctor of physic from a university where medicine was taught, or a testimonial of skill in surgery, from a university where surgery was taught, would not entitle the person receiving either of them * to practise * 967 within the bounds of the faculty, except by license from the faculty. The Lords of the second division gave judgment for the faculty in the bill of suspension and interdict, and in the bill of declarator.

The Attorney-General and Sir W. Follett, for the appellants. — The faculty of surgeons constituted by the letter of gift, 1599, is not a corporation ; there are no words in that letter expressly giving it that character, nor any thing required to be done by it which renders incorporation absolutely necessary. It is necessary that such an intention to incorporate should be manifested before any incorporation can take place. The Conservators of the Tone v. Ash. (a) The cases of The College of Physicians v. Levett, (b) and The Same v. West, (c) relied on by the other side, are not in point ; for both were decided on the particular words of the charter granted to the college, and confirmed by statute, and cannot therefore govern the decision of any other case where the terms of the charter are different. Here the words are nothing like those used in the charter of the London College ; and though the powers now claimed under them may have been repeatedly exercised, they cannot be supported if they never had a legal origin. Use alone, even constant and daily use, cannot legalize powers which were not lawful in their origin. The powers now claimed by the appellants were not lawful in their origin : the use of them therefore cannot make them valid. The thing prohibited by the charter is prohibited under a penalty ; it is therefore merely a thing which is a * malum prohibitum, and not * 968 a thing malum in se, and consequently it cannot be made the subject of a penalty and at the same time constitute the foundation of a proceeding like the present. The confirming statute of 1672 must be considered but as a private Act ; and Bankton (d) says that in such cases private Acts must be treated as nothing but grants from the Crown. Now it is clear that the Crown could not, either by the law of Scotland or England, for the principle of the law is the same in both countries, grant what is contained in this charter, namely, to make laws anent the said arts, not only in Glasgow, or with respect to persons within the body of the corporation, but throughout the realm of Scotland. The charter here gives what it is clearly beyond the powers of the Crown to give, and is therefore void. The right of the university to grant degrees in medicine existed long before this body, calling itself the faculty, was created. It is not disputed that the university may confer the degree of physician without any intervention from the faculty; it is equally clear that it can confer the degree of surgeon. Both are but degrees in medicine; and the skill of the practitioner being thus secured, the faculty has no right to interfere with his practice. The object of the charter was not to institute a body to control but to assist the university; and where the university has granted the degree, the practitioner is free from further examination.

This case must be decided entirely by the law of Scotland.

* 969 If so, then it is clear that the * judgment must be affirmed.

The university did not till very recently confer degrees in surgery. At the time the charter to the faculty was granted, the university only conferred degrees in medicine, which do not, and never did, include surgery. The case of a surgeon's fitness was therefore unprovided for when this charter to the faculty was granted, and the charter was intended to supply the deficiency. There is, therefore, no contest between the prescriptive rights of the university and the faculty, except so far as the former body has now unwisely raised a contest between them. The Scotch and English laws, as to corporations, materially differ from each other; and by-laws, which might be questionable here, would certainly be good in Scotland. But even the English cases show that where certain powers are vested in A., B. and C. and their successors, a corporation is created, though no express words of creation are used in the deed, and the ordinary powers of a corporation are inherent in such a body. The case of The Conservators of the Tone, (a) already cited, is a direct authority for that proposition. The two cases already cited (b) relating to the

(b) The College of Physicians v. Levett, 1 Lord Raym. 672; Same v. West, 10 Mod. 353.

London College of Surgeons, are also in point. So that, on the English cases alone, the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed. But the Scotch cases are still stronger for the respondents; and in the case of The Faculty v. Steel, in 1815, the Court of Session decided these very questions, that the faculty was a corporation, and that it might sue in the Court of Session; and by the Scotch law it may do so, though it has at the same time the power to impose a penalty. The Scotch * Judges * 970 have no doubt that the faculty is a corporation, and the only difficulty felt by Lord MONCRIEFF was as to a possible conflict of rights between the two bodies; but it has been shown that in reality no such conflict can exist, for the grant to the faculty was to provide for something which had been left unprovided for by the powers or by the practice of the university.

The Attorney-General replied:

August 7, 1840.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. — The question in this case is whether a person who has obtained the degree of doctor in the University of Glasgow is entitled to practise within the bounds of the charter of corporation granted to the faculty of physicians and surgeons of that city, without previously undergoing an examination and being licensed by the latter body. It appears that the University of Glasgow has but recently granted degrees in surgery, although it had long granted them in physic. The title of the corporation, which claims the right of licensing persons to practise within certain limits, rests on a charter given by James VI., and dated on the 29th November, 1599, and it is in these words: [His Lordship here read the words of the charter.] The question between the parties turns on the expressions contained in these letters-patent, and on what has taken place since. These letters-patent of the Crown give to the grantees and “their successors,” the right of calling before them all persons “professing or using the art of surgery, and to examine them upon their literature, knowledge, and practice;” and if they were found worthy, to admit them, and to give them testimonials according to their art and knowledge; and in case of * con- * 971 tumacy to fine them. Under these circumstances, the question to be discussed is, whether this gives to the respondents authority to act as a corporation of surgeons to exercise a jurisdiction over those who practise surgery; it being contended on behalf of the appellants, that the right to practise surgery was included in and formed part of the practice of medicine, and consequently that this grant could only extend to give the respondents the right to call before them and examine those who were practising without any authority whatever, but could not give them the right to examine those who had already received degrees from the university. Now, as it seems to me, the distinction between the two things, medicine and surgery, is carefully guarded against in this charter: there is a distinct declaration that a person shall not practise surgery without a license from the faculty, but the person who practises medicine may do so, provided he obtains a degree from a university where medicine is taught, or provided he obtains the testimonials of capacity from the Queen's physicians. But the question of the validity of the claim does not rest on this charter alone; for it appears by a Scotch Act of Parliament, passed in 1672, that all its provisions were fully confirmed. [His Lordship read the provisions of confirmation contained in the Act. (a)] But the right does not even rest on this ratification; for, in 1691, questions as to the constitution of this corporation, and the extent of its rights, were formally decided by the Court of Session; which, by a declarator of that date, affirmed that the surgeons of Glasgow had the power to examine persons in surgery, and either

* 972 to admit or reject them, as they might * be found fit or unfit for the profession. I shall not occupy your Lordships' time in detailing the various suits which have since been instituted on this subject, on that order of the Court of Session, but shall merely state the names of the cases, and the year in which they took place; and from them it appears that there has been a repeated exercise of the privilege now claimed, and that in these several suits the right to the exercise of the privilege has been duly acknowledged. The Calder Case occurred in 1762; the Dunlop Case in 1791; and the case of Steele in 1815, which has been cited as directly in point to this suit. What was the form of the action, and what was the interlocutor pronounced in that case? It was an action by the president and visitor of the faculty, in their corporate character, against persons practising without a license from the corporation; and the defence set up for the several persons concerned was, first, a denial of the corporate character of the faculty, and secondly, the fact that the defenders had all obtained the degree of doctor of medicine in a university, and that that included a right to practise surgery. The judgment of the Lord Ordinary, on both points, was in favour of the faculty, and that judgment was adhered to by the Court of Session. That being the state of the decisions, the present contest has arisen, and the Judges of the division of the Court of Session, before whom the case was brought, have consulted the other Judges upon it, and it appears that there were six of the Judges, who stated their opinions to be in favour of the rights of the corporation, while another Judge, Lord MEDWYN, did not wholly concur, and he wrote a separate note of his opinion; and another high authority, Lord MONCRIEFF, did not doubt the title of the corporation, but his opinion in favour * of * 973 these appellants was founded, not on the terms of the grant from the Crown, but on the relative constitution of the rights of the University of Glasgow and of this corporation: the university being of a more ancient date, and having the power to grant degrees in medicine, he thought that the grant to the faculty did not interfere with the privileges of the university. But the University of Glasgow, though it granted and has from ancient times granted medical degrees, did not confer any in surgery, and the power to confer them is an exception to its general authority, and is expressly conceded to the faculty by the terms of the deed of gift.

Those who practise medicine may take their degrees at this or at some other university; but with respect to surgery, it is the exclusive privilege of the corporation of the faculty to grant degrees in surgery for persons practising within the bounds of the city of Glasgow, and the faculty has ever since its institution exercised that privilege. If, therefore, there had been any conflict of authority between these two bodies, the length of time during which the one has exercised and the other has abstained from exercising the right of conferring these surgical degrees, would alone be sufficient to enable your Lordships to come to a conclusion on the question. The opinion of the majority, of the great majority, of the Judges was decidedly this way, and, as it seems to me, was perfectly well founded.

When this case was before your Lordships in 1835, it ended in a remit to the Court of Session for the purpose of ascertaining two points, and two only: namely, first, whether this was a legally constituted corporation; and secondly, whether, as it had the power of imposing a penalty on those who contra-

* 974 vened *its regulations, that power would supersede the right which the corporation would otherwise have of applying to the Court of Session to protect it in the exercise of its authority. This remit produced the learned opinion of the Judges, of which we have now the benefit; they came to the unanimous conclusion that this was a legal corporation according to the law of Scotland, and that the power possessed by the corporation of imposing a penalty did not bar its right of appealing to the Court of Session for an interdict under circumstances of this sort. It does not appear to what, if to any extent, the opinion of the House was formed on the other parts of the case. It may be assumed that the declarator was, by the decree of the House, limited to these two points. If it is to be taken as the opinion of the House already expressed that this is a corporation, and that its power of imposing a penalty does not bar its right of applying to the Court, that opinion is one in which I entirely concur.

There cannot be a doubt that if this body is a corporation, the time during which it has claimed to exercise these rights, the frequency of their exercise, and the declarator of the Court of Session in 1692, that it was entitled to exercise them, have sufficiently concluded the question. The right of the corporation has been asserted at different periods, and always with success; so that, in my opinion, your Lordships can have no difficulty in declaring that the evidence before you is sufficient to establish the rights which the respondents claim.

There are, however, peculiarities in this corporation which, speaking as an English lawyer, I feel might oppose obstacles to my coming to a decision on the case, but here we have
 * 975 the clear opinion of the Scotch *Judges on the question of Scotch law, as applicable to this corporation. There are many instances in which the same objections might be urged against other Scotch corporations, but they are not sufficient to invalidate the grant to this corporation. As your Lordships have now the highest possible authority that this case is free from being affected by the objections which have been suggested against it when it was on a previous occasion at your bar, and that the corporation is entitled to all the privilege which it claims, I think your Lordships can have no hesitation in affirming the decree of the Court below.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Lords, my noble and learned friend

has fully stated to you the grounds on which the remit took place in the present case. When it was before the House on the previous occasion, I had certain doubts as to the extent of the powers of these Scotch corporations. Those doubts were shared in by my noble and learned friend, Lord DENMAN. It is necessary to say this, because by some extraordinary omission the presence of Lord DENMAN is not stated in Shaw & Maclean's (a) report of the former proceedings. My noble and learned friend at that time felt another difficulty, which is now removed by the statement made by the Judges: and that doubt related to the power of the faculty to make by-laws. The by-laws made by this corporation do not answer that description, according to our notions of such things. They are not binding alone on persons infra the body of the corporation, but have effect over the whole body of the subjects of the King in Scotland; and that was * one of the objections taken to the laws at your Lord- * 976 ship's bar. But it seems, by the law of Scotland, that these by-laws are held to be valid, though they would seem to us the reverse of by-laws. Some such a power as this is enjoyed by other corporations, but they are deficient in the means of exercising it. Another doubt we felt was, whether the Crown had the power to grant such an exclusive corporation; but the opinions of the Scotch Judges have likewise got rid of this difficulty. On the whole, I am of opinion that we can do nothing but affirm the judgment of the Court below; and as that Court has not exceeded the power given it in part of the order, I should move that the judgment be affirmed, with costs.

Judgment affirmed accordingly.

ROBERT JACKSON, ELIZABETH MAUNSELL, and MARIA } Respondents.
MAUNSELL }

Power of Appointment. Inquiry directed as to its due Execution.

A person being by his marriage settlement tenant for life of an estate in Ireland, held on lease for lives renewable for ever, with power of appointment to one or more of the children of the marriage,—the estate in default of appointment to go to the first and other sons successively in tail male,—by deed-poll, dated the 14th of January, 1804, appointed to his eldest son an estate in tail male; and by indenture of lease, executed four days after, the father and son, in consideration of 1600*l.* to be applied in paying debts on the estate, and renewal fines then due, demised part of it for lives. By a deed dated December, 1807, the son, in consideration of debts paid for him by the father, and in discharge of the trust and confidence reposed in him, conveyed the estate and all his interest therein to the father and his heirs. The father, by his will made after the death of the eldest son without issue, devised the estate—charged thereby with certain legacies—to the use of his two surviving sons and their respective issue, in equal portions, as tenants in common.

Held, by the Lords (reversing a decree which established the will), that the execution of the lease for 1600*l.* by the father and son so soon after the deed of appointment, and the circumstances appearing on those deeds and on the deed of reconveyance of 1807, raised such suspicions of the validity of the appointment as required the Court, before it could adjudicate on the father's title to dispose of the estate, to direct an inquiry whether that appointment was a bonâ fide execution of the power.

The House, in remitting a cause for inquiry on a main question, will, to save delay and expense, direct inquiries on other questions consequential on the probable finding on the main question.

June 4. August 11.

By indenture of settlement, dated the 22d of June, 1780, executed upon the marriage of William Marcus Jackson with Jane Devereux (the late father and mother of the appellant and first-named respondent), after reciting (amongst other things) that

William Jackson (their grandfather) was seised of and * 978 entitled * to two several freehold interests, one in the lands of Moylish, and the other in the lands of Clonlara, both in the liberties of the city of Limerick, by virtue of two several leases for lives thereof respectively, with covenants for perpetual renewal; it was witnessed, that in consideration of the marriage, and for the other considerations therein mentioned, W. Jackson conveyed unto William Holland and Edward Jones, and their heirs and assigns, the said lands of Moylish and Clonlara with their appurtenances, to hold the same during the lives in the said several leases named, and the lives of such other persons as should thereafter be added pursuant to the said covenants for renewal, to the use of the said W. M. Jackson and his assigns during his life, and after his decease (charged with a jointure for the said Jane) to the use of all and every or such one or more of the children of the marriage, for such estate and estates, not exceeding an estate or estates in tail male, and in such shares and proportions, with or without power of revocation, as the said W. M. Jackson, by any deed or writing under his hand and seal attested by two or more witnesses, or by his last will in writing, published and declared in the presence of three or more witnesses, should direct or appoint the same; and in default of such direction and appointment, or in case any such should be made, when and so soon as the estates and interests thereby limited should respectively end and determine; and as to such part or parts of the premises whereof no such direction or appointment should be made, to the use of the first son of the said W. M. Jackson by the said Jane, and of the heirs male of the body of such first son; with remainder to the use of the second and all and every other son and sons of the said W. M. Jackson

* by the said Jane, severally and successively in tail male; * 979 with several remainders over.

There was issue of the marriage four sons, namely, William Devereux Jackson (since deceased), the eldest; George (the appellant), the second; the respondent Robert, the third; and Thomas (since deceased), the fourth son; and no other issue. William Devereux, the eldest, attained his age of twenty-one years in January, 1804.

W. M. Jackson executed a deed-poll, dated the 14th of January, 1804, whereby, after referring to the indenture of the 22d of June, 1780, he, by virtue of the power thereby given to him, appointed, without power of revocation, the said lands of Moylish to W. D. Jackson, and to the heirs male of his body.

By an indenture of lease dated the 18th of January, 1804, the father and son, in consideration of 1600*l.*, demised unto Nicholas Mahon, his heirs and assigns, part of the land of Moylish, for the lives of the several persons therein named, and the survivor of them, and for the lives and life of such other person or persons as should for ever thereafter be added to that demise pursuant to a covenant for perpetual renewal therein contained. And it was by this indenture agreed that so much of the 1600*l.* as should be sufficient should be laid out, first towards paying off all debts affecting the estate of W. M. Jackson; secondly, towards defraying the costs of renewing the leases for lives which he held of the lands of Moylish from the Earl of Shelburne with covenant for perpetual renewal, and out of which the interest demised by this indenture was derived, and paying such renewal fines as were then due from him to the Earl of Shelburne on his adding lives in the place of such as had not been supplied;

* 980 so as to enable W. M. Jackson and W. D. * Jackson, their heirs and assigns, to grant to N. Mahon, his heirs and assigns, the estate and interest so intended to be demised to him. And N. Mahon covenanted with W. M. Jackson, his heirs and assigns, that he, Mahon, would at all times thereafter advance and pay all such money as should be necessary to procure renewals from the Earl of Shelburne; it being the intent and meaning of the parties that the fines so thereafter to be paid to the said earl, his heirs and assigns, should at all times be paid by Mahon, his heirs and assigns, and no part thereof by W. M. Jackson and W. D. Jackson, their heirs and assigns.

By an indenture dated the 12th of April, 1806, W. M. Jackson, by virtue of the indenture of settlement of the 23d of June, 1780, appointed the lands of Clonlara to his said son, W. D. Jackson, and to the heirs male of his body, subject to his own life-estate; and by this indenture they barred all entails of W. D. Jackson in those lands; and by two indentures of lease of the same date, W. M. Jackson and W. D. Jackson, in consideration of certain sums of money demised unto John and Samuel Young several parts of the lands of Clonlara for the lives of the persons therein respectively named, and for the respective terms of thirty-one years from the decease of the survivor of them respectively, at reduced rents.

By an indenture, dated the 11th of December, 1807, after reciting the deed-poll of the 14th of January, 1804, the settlement of the 22d June, 1780, and the indenture of appointment of the 12th April, 1806, and that it had been found convenient by W. M. Jackson and W. D. Jackson, not only for the purpose of family settlements, but under certain agreements for leases of the lands of Moylish and Clonlara entered into and since concluded by them to certain * of the tenants of the said * 981 lands, who, for greater safety, were advised that the entails in the said several lands should be barred by means of the aforesaid deeds, and also for the purpose of enabling W. M. Jackson to pay off several debts and engagements incurred by W. D. Jackson: it was witnessed that W. D. Jackson, in consideration of the several debts by W. M. Jackson for him paid, and of 5s., and in discharge of the trusts and confidence reposed in him by W. M. Jackson, conveyed and assured unto W. M. Jackson, and his heirs and assigns, all the said lands of Moylish and Clonlara, with the appurtenances, and all the right, title, and interest of him, W. D. Jackson, therein or thereto respectively.

W. D. Jackson died in 1815, intestate and unmarried, and without issue; whereupon the appellant became the eldest son of W. M. Jackson.

W. M. Jackson sold the lands of Clonlara in 1819 (the appellant, then his eldest son, joining in the conveyance); and by his will, dated the 20th of October, 1821, and attested by three witnesses, he gave and devised all his estate and interest in the lands of Moylish to the said Jane his wife, and to Edward Gloster, therein described, in trust that his said wife should receive during her life an annuity of 50*l.* (in addition to her jointure), to be paid out of that part of Moylish tenanted by N. Mahon; and upon further trust that the trustees should, after payment of that annuity, yearly receive out of Moylish 100*l.*, and place the same out at interest, until the sum of 550*l.* should be made up, to be applied in the manner herein after mentioned; and that when that sum should be made up, the testator declared that the said sum of 100*l.* should go to increase the jointure of his wife, and should be paid to her at the same times as * the said * 982 sum of 50*l.* a year was therein before made payable. And as to the residue of the rents of the lands of Moylish after the said sums of 50*l.* and 100*l.* annually, in trust to pay the same to the appellant during the life of the testator's wife; but on her death, and on the sum of 550*l.* being raised out of the rents of the said lands of Moylish as aforesaid, the testator declared that the said Edward Gloster, his heirs and assigns, should stand seised of the lands of Moylish to the use of testator's sons, the appellant and the respondent R. Jackson, during their natural lives respectively, to be held by them in equal portions as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, with remainder to their legitimate issue, in such manner and form, shares and proportions, as the appellant and respondent should by deed or will direct or appoint; and on failure of legitimate issue of either of his said sons, the testator devised the share of him so dying without legitimate issue, to the other of them, his heirs and assigns for ever. And as to the said sum of 550*l.*, when the same should be raised out of the rents of Moylish, and as to a sum of 450*l.* which the testator stated the said Edward Gloster owed him, he gave and bequeathed these two sums, making together 1000*l.*, to his granddaughters, the respondents, Elizabeth and Maria Maunsell, share and share alike, to be paid to them at their respective ages of twenty-one years or days of marriage, provided such marriage should take place with the consent therein mentioned; the interest to be paid to his said wife, and applied as she should please towards their education and maintenance, in the mean time. And the testator expressly devised the said sum of 1000*l.* to his said granddaughters in full discharge of any sum or sums of money claimed to be due by him to their father; and

* 983 * he declared that, should their father not deliver up any bonds, notes, or other securities, that he might have, cancelled, to his the testator's executors, or should he demand any of the said sums of money, or any part thereof, then the testator devised the said sum of 1000*l.* to his residuary legatee. And as to all the residue of the testator's real, freehold, and personal estate and property of every kind and nature whatsoever, which he should die seised and possessed of, or in any manner entitled to, and not therein before disposed of, he devised and bequeathed such residue to his said wife, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as his residuary legatee.

W. M. Jackson executed another will on the 29th of October, 1822, which purported to revoke all former wills, but contained no devise of the lands of Moylish, nor was it executed in the presence of three witnesses. He died in November, 1822, and his wife died in 1833, leaving the appellant and respondent their only surviving children.

In January, 1836, the respondent R. Jackson filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the appellant and the respondents, Elizabeth and Maria Maunsell, stating (amongst other things) the several matters herein before mentioned, and praying that the said will of the 20th of October, 1821, might be declared well proved, and that the same might be established and the trusts thereof carried into execution; and that the respondent R. Jackson might be declared to be entitled to an estate in quasi tail, in one moiety of the lands of Moylish, under the said will, and might be put into possession thereof accordingly; and that an account might be taken of the rents and profits received by the appellant out of the * said lands since the * 984 death of Jane Jackson, and that the said respondent might be declared entitled to one moiety thereof, and that the appellant might be decreed to pay the same; or if the Court should be of opinion that the deeds of the 14th of January, 1804, and the 11th of December, 1807, were void, then that the said will might be deemed and taken to be a valid execution of the power of appointment contained in the deed of the 22d of June, 1780, and that the respondent's rights might be declared thereunder.

The appellant, in his answer to the bill, relied upon several grounds of defence; and amongst others, insisted that the deed of appointment of the 14th of January, 1804, was not made in bonâ fide execution of the power given by the marriage settlement of 1780, but was made to enable W. M. Jackson to derive benefit therefrom to himself, and also to enable him to have executed the several leases before mentioned, on which he received fines, and that the said deed was, for those reasons, fraudulent and void in equity; and that the deed of 1807 was executed in consideration of a corrupt agreement between W. M. Jackson and W. D. Jackson; and that in the event of the said deeds being declared void, the will of W. M. Jackson was not a good and valid execution of the power of appointment given him by the deed of 1780; and the said deed of appointment of 1804, though invalid as an appointment, yet was effectual to bar the right of W. M. Jackson to execute any further appointment of the lands of Moylish by deed or otherwise; and that the instrument executed by him in October, 1822, though not executed so as to pass freehold estates, and though it might not be good as a revocation of the former will, yet afforded evidence that he was then conscious that the said deeds of 1804 and 1807 were liable to be impeached, and that he, therefore, designedly * omitted to * 985 make any mention of the said lands in the will of 1822.

The other defendants having respectively put in their answers to the bill, and the cause being at issue, witnesses were examined. (a)

The cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, on the 3d of May, 1838, when, amongst other evidence offered to the Court on behalf of the appellant, there was offered a decree of dismissal in a former cause of Jane Jackson against the appellant and others; and the respondent's counsel having objected to the same being read, the Court was pleased to reject it; and there having been also offered in evidence the attested copy of the will of the 29th of October, 1822, the Court was pleased to reject the same as evidence; and it was then decreed by his Lordship that the will of the said testator of the 20th of October, 1821, should be declared well proved, and that the trusts thereof should be carried into execution; and that the respondent R. Jackson should be declared entitled thereunder to an estate quasi in tail in one moiety of the lands of Moylish, from the decease of the said Jane Jackson, and that an injunction should forthwith issue to put that respondent in possession of such moiety accordingly; and that the respondents Elizabeth and Maria Maunsell should be entitled to the legacy of 550*l.* bequeathed by the said will, and that the same was payable out of the rents and profits of the whole of the said lands of Moylish, received since the death of the testator; and it was referred to the Master to take an account of the rents of the said lands of Moylish received by the appellant, or which without wilful default might have been received by him, as well from * 986 the decease of the * testator as since the decease of Jane

Jackson. And it was further ordered that the respondents Elizabeth and Maria Maunsell should be entitled to be paid by the appellant the sum due to them on foot of the said legacy, if the amount thereof received, or which without wilful default might have been received by the appellant during the life of Jane Jackson, should appear to have been sufficient for that purpose; and that an account should be taken of the sum due on foot of the said legacy; and that the respondent should be entitled to a moiety of such sum as should have been so received, or which without wilful default might have been received by the appellant since the death of Jane Jackson.

(a) They only stated that W. M. Jackson had been in want of money from 1802 to 1810.

The appellant appealed as well against the order rejecting the evidence as against the decree.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wakefield (with whom was Mr. Hardey, of the Irish Bar), for the appellant. — The deeds of appointment of the 14th of January, 1804, and of the 12th of April, 1806, were executed by William Marcus Jackson in fraud of the power of appointment reserved to him by the indenture of settlement of 1780, and upon a previous secret trust or agreement with his son, William Devereux Jackson, that such appointment was to be for the benefit of the father. Consequently such deeds of appointment, founded on such corrupt agreement, are void in equity; and as the deed of the 11th December, 1807, was executed by W. D. Jackson in pursuance of such secret trust or agreement, that deed also is void in equity; yet the decree substantiated those deeds. The will of William Marcus Jackson of the 20th of October, 1821, was intended by him to operate as a devise of the interest in the lands of Moylish, which he had fraudulently * acquired under the appointment of * 987 1804 and the conveyance of 1807, and was not meant or intended by him to operate as an appointment under the power contained in the settlement of 1780, to which this will made no reference. The testator had no right to dispose of the lands which he had so fraudulently acquired. If the will was intended to take effect, and could take effect, as an appointment under the power contained in the settlement, yet the devises and bequests contained in the will in favour of the testator's wife, and of the respondents Elizabeth and Maria Maunsell, were not authorized by such power, and consequently were void.

The bill only prayed an account of the rents and profits of the lands of Moylish from the decease of Jane Jackson; but it is directed by the decree that an account should be taken of the rents and profits of those lands, received by the appellant, or which without wilful default might have been received by him, from the decease of William Marcus Jackson. That part of the decree is clearly erroneous.

[To show that leases of lives renewable for ever, in Ireland, are in the nature of perpetuities, out of which various estates are carved for family settlements, and that they are governed by the same rules that govern estates in fee-simple in England, they cited Boyle v. Lysaght, 1 Ridgway P. C. 384; Burnell v. Lord

although his title did not accrue till the death of the mother. Now, the only ground upon which that can be explained is, that the will directed a sum of 100*l.* a year to accumulate until 550*l.* should be realized; that sum, when realized, to go to make up a sum of 1000*l.* left to certain grandchildren of the testator. I presume, although it is very indistinctly stated upon the pleadings and in the decree, that the object of that part of the decree was to relieve the estate of the plaintiff from that burden, or any portion of the 550*l.* If that was the object of the decree, it is not in the shape and form in which it ought to be to carry out that object; because, if it was only for the purpose of relieving the estate of the plaintiff from that burden of 550*l.*, or any

* 991 portion of it, the first inquiry would * have been, what portion of that 550*l.* remained unpaid, and whether the income received by the defendant (always supposing the decree to be right upon the merits) between the interval of the death of the father and the death of the mother, had or had not been sufficient for the purpose of meeting and providing for that charge? Because, if that charge had been provided for, and it had been ascertained that a sufficient amount of rent had been received for that purpose; if, for instance, the rents had amounted to ten times that sum, the mere fact of the defendant having received property equal to that sum would not have been a sufficient ground for the decree. That, however, I refer to only incidentally, because it does not appear to me a matter which can justify the shape which the decree has assumed.

But on the merits of the case, I think the decree cannot be supported in its present form. The decree assumes that all these objections to the title of the father are of no avail. It decrees at once, upon the state of information then before the Courts, that all these transactions and appointments were valid, and that the father had by means of the appointment, and the title he got from the son, in whose favour the appointment was made, a valid title; and therefore decrees in favour of the plaintiff claiming under the will.

Now, without expressing any final opinion (because I do not think the case is as yet ripe for it) as to the effect of all these transactions, it is quite obvious that there is ample ground for suspicion. In the first place, these two deeds coming together, almost at the same moment; the appointment in favour of the son, and the deed by which 1600*l.* was raised by fine upon that very estate, to be applied in satisfying the debts which were charged on the estate, which were the * debts of the * 992 father, would of itself raise a strong suspicion that it was not an appointment by the father, honestly and fairly exercising the power which the settlement gave him, but that he was influenced in making the appointment by the benefit which he expected and contracted to receive for himself. But the deed of 1807 makes the case much stronger, because we there find the son restoring the estate to the father. It is true that that deed stated the father to have paid various debts of the son. That may or may not be true. It may be that the object of all this was to raise money to pay the son's debts; it may be that there was no intention to commit any fraud by this appointment; but whether the recital was true or not the Court has no means of judging; for there is no evidence in the cause, there is nothing before the Court to enable it to form any opinion as to the validity of these transactions, but what appears upon the face of the instruments themselves.

Under these circumstances, we are left entirely in the dark whether any title was obtained independently of this appointment; for it appears that the son was tenant in tail under the appointment. One argument was, that, supposing the appointment were entirely out of the question, the father and the son together had, by means of the estate, independently of the appointment, the means of procuring an absolute dominion over the property. But under what circumstances all these transactions took place is without any proof, except so far as they are stated in those deeds to which I have referred. Therefore, under these circumstances, and with the facts appearing upon these deeds, I think it was too much for the Court to assume that the title of the father was good, and therefore that, as it respected the parties claiming under the will, it was property of which the father had an absolute * power of disposing. * 993 I am equally of opinion that it is not a case in which it is competent to the Court to come to any determination in favour of the defendant, but that the defendant has merely thrown suspicion upon the title of the plaintiff by that which appeared upon the deeds produced. It might be that the statement in the deed of 1807 would be established; namely, that the whole object of this was to pay the debts of the father. Whether it was or not does not appear; but this ought not to be left to conjecture, but the facts ought to be ascertained before the Court proceeds to act upon the deed. I apprehend the duty of a Court of Equity to be, when it finds itself in a situation not to be able either to decide in favour of the plaintiff or in favour of the defendant, and so to adjudicate as to the title, to enter into a course of investigation by which the real facts of the case may be ascertained, before it comes to any final adjudication upon the merits. What I propose, therefore, to your Lordships is to reverse this decree, and to declare that, before any adjudication upon the plaintiff's title under the will, there should be an inquiry before the Master what title the testator had at the time of his death in the lands of Moylish, and how the same was derived; and particularly whether the appointment of those lands in favour of the son, William Devereux Jackson, was a good and valid appointment; with liberty to state special circumstances: and in order to avoid the expense and delay of another reference at a future stage of the cause, I would propose that there should be an inquiry whether the 550*l.*, or any and what part thereof, is or was due at the time of the death of the testator; and what is now due in respect thereof, and whether the rents received by George

* 994 Jackson during the lifetime * of Jane, the widow, were sufficient to pay the same. These inquiries, it is true, would not arise until the question of title had been decided; but I think it would be expedient, in order to save time, that the Master should at the same time pursue that inquiry.

Mr. Wakefield. — Will your Lordships allow me to remind you that the decree directed an injunction which put the respondent into possession of one moiety of the lands? and I believe that has been carried into effect.

LORD CHANCELLOR. — We cannot interfere with that; that rests with the Court of Chancery; we set aside the decree so far as it is appealed from.

[It was then ordered and adjudged that the said decree be reversed; but it was declared that, before any adjudication upon the plaintiff's title under the will, there should be an inquiry before the Master what title the testator had at the time of his death in the lands of Moylish, and how the same was derived; and particularly whether the appointment of those lands in favour of the son, William Devereux Jackson, was a good and valid appointment; with liberty to state special circumstances: and further, that there should be an inquiry before the Master whether the 550*l.*, or any and what part thereof, is or was due at the time of the death of the testator, and what is now due in respect thereof, and whether the rents received by the said George Jackson, during the lifetime of Jane, the widow, were sufficient to pay the same. And with this declaration, it was further ordered that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this declaration.]

APPEAL. See COSTS. JURISDICTION, 2. PRACTICE, 2.

1. An order, on an application for suspension and interdict, is subject to appeal to the House of Lords, within the 48 Geo. 3, c. 151. — Fleming v. Dunlop, 43.

2. Orders made by the Lord Chancellor, by virtue of the 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, and the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, in the matter of charitable estates and funds, are subject to an appeal to this House. — Bignold v. Springfield, 71.

Quære, whether such orders, if made under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, alone, are subject to such appeal. — Id. ibid.

3. Partners in a licensed distillery, convicted of a breach of the revenue laws, consented to a mitigated penalty; after payment of which, one of them brought an action against the others for indemnity, on the ground that he was innocent of their illicit acts. The defenders pleaded in defence that, as all were involved in the delict, no one could claim indemnity or contribution from the others. The Court gave no judgment on that defence, but sent the cause to trial by a jury; the Judge's opinion was not taken on it at the trial, nor were exceptions tendered. The jury found a verdict that the defenders were indebted to the pursuer for the sum paid by him towards the penalty. The Court being afterwards moved, upon notice "for a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted," refused "a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside," and subsequently made orders applying the verdict, and decreeing against the defenders for payment by them jointly and severally, to the pursuer, of "the sum found by the verdict, with interest, as libelled."

* Held, that the order refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial was not, but that the orders applying the verdict were, subject to appeal to the House of Lords. — Campbell v. Campbell, 166.

An order made by the Court of Exchequer, on a report from the remembrancer, pursuant to a reference to him in the matter of an extent, no bill being filed, is not the subject-matter of an appeal to the House of Lords. — Wall v. The Attorney-General, 81, n.

An order of the Court of Chancery on an award, made between parties, upon a submission to a reference which was made a rule of Court, according to Act of Parliament (10 Will. 3, c. 14), no bill being filed, is not subject-matter of appeal to the House of Lords. — O'Sullivan v. Hutchins, 85, n.

A decree made by the Lord Chancellor, upon appeal to him from a decree made by the Commissioners, by virtue of the Act 43 Eliz. c. 4, for Charitable Uses, is subject to appeal to the House of Lords. — Almsmen of Eastham v. Lady Kempe, 101, n.

An order of the Court of Chancery, setting aside a purchase made under a decree in a cause, may be brought under the review of the House of Lords by a purchaser, although not a party to the cause. — Bailey v. Maule, 121, n.

ATTORNEY.

It is to be assumed that legal advisers, in discharge of their duty to their client, will investigate suspicious transactions, and satisfy themselves, before giving their approval of such transactions, that it is for their client's benefit to confirm them. — Montmorency v. Devereux, 188.

An attorney, who was the ordinary attorney for a borrower, also acted in the matter of a particular loan for the lender, but did not make any charge against the lender for his services. The security he took was not sufficient.

Held, that he was properly charged as an attorney acting on the retainer and employment of the lender, and was in that character liable to an action for damages for the loss suffered through the insufficiency of the security. — Donaldson v. Haldane, 762.

* 997 * After the death of the lender, two of his sisters, by an arrangement with the rest of the family, who were the legatees of the lender, became possessed of the security, and applied to the attorney to do what was necessary. The means taken to secure the repayment of the loan, on this continuation of it, were insufficient.

Held, that as representing the interest of the deceased, and on their own account, the sisters were entitled to compensation from the attorney. — Id. ibid.

BANK.

A partnership consisting of more than six persons, carrying on the business of bankers in or within sixty-five miles of London, cannot, without violating the Acts of Parliament respecting the Bank of England, accept, in the course of such business, a bill of exchange payable at less than six months from the time of such acceptance.

Whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly, cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance.

A London Joint-stock Bank, consisting of more than six partners, entered into an agreement with a bank in Canada, that G. P., manager of the London Joint-stock Bank, but not a partner therein, should accept bills drawn on him by the Canada bank, payable at less than six months from the acceptance thereof; and that the London Joint-stock Bank would provide funds for the due payment of such bills; the money transactions arising thereupon being, in the accounts between the two banks, to be treated as transactions between the said banks. Held, by the Lords (affirming the judgment of the Master of the Rolls) :—

1. That the acceptance of such bills, in execution of such agreement, was unlawful, regard being had to the Acts in force respecting the Bank of England.
2. That such acceptances would not be lawful, even if the London Joint-stock Bank, at the time of the acceptances, had in hand funds on account of the bank in Canada equal to the amount of the bills so accepted.
3. That the acceptances of such bills would not be lawful if the London Joint-stock Bank had not, at the time of the acceptances, any funds in hand belonging to the bank in Canada, but the bills were accepted on the credit of a * contract by that bank to remit * 998 funds to meet such acceptances before the bills became payable.
4. That the Bank of England might maintain an action against the London Joint-stock Bank, founded on such transactions. — Booth v. The Bank of England, 509.

BOND.

1. The rule as to the liability of sureties in a bond is the same in Scotland as in England; namely, that they are not to be discharged from their obligations unless the contract between them and the obligees is varied by a positive contract between the obligees and the principal, without notice to the sureties. It is the duty of a surety to see that his principal does his. — Creighton v. Rankin, 325.
2. The bond given by a collector and his sureties to the commissioners of land and assessed taxes under the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, is broken if the taxes collected in any one year are not duly paid up by the collector to the account of that year.

The breach of the condition of the bond is equally complete, and the sureties are equally liable, though all the moneys collected in the year for which they are sureties should be in fact paid in, if any part of them should be appropriated by the collector, and received by the commissioners, in satisfaction of the arrears of a former year.

Such appropriation of part of the moneys of one year to the payment of the arrears of a former year, will not prevent the commissioners from maintaining an action on the bond against the sureties for the year in which the money collected has been so misappropriated.

The commissioners may come upon the sureties after they have sold the lands and goods of the collector, but the seizure and sale of his lands and goods is a condition precedent to their right of action against the sureties, and they are not entitled to require notice of such lands and goods in order to perform the condition. — Gwynne v. Burnell, 572.

1. Where a party is in the legal and undisputed possession of a municipal office, it is competent for him, by suspension and interdict, to protect his office against the unauthorized intrusion of a party who has no title to the office : but it does not put into office a party who has the abstract right to it. — Fleming v. Dunlop, 43.
2. A bill of suspension and interdict is an incompetent procedure to try and determine the merits of contested municipal elections. — Id. ibid.
Procedure by bill of suspension and interdict cannot be taken against a party in possession of an office, to question his right thereto, by a party who is not in possession ; nor can it apply to a case where neither party is in possession, nor to acts done anterior to the act of election ; nor can the right of election be decided by it. — Id. ibid.
3. An interlocutor, passing a bill of suspension, and granting interdict, is subject to appeal to the House of Lords, within the 48 Geo. 3, c. 151. — Id. ibid.
4. By Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, § 71, it is enacted that all the estate and interest of such bodies corporate, or members thereof, as were seised or possessed of any real or personal estate in trust for charitable uses, should, in respect of such uses and trusts, continue in the persons, who at the time of passing the Act (1835) were such trustees, until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament should otherwise order, and should thereupon utterly cease and determine : provided that, if Parliament should not otherwise direct on or before the said 1st of August, the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal should make such orders as they should see fit, for the administration, subject to such charitable uses and trusts as aforesaid, of the said charity estates and funds. Parliament did not pass any subsequent Act on the subject before the 1st of August, 1836.

Held, that the administration of the charity estates and funds did not continue in the persons so described, after the 1st of August, 1836 ; and that it was competent to the Lord Chancellor, after that day, to make orders for the appointment of new trustees for their administration. — Bignold v. Springfield, 71.

Orders made by the Lord Chancellor in the matter of such charitable estates and funds, by virtue of the said Act and *also of the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, which last gives an appeal to the House of Lords, are subject to such appeal.

Whether such orders made under the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, alone, are subject to appeal, quære. — Id. ibid.

2. Where a transaction of a suspicious nature in its commencement, can only be sustained by subsequent acts of confirmation, the party so sustaining it must pay his own costs of the investigation into the circumstances. — De Montmorency v. Devereux, 188.
3. An appeal was called on in its regular course ; the appellant's counsel were not present, but he appeared in person. The House would not dismiss the appeal, but allowed it to stand over, and ordered the appellant to pay the costs of the day. — Godson v. Hall, 549.
4. Where an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was appealed against, and overruled in the Court of Session, but the decree of that Court was afterwards reversed in this House, the House gave the appellant the costs incurred by him in the Court of Session. — Thomson v. Mitchell, 564.

CREDITORS' DEED.

The execution of a trust-deed for (among other things) the payment of creditors, does not constitute one of the creditors, who became so after the execution of the deed, and was not a party to it, a cestui que trust, entitled to call on the trustee to execute the trusts of the deed.

A. executed a trust-deed, appointing B. trustee for certain purposes therein stated, one of which was for the payment of creditors, and another was to raise a sum of money by way of mortgage, in order to satisfy a claim for rent due in respect of A.'s lands, then about to be enforced by ejectment. B. obtained from C. an advance of money with which he satisfied this claim. B. afterwards gave to C. a letter, written subsequently to, but dated before the *day *1001 of the advance; in which, appearing to ask for the advance, he said, "I will consider such advance as raised by me under the power given me; and will, whenever you please, exercise that power, by securing such advance in the best manner I am empowered by the deed." No security was ever executed by B.

Held, that C. did not stand in the situation of a cestui que trust under the deed, and could not maintain a bill in equity, calling on B. to execute the trust of the deed. — La Touche v. Lucan, Earl of, 772.

DEED. See SECURITIES.

A trustee and executor, who had been land agent and receiver to his testator without settling accounts for several years, upon his death obtained from the cestui que trust and residuary legatee an agreement to continue him in the agency, and, in case of removal without just cause, to allow him the same salary ; and also a deed granting to him part of the trust estates. The agreement and the deed were prepared by the agent, who was an attorney, and executed by the principal and cestui que trust without legal advice ; and the deed recited, untruly, that it was granted "by last request of the testator, in consideration of the agent's services," and also in full discharge of all accounts between them. The new agency terminated in a year and a half by mutual desire of the parties; and after a settlement of accounts to the satisfaction of the principal's legal advisers, he executed a deed approved by them confirming the former deed, and subsequently wrote letters to the agent, claiming the benefit of the latter deed, and expressing his satisfaction at having given the estate.

Held (affirming the decree of the Court below dismissing a bill filed to set aside both deeds, and to take the executorship and other accounts), that although the deed of gift was voidable in its origin, and could not be sustained if it stood by itself and had been impeached in reasonable time, yet that the subsequent deliberate acts of the party impeaching it, assisted by his legal advisers, made it valid. — De Montmorency v. Devereux, 188.

It is to be assumed that legal advisers, in discharge of their duty to their client, investigate suspicious transactions, and satisfy themselves before they approve them that it is for the client's benefit to confirm them. — Id. ibid.

* 1002 Where a transaction of a suspicious nature in its commencement * can only be sustained by subsequent acts of confirmation, the party so sustaining it must pay his own costs of the investigation into the circumstances. — Id. ibid.

2. A person labouring under great defectiveness of vision, though not absolutely incapable of writing, may, if he pleases, execute a deed by the intervention of notaries, and such execution will be good under the Scotch Acts of 1540 and 1579. — Reid v. Baxter, 261.

3. Deeds in the nature of family arrangements are exempt from the rules applicable to other deeds; the consideration for the former being partly value, and partly love and affection. — Persse v. Persse, 279.

DISCOVERY, BILL OF.

A bill of discovery in aid of a defence to an action cannot be sustained against a person who is not a party to the record, although charged in the bill to be solely interested in the subject of the action. — Queen of Portugal v. Glyn, 466; The Same v. Gowers, 508.

Bills filed by or against underwriters, praying some relief, do not form an exception to the rule: for if to a bill of discovery in aid of a defence to an action brought on a policy of insurance by the agent alone his principal is made a defendant, he may demur, although he is exclusively interested in the subject of the action. — Id. ibid.

Bills of discovery are permitted for the purpose of obtaining from the adversary at law a discovery of matters, which, being admitted by him, may aid the defence to the action; not for the purpose of obtaining evidence: and accordingly a bill of discovery does not lie against a person who may be a witness for the defendant in the action. — Id. ibid.

A loan raised in 1833, for Don Miguel, as King of Portugal, for the use of his government, consisted partly of bills of exchange, in two parts, drawn upon bankers in London, who accepted the first parts in the course of their business for a customer. The second parts, having been remitted to the treasury of Portugal, indorsed to the treasurer of the royal treasury there, on account of the loan, came, after the

dethronement of Don Miguel, into the possession of Queen Donna Maria, and were by her orders indorsed by the treasurer to Soares in London, with instructions to * recover the amount. * 1003
An action having been brought by Soares on the bills, against the acceptors, they filed a bill of discovery, in aid of their defence, against him and the Queen of Portugal, charging that she was interested in the bills of exchange.

Held, by the Lords (reversing an order of the Court of Exchequer), that, as the Queen of Portugal was not a party to the record at law, she was not a proper party to the bill of discovery. — Queen of Portugal v. Glyn, 466; The Same v. Gowers, 508.

DOMICILE.

In matters to be determined by the domicile of the parties, it is a principle of law that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested, and carried into execution, an intention of abandoning his former domicile, and acquiring another as his sole domicile. — Dalhousie v. M'Douall, 817; Munro v. Munro, 842.

In order to acquire a domicile, there must be actual residence in the place chosen, which must be the principal and permanent residence of the party. — Id. ibid.

By marriage, the domicile of the husband becomes that of the wife. — Id. ibid.

ERROR.

Quære — Whether a judgment given by the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, on a bill of exceptions tendered to the charge of a Judge of that Court in an action brought and tried in that Court, is not in itself irregular and erroneous? — Galwey v. Baker, 379.

EVIDENCE.

On the trial of an issue "whether (during a certain period) there arose from the works of the defenders certain noisome, offensive, noxious, or unwholesome smoke and other vapours, to the nuisance of the pursuer, whereby the produce of his garden was deteriorated," evidence was adduced for the pursuer to show that the smoke and other vapours from defenders' works had injured the produce of other grounds in the neighbourhood; and also for the defenders, to show that their works did not injure the produce of any other grounds; and one of the defenders' witnesses having, on his examination in chief, described several gardens in the neighbourhood of the works as in utmost health, was asked in cross-examination by pursuer's counsel, if he knew Glasgow Field (grounds in the neighbourhood); and * having answered that he "knew Glasgow * 1004 Field, and never knew of any damage done there," he was then asked "whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field for alleged damage there occasioned by their works?"

Held, by the House of Lords (overruling the judgment of the Court of Session), that the question was incompetent, as leading to a new collateral inquiry, which, answered either way, could not affect the issue, or test the credit of the witness: if he answered that money had been paid, the payment would not be proof of damage done, as it might have been paid to buy peace. — Tennant v. Hamilton, 122.

Evidence is not to be received of admissions or declarations made by parties, and not put in issue by the pleadings. — Copland v. Toulmin, 350.

A person seeking the benefit of a dealing with an heir expectant, for his expectancies, must show that he gave him an adequate consideration, which is the fair market-price at the time of dealing, and not the value according to the calculations of actuaries on the tables. — Earl of Aldborough v. Trye, 436.

The rule that a fair price is to be given, is sufficient protection to an heir expectant or reversioner; but the rule of full value would not be any protection, as in that case they could not deal with their expectancies or sell their interest at all. — Id. ibid.

A sale by public auction is within the proper rule, on the plain principle that the sum which the thing will fetch is the sum which it is worth. — Id. ibid.

1. Partners in a licensed brewery, convicted of a breach of the revenue laws, consented to a mitigated penalty. Semble, that a partner who was not a participator in the delict, was legally entitled to indemnity from those who were, although he consented to the penalty. — *Campbell v. INQUIRY BEFORE MASTER. See PRACTICE.

A., being tenant in tail of large estates expectant on the death of his father, in consideration of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* advanced to him by O., charged the estates with 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.*, to be paid only in the event of surviving his father, who was about eighty years of age, A. being about forty-three; and he granted to R., his agent in these transactions, in consideration of his services, an annuity charged on the same estates. R. assigned the annuity to O. for valuable consideration. O. filed a bill against A., after his father's death, to enforce these securities; and A. filed a cross-bill to set them aside, charging that O. and R. took advantage of his distress, and that no adequate consideration was given him for the post-obit securities, and no consideration for the annuity; and at the hearing he gave evidence that the consideration for the two sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* was not the full value according to the tables and calculations of actuaries. O. gave no evidence.

Held, that the Court, in the absence of evidence to enable it to decide the question, exercised a proper discretion in directing the Master to inquire what, at the time of the transaction, was the fair market-price of the two sums so secured to be paid, regard being had to the ages of A. and of his father, and to the circumstances of the estates and A.'s interest in them. — Earl of Aldborough v. Trye, 436.

2. A person seeking the benefit of a dealing with an heir expectant for his expectancies, must show that he gave him an adequate consideration, which is the fair market-price at the time of dealing, and not the value according to the calculations of actuaries on the tables. — Id. ibid.

3. The rule that a fair price is to be given, is sufficient protection to an heir expectant or reversioner; but the rule of full value would not be any protection, as in that case they could not deal with their expectancies or sell their interest at all. — Id. ibid.

4. A sale by public auction is within the proper rule, on the * plain * 1006 principle that the sum which the thing will fetch is the sum which it is worth. — Id. ibid.

5. A party comes too late to complain of a decree after joining in the inquiry directed by it, and the result is against him; and he is not entitled to question the Master's report after it is confirmed, having taken no exceptions. — Id. ibid.

6. A person being by his marriage settlement tenant for life of an estate in Ireland, held on lease for lives renewable for ever, with power of appointment to one or more of the children of the marriage; the estate, in default of appointment, to go to the first and other sons successively in tail male; by deed poll dated the 14th of January, 1804, appointed to his eldest son an estate in tail male; and by indenture of lease executed four days after, the father and son, in consideration of 1600*l.*, to be applied in paying debts on the estate and renewable fines then due, demised part of it for lives. By a deed dated December, 1807, the son, in consideration of debts paid for him by the father, and in discharge of the trust and confidence reposed in him, conveyed the estate and all his interest therein to the father and his heirs. The father, by his will, made after the death of his eldest son without issue, devised the estate, charged thereby with certain legacies, to the use of his two surviving sons and their respective issue, in equal portions, as tenants in common.

Held, by the Lords (reversing a decree which established the will), that the execution of the lease for 1600*l.* so soon after the deed of appointment, and the circumstances appearing in those deeds, and in the deed of reconveyance of 1807, raised such suspicions of the validity of the appointment as required the Court, before it could adjudicate on the father's title to dispose of the estate, to direct an inquiry whether that appointment was a bonâ fide execution of the power. — Jackson v. Jackson, 977.

JURISDICTION. See APPEAL.

- on various grounds, a decree of the Court of Exchequer, and a sale in pursuance thereof, of the mortgaged estates, subject to the leases. When the cause came to be heard the plaintiff's counsel informed the Court that no judgment would be required as between the
- * 1007 * plaintiff and mortgagees, an arrangement being in progress by which the mortgagees and purchaser under the Exchequer decree consented to a redemption of the estates, on payment by the plaintiff of a sum certain. The Lord Chancellor then heard counsel as to the validity of the leases, but conceiving that the consideration of the question as to the validity of the mortgages and sale was withdrawn by the arrangement, and that in the absence of the purchaser he had no jurisdiction to give a decision on the leases, he dismissed the bill as against the defendants claiming the benefit of them.
- Held, by the Lords, on an appeal against a decree made on rehearing, which reversed the decree of dismissal, that it was open to the Lords to consider the merits of this decree, though not appealed from, and to declare that the arrangement, instead of withdrawing from the consideration of the Court the plaintiff's claim to relief against the mortgages and sale, was an admission of his right to that relief; that the decree of dismissal was therefore erroneous, and that it was competent to the Lord Chancellor, at the time of making that decree, to adjudicate as to the validity of the leases; and the cause was remitted to the Court of Chancery, to be heard on that question. — Sheehy v. Lord Muskerry, 1.
2. The House of Lords will, on appeal, interfere with the practice of the Courts below in respect of procedure, when the form of procedure admitted below appears to be incompetent and to lead to dangerous results. — Fleming v. Dunlop, 43.
3. After the 1st day of August, 1836, it became competent to the Lord Chancellor, under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, § 71, to make new appointments of trustees of charity estates and funds theretofore administered by corporations. — Bignold v. Springfield, 71.

LEASE. See PLEADING. TREES.

An agreement in a lease for lives, "that, upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives, a certain sum shall be paid by the lessee, his heirs and assigns, to the lessor, his heirs and assigns," does not amount to a covenant for perpetual renewal. — Smyth v. Nangle, 405.

- * 1008 in the matter of a particular loan for the lender, * but did not make any charge against the lender for his services. The security he took was not sufficient.

After the death of the lender, two of his sisters, by an arrangement with the rest of the family, who were the legatees of the lender, became possessed of the security, and applied to the attorney to do what was necessary. The means taken to secure the repayment of the loan, on this continuation of it, were insufficient.

Held, that as representing the interest of the deceased, and on their own

LEGITIMATION.

A Scotch marriage can legitimate the previously born children of the married persons, so as to enable them to succeed as heirs to real estate in Scotland. The child of a Scotchman, though born in England, becomes legitimate for all civil purposes in Scotland, by the subsequent marriage of the parents in England, if the domicile of the father was and continued throughout to be Scotch. Neither the place of the marriage nor the place of the birth of the child will, under such circumstances, affect the status of the child. — Dalhousie v. M'Douall, 817; Munro v. Munro, 842.

In matters to be determined by the domicile of the parties, it is a principle of law that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile and acquiring another as his sole domicile. — Id. ibid.

In order to acquire a domicile there must be actual residence in the place chosen, which must be the principal and permanent residence of the party. — Id. ibid.

By marriage the domicile of the husband becomes that of the wife. — Id. ibid.

In 1796, a Scotch gentleman of fortune came with his regiment into England, bringing with him a young Scotchwoman then in a state of pregnancy. Her child was born in England, and he gave the usual bond to indemnify the parish against the chargeability of the infant. The young woman continued to reside with him and had other children by him, and in each instance a similar bond was given. His regiment was disbanded, and he was then returned to Parliament as member for a Scotch county. He took a house, *for *1009 the purposes of the children's education, in Penrith, in Cumberland, and, when not in London attending his parliamentary duties, was frequently staying at Penrith. In 1808 he executed a marriage contract, in which he was described as "of Logan" (Scotland), of the one part; and she was described as "M. R." (her maiden name), "residing at Penrith, Cumberland, South Britain, of the other part." No other ceremony of marriage took place, but he shortly afterwards carried her to Scotland, and introduced her and the children as his wife and children.

Held, that he had not lost his Scotch domicile; that his marriage was a Scotch marriage, and that his children were consequently entitled to succeed as heirs to Scotch estate. — Id. ibid.

A Scotch gentleman of rank and fortune left Scotland in 1794, and came on a visit to London. In the course of that year he became acquainted with an English lady. In 1795 he took lodgings for her in London, where, in 1796, a child, the fruit of their intercourse, was born. He then took a house on lease, and furnished it, and continued to reside in that house with her till 1801, unmarried. In September of that year he married her in an English church. In 1802 he returned to Scotland, taking with him his wife and child, and settled himself in his patrimonial mansion. During the whole period of his residence

It is to be assumed that legal advisers, in discharge of their duty to their client, will investigate suspicious transactions, and satisfy themselves, before giving their approval of such transactions, that it is for their client's benefit to confirm them. — Montmorency v. Devereux, 188.

An attorney, who was the ordinary attorney for a borrower, also acted in the matter of a particular loan for the lender, but did not make any charge against the lender for his services. The security he took was not sufficient.

Held, that he was properly charged as an attorney acting on the retainer and employment of the lender, and was in that character liable to an action for damages for the loss suffered through the insufficiency of the security. — Donaldson v. Haldane, 762.

* 997 * After the death of the lender, two of his sisters, by an arrangement with the rest of the family, who were the legatees of the lender, became possessed of the security, and applied to the attorney to do what was necessary. The means taken to secure the repayment of the loan, on this continuation of it, were insufficient.

Held, that as representing the interest of the deceased, and on their own account, the sisters were entitled to compensation from the attorney. — Id. ibid.

BANK.

A partnership consisting of more than six persons, carrying on the business of bankers in or within sixty-five miles of London, cannot, without violating the Acts of Parliament respecting the Bank of England, accept, in the course of such business, a bill of exchange payable at less than six months from the time of such acceptance.

Whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly, cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance.

A London Joint-stock Bank, consisting of more than six partners, entered into an agreement with a bank in Canada, that G. P., manager of the London Joint-stock Bank, but not a partner therein, should accept bills drawn on him by the Canada bank, payable at less than six months from the acceptance thereof; and that the London Joint-stock Bank would provide funds for the due payment of such bills; the money transactions arising thereupon being, in the accounts between the two banks, to be treated as transactions between the said banks. Held, by the Lords (affirming the judgment of the Master of the Rolls) :—

1. That the acceptance of such bills, in execution of such agreement, was unlawful, regard being had to the Acts in force respecting the Bank of England.
2. That such acceptances would not be lawful, even if the London Joint-stock Bank, at the time of the acceptances, had in hand funds on account of the bank in Canada equal to the amount of the bills so accepted.
3. That the acceptances of such bills would not be lawful if the London Joint-stock Bank had not, at the time of the acceptances, any funds in hand belonging to the bank in Canada, but the bills were accepted on the credit of a * contract by that bank to remit * 998 funds to meet such acceptances before the bills became payable.
4. That the Bank of England might maintain an action against the London Joint-stock Bank, founded on such transactions. — Booth v. The Bank of England, 509.

BOND.

1. The rule as to the liability of sureties in a bond is the same in Scotland as in England; namely, that they are not to be discharged from their obligations unless the contract between them and the obligees is varied by a positive contract between the obligees and the principal, without notice to the sureties. It is the duty of a surety to see that his principal does his. — Creighton v. Rankin, 325.
2. The bond given by a collector and his sureties to the commissioners of land and assessed taxes under the 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, is broken if the taxes collected in any one year are not duly paid up by the collector to the account of that year.

The breach of the condition of the bond is equally complete, and the sureties are equally liable, though all the moneys collected in the year for which they are sureties should be in fact paid in, if any part of them should be appropriated by the collector, and received by the commissioners, in satisfaction of the arrears of a former year.

Such appropriation of part of the moneys of one year to the payment of the arrears of a former year, will not prevent the commissioners from maintaining an action on the bond against the sureties for the year in which the money collected has been so misappropriated.

The commissioners may come upon the sureties after they have sold the lands and goods of the collector, but the seizure and sale of his lands and goods is a condition precedent to their right of action against the sureties, and they are not entitled to require notice of such lands and goods in order to perform the condition. — Gwynne v. Burnell, 572.

Where a party is in the legal and undisputed possession of a municipal office, it is competent for him, by suspension and interdict, to protect his office against the unauthorized intrusion of a party who has no title to the office : but it does not put into office a party who has the abstract right to it. — Fleming v. Dunlop, 43.
2. A bill of suspension and interdict is an incompetent procedure to try and determine the merits of contested municipal elections. — Id. ibid.
 Procedure by bill of suspension and interdict cannot be taken against a party in possession of an office, to question his right thereto, by a party who is not in possession ; nor can it apply to a case where neither party is in possession, nor to acts done anterior to the act of election ; nor can the right of election be decided by it. — Id. ibid.
3. An interlocutor, passing a bill of suspension, and granting interdict, is subject to appeal to the House of Lords, within the 48 Geo. 3, c. 151. — Id. ibid.
4. By Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, § 71, it is enacted that all the estate and interest of such bodies corporate, or members thereof, as were seised or possessed of any real or personal estate in trust for charitable uses, should, in respect of such uses and trusts, continue in the persons, who at the time of passing the Act (1835) were such trustees, until the 1st day of August, 1836, or until Parliament should otherwise order, and should thereupon utterly cease and determine : provided that, if Parliament should not otherwise direct on or before the said 1st of August, the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal should make such orders as they should see fit, for the administration, subject to such charitable uses and trusts as aforesaid, of the said charity estates and funds. Parliament did not pass any subsequent Act on the subject before the 1st of August, 1836.

Held, that the administration of the charity estates and funds did not continue in the persons so described, after the 1st of August, 1836 ; and that it was competent to the Lord Chancellor, after that day, to make orders for the appointment of new trustees for their administration. — Bignold v. Springfield, 71.

Orders made by the Lord Chancellor in the matter of such charitable estates and funds, by virtue of the said Act and *also of the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, which last gives an appeal to the House of Lords, are subject to such appeal.

Whether such orders made under the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, alone, are subject to appeal, quære. — Id. ibid.

CREDITORS' DEED.

The execution of a trust-deed for (among other things) the payment of creditors, does not constitute one of the creditors, who became so after the execution of the deed, and was not a party to it, a cestui que trust, entitled to call on the trustee to execute the trusts of the deed.

A. executed a trust-deed, appointing B. trustee for certain purposes therein stated, one of which was for the payment of creditors, and another was to raise a sum of money by way of mortgage, in order to satisfy a claim for rent due in respect of A.'s lands, then about to be enforced by ejectment. B. obtained from C. an advance of money with which he satisfied this claim. B. afterwards gave to C. a letter, written subsequently to, but dated before the *day *1001 of the advance; in which, appearing to ask for the advance, he said, "I will consider such advance as raised by me under the power given me; and will, whenever you please, exercise that power, by securing such advance in the best manner I am empowered by the deed." No security was ever executed by B.

Held, that C. did not stand in the situation of a cestui que trust under the deed, and could not maintain a bill in equity, calling on B. to execute the trust of the deed. — La Touche v. Lucan, Earl of, 772.

DEED. See SECURITIES.

A trustee and executor, who had been land agent and receiver to his testator without settling accounts for several years, upon his death obtained from the cestui que trust and residuary legatee an agreement to continue him in the agency, and, in case of removal without just cause, to allow him the same salary ; and also a deed granting to him part of the trust estates. The agreement and the deed were prepared by the agent, who was an attorney, and executed by the principal and cestui que trust without legal advice ; and the deed recited, untruly, that it was granted "by last request of the testator, in consideration of the agent's services," and also in full discharge of all accounts between them. The new agency terminated in a year and a half by mutual desire of the parties; and after a settlement of accounts to the satisfaction of the principal's legal advisers, he executed a deed approved by them confirming the former deed, and subsequently wrote letters to the agent, claiming the benefit of the latter deed, and expressing his satisfaction at having given the estate.

Held (affirming the decree of the Court below dismissing a bill filed to set aside both deeds, and to take the executorship and other accounts), that although the deed of gift was voidable in its origin, and could not be sustained if it stood by itself and had been impeached in reasonable time, yet that the subsequent deliberate acts of the party impeaching it, assisted by his legal advisers, made it valid. — De Montmorency v. Devereux, 188.

It is to be assumed that legal advisers, in discharge of their duty to their client, investigate suspicious transactions, and satisfy themselves before they approve them that it is for the client's benefit to confirm them. — Id. ibid.

2. A person labouring under great defectiveness of vision, though not absolutely incapable of writing, may, if he pleases, execute a deed by the intervention of notaries, and such execution will be good under the Scotch Acts of 1540 and 1579. — Reid v. Baxter, 261.

3. Deeds in the nature of family arrangements are exempt from the rules applicable to other deeds; the consideration for the former being partly value, and partly love and affection. — Persse v. Persse, 279.

DISCOVERY, BILL OF.

A bill of discovery in aid of a defence to an action cannot be sustained against a person who is not a party to the record, although charged in the bill to be solely interested in the subject of the action. — Queen of Portugal v. Glyn, 466; The Same v. Gowers, 508.

Bills filed by or against underwriters, praying some relief, do not form an exception to the rule: for if to a bill of discovery in aid of a defence to an action brought on a policy of insurance by the agent alone his principal is made a defendant, he may demur, although he is exclusively interested in the subject of the action. — Id. ibid.

Bills of discovery are permitted for the purpose of obtaining from the adversary at law a discovery of matters, which, being admitted by him, may aid the defence to the action; not for the purpose of obtaining evidence: and accordingly a bill of discovery does not lie against a person who may be a witness for the defendant in the action. — Id. ibid.

A loan raised in 1833, for Don Miguel, as King of Portugal, for the use of his government, consisted partly of bills of exchange, in two parts, drawn upon bankers in London, who accepted the first parts in the course of their business for a customer. The second parts, having been remitted to the treasury of Portugal, indorsed to the treasurer of the royal treasury there, on account of the loan, came, after the

dethronement of Don Miguel, into the possession of Queen Donna Maria, and were by her orders indorsed by the treasurer to Soares in London, with instructions to *recover the amount. * 1003
An action having been brought by Soares on the bills, against the acceptors, they filed a bill of discovery, in aid of their defence, against him and the Queen of Portugal, charging that she was interested in the bills of exchange.

Held, by the Lords (reversing an order of the Court of Exchequer), that, as the Queen of Portugal was not a party to the record at law, she was not a proper party to the bill of discovery. — Queen of Portugal v. Glyn, 466; The Same v. Gowers, 508.

DOMICILE.

In matters to be determined by the domicile of the parties, it is a principle of law that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested, and carried into execution, an intention of abandoning his former domicile, and acquiring another as his sole domicile. — Dalhousie v. M'Douall, 817; Munro v. Munro, 842.

In order to acquire a domicile, there must be actual residence in the place chosen, which must be the principal and permanent residence of the party. — Id. ibid.

By marriage, the domicile of the husband becomes that of the wife. — Id. ibid.

ERROR.

Quære — Whether a judgment given by the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, on a bill of exceptions tendered to the charge of a Judge of that Court in an action brought and tried in that Court, is not in itself irregular and erroneous? — Galwey v. Baker, 379.

EVIDENCE.

On the trial of an issue "whether (during a certain period) there arose from the works of the defenders certain noisome, offensive, noxious, or unwholesome smoke and other vapours, to the nuisance of the pursuer, whereby the produce of his garden was deteriorated," evidence was adduced for the pursuer to show that the smoke and other vapours from defenders' works had injured the produce of other grounds in the neighbourhood; and also for the defenders, to show that their works did not injure the produce of any other grounds; and one of the defenders' witnesses having, on his examination in chief, described several gardens in the neighbourhood of the works as in utmost health, was asked in cross-examination by pursuer's counsel, if he knew Glasgow Field (grounds in the neighbourhood); and *having answered that he "knew Glasgow * 1004 Field, and never knew of any damage done there," he was then asked "whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgow Field for alleged damage there occasioned by their works?"

Held, by the House of Lords (overruling the judgment of the Court of Session), that the question was incompetent, as leading to a new collateral inquiry, which, answered either way, could not affect the issue, or test the credit of the witness: if he answered that money had been paid, the payment would not be proof of damage done, as it might have been paid to buy peace. — Tennant v. Hamilton, 122.

Evidence is not to be received of admissions or declarations made by parties, and not put in issue by the pleadings. — Copland v. Toulmin, 350.

A person seeking the benefit of a dealing with an heir expectant, for his expectancies, must show that he gave him an adequate consideration, which is the fair market-price at the time of dealing, and not the value according to the calculations of actuaries on the tables. — Earl of Aldborough v. Trye, 436.

The rule that a fair price is to be given, is sufficient protection to an heir expectant or reversioner; but the rule of full value would not be any protection, as in that case they could not deal with their expectancies or sell their interest at all. — Id. ibid.

A sale by public auction is within the proper rule, on the plain principle that the sum which the thing will fetch is the sum which it is worth. — Id. ibid.

INQUIRY BEFORE MASTER. See PRACTICE.

A., being tenant in tail of large estates expectant on the death of his father, in consideration of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* advanced to him by O., charged the estates with 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.*, to be paid only in the event of surviving his father, who was about eighty years of age, A. being about forty-three; and he granted to R., his agent in these transactions, in consideration of his services, an annuity charged on the same estates. R. assigned the annuity to O. for valuable consideration. O. filed a bill against A., after his father's death, to enforce these securities; and A. filed a cross-bill to set them aside, charging that O. and R. took advantage of his distress, and that no adequate consideration was given him for the post-obit securities, and no consideration for the annuity; and at the hearing he gave evidence that the consideration for the two sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* was not the full value according to the tables and calculations of actuaries. O. gave no evidence.

Held, that the Court, in the absence of evidence to enable it to decide the question, exercised a proper discretion in directing the Master to inquire what, at the time of the transaction, was the fair market-price of the two sums so secured to be paid, regard being had to the ages of A. and of his father, and to the circumstances of the estates and A.'s interest in them. — Earl of Aldborough v. Trye, 436.

2. A person seeking the benefit of a dealing with an heir expectant for his expectancies, must show that he gave him an adequate consideration, which is the fair market-price at the time of dealing, and not the value according to the calculations of actuaries on the tables. — Id. ibid.
3. The rule that a fair price is to be given, is sufficient protection to an heir expectant or reversioner; but the rule of full value would not be any protection, as in that case they could not deal with their expectancies or sell their interest at all. — Id. ibid.
4. A sale by public auction is within the proper rule, on the *plain *1006 principle that the sum which the thing will fetch is the sum which it is worth. — Id. ibid.
5. A party comes too late to complain of a decree after joining in the inquiry directed by it, and the result is against him; and he is not entitled to question the Master's report after it is confirmed, having taken no exceptions. — Id. ibid.
6. A person being by his marriage settlement tenant for life of an estate in Ireland, held on lease for lives renewable for ever, with power of appointment to one or more of the children of the marriage; the estate, in default of appointment, to go to the first and other sons successively in tail male; by deed poll dated the 14th of January, 1804, appointed to his eldest son an estate in tail male; and by indenture of lease executed four days after, the father and son, in consideration of 1600*l.*, to be applied in paying debts on the estate and renewable fines then due, demised part of it for lives. By a deed dated December, 1807, the son, in consideration of debts paid for him by the father, and in discharge of the trust and confidence reposed in him, conveyed the estate and all his interest therein to the father and his heirs. The father, by his will, made after the death of his eldest son without issue, devised the estate, charged thereby with certain legacies, to the use of his two surviving sons and their respective issue, in equal portions, as tenants in common.

Held, by the Lords (reversing a decree which established the will), that the execution of the lease for 1600*l.* so soon after the deed of appointment, and the circumstances appearing in those deeds, and in the deed of reconveyance of 1807, raised such suspicions of the validity of the appointment as required the Court, before it could adjudicate on the father's title to dispose of the estate, to direct an inquiry whether that appointment was a bonâ fide execution of the power. — Jackson v. Jackson, 977.

JURISDICTION. See APPEAL.

1. A bill was filed in Chancery in Ireland, impeaching leases and mortgages as not in due execution of powers in a settlement; also impeaching,

- on various grounds, a decree of the Court of Exchequer, and a sale in pursuance thereof, of the mortgaged estates, subject to the leases. When the cause came to be heard the plaintiff's counsel informed the Court that no judgment would be required as between the
- * 1007 * plaintiff and mortgagees, an arrangement being in progress by which the mortgagees and purchaser under the Exchequer decree consented to a redemption of the estates, on payment by the plaintiff of a sum certain. The Lord Chancellor then heard counsel as to the validity of the leases, but conceiving that the consideration of the question as to the validity of the mortgages and sale was withdrawn by the arrangement, and that in the absence of the purchaser he had no jurisdiction to give a decision on the leases, he dismissed the bill as against the defendants claiming the benefit of them.
- Held, by the Lords, on an appeal against a decree made on rehearing, which reversed the decree of dismissal, that it was open to the Lords to consider the merits of this decree, though not appealed from, and to declare that the arrangement, instead of withdrawing from the consideration of the Court the plaintiff's claim to relief against the mortgages and sale, was an admission of his right to that relief; that the decree of dismissal was therefore erroneous, and that it was competent to the Lord Chancellor, at the time of making that decree, to adjudicate as to the validity of the leases; and the cause was remitted to the Court of Chancery, to be heard on that question. — Sheehy v. Lord Muskerry, 1.
2. The House of Lords will, on appeal, interfere with the practice of the Courts below in respect of procedure, when the form of procedure admitted below appears to be incompetent and to lead to dangerous results. — Fleming v. Dunlop, 43.
3. After the 1st day of August, 1836, it became competent to the Lord Chancellor, under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, § 71, to make new appointments of trustees of charity estates and funds theretofore administered by corporations. — Bignold v. Springfield, 71.

LEASE. See PLEADING. TREES.

An agreement in a lease for lives, "that, upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives, a certain sum shall be paid by the lessee, his heirs and assigns, to the lessor, his heirs and assigns," does not amount to a covenant for perpetual renewal. — Smyth v. Nangle, 405.

LEGITIMATION.

A Scotch marriage can legitimate the previously born children of the married persons, so as to enable them to succeed as heirs to real estate in Scotland. The child of a Scotchman, though born in England, becomes legitimate for all civil purposes in Scotland, by the subsequent marriage of the parents in England, if the domicile of the father was and continued throughout to be Scotch. Neither the place of the marriage nor the place of the birth of the child will, under such circumstances, affect the status of the child. — Dalhousie v. M'Douall, 817; Munro v. Munro, 842.

Her child was born in England, and he gave the usual bond to indemnify the parish against the chargeability of the infant. The young woman continued to reside with him and had other children by him, and in each instance a similar bond was given. His regiment was disbanded, and he was then returned to Parliament as member for a Scotch county. He took a house, *for *1009 the purposes of the children's education, in Penrith, in Cumberland, and, when not in London attending his parliamentary duties, was frequently staying at Penrith. In 1808 he executed a marriage contract, in which he was described as "of Logan" (Scotland), of the one part; and she was described as "M. R." (her maiden name), "residing at Penrith, Cumberland, South Britain, of the other part." No other ceremony of marriage took place, but he shortly afterwards carried her to Scotland, and introduced her and the children as his wife and children.

Held, that he had not lost his Scotch domicile; that his marriage was a Scotch marriage, and that his children were consequently entitled to succeed as heirs to Scotch estate. — Id. ibid.

A Scotch gentleman of rank and fortune left Scotland in 1794, and came on a visit to London. In the course of that year he became acquainted with an English lady. He then took a house on lease, and furnished it, and continued to reside in that house with her till 1801, unmarried. In September of that year he married her in an English church. In 1802 he returned to Scotland, taking with him his wife and child, and settled himself in his patrimonial mansion. During the whole period of his residence in London, he had been accustomed to write letters to Scotland, declaring from time to time his immediate intention to return, and desiring things to be done which could only be necessary on that account.

Held, that he had not lost his Scotch domicile, and therefore that his marriage was in all respects a Scotch marriage, and his child capable of succeeding as his lawful heir to entailed estates. — Munro v. Munro, 842.

MARRIAGE. See LEGITIMATION.

* 1010 *MORTGAGE.

By a settlement made on the marriage of A., certain premises were assignee to trustees for his use for life, and power was also given to him "to raise by deed, mortgage, or any other writing, a sum of 1000*l.*, to be applied to any purpose that the said A. should please, but the same was not to be raised by way of sale of the said lands ;" and A.'s wife had a jointure secured on these premises. A. raised the 1000*l.* by mortgage of the settled premises, and afterwards became bankrupt. His assignee sold his interest as such assignee in the settled premises to B., who also purchased the mortgage. A. afterwards died.

Held, that by this assignment of A.'s estate and interest in the premises, B. became entitled to hold the mortgage as a first charge upon the estate, as well after as before the death of A., and until, by payment of principal and interest, it should be satisfied. — Simpson v. O'Sullivan, 550.

NUISANCE. See EVIDENCE, 1.

OFFICE. See CORPORATION, 3.

The rules of law applicable to the managers of a public establishment do not apply to one formed and maintained from private funds, though it may be formed and maintained under a royal charter of incorporation.

The appointment to an office in a private establishment is not, therefore, necessarily an appointment ad vitam aut culpam, but depends in each instance on the particular circumstances under which it was made. — Gibson v. Ross, 241.

OFFICER.

On the true construction of the general Turnpike-Road Acts for Scotland (4 Geo. 4, c. 49, and 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 43), the clerk appointed by trustees of district roads under a local Act, may, as their representative, sue and be sued on their account in his own name; and he is the proper person to bring an action against their treasurer's sureties for payment of balances due from the treasurer. — Creighton v. Rankin, 325.

Quære, whether the trustees can authorize their clerk so to sue or defend, independently of the statutory provisions? For, if by the rule of practice in the Scotch Courts (which constitutes the law of Scotland, and therefore is not to be disturbed on appeal, without full inquiry into the grounds * of it), a party having himself a * 1011 right to sue, can enable another to maintain a suit in such other person's name, without assigning to him the subject-matter of the suit, consequences inconsistent with the principles of justice would flow from such practice. — Id. ibid.

The treasurer appointed by district road trustees having absconded with the trust funds: Held (affirming the judgment of the Court below), that a cautioner for the faithful discharge of his office was liable to the trustees for the balances due from the treasurer, although at several prior audits of his accounts they were guilty of neglect of their duty, by allowing him to retain in his hands balances far exceeding the amount allowed by the terms of the bond of caution, without requiring payment and without notice to the cautioner. — Id. ibid.

The rule as to the liability of sureties in a bond is the same in Scotland as in England, viz., that they are not to be discharged from their obligations unless the contract between them and the obligees is varied by a positive contract between the obligees and the principal, without notice to the sureties. It is the duty of a surety to see that his principal does his. — Id. ibid.

The Edinburgh Police Act, 2 Will. 4, c. 87, does not make the commissioners responsible, through their collector, for the misconduct of one of the police constables. — Thomson v. Mitchell, 564.

PARTIES. See DISCOVERY, BILL OF. PLEADING.

PARTNER. See APPEAL, 3. BANK. INDEMNITY.

Partners in a licensed brewery, convicted of a breach of the revenue laws, consented to a mitigated penalty. It seems that a partner who was not a participator in the delict, was legally entitled to indemnity from those who were, although he consented to the penalty. — Campbell v. Campbell, 166.

An American ship was fitted out in the port of Liverpool and sent to the coast of Africa, in 1806, on a joint adventure for trafficking in slaves. An English ship was sent at the same time, by the same parties, with arms and ammunition, to be at the disposal of the supercargo of the American ship; security having been given to the Admiralty that they were to be expended in trade on the coast of Africa. On the arrival of the two ships in the river Congo, the arms and ammunition were transhipped on board * the American ship, * 1012 which was thereupon seized by a British privateer, and ultimately condemned as contraband.

Held, that the whole transaction was illegal, and that no action for contribution or account, in regard thereto, could be maintained by any of the parties concerned, against the others. — Stewart v. Gibson, 707.

PARTNERSHIP ACCOUNTS.

R. and A. T. having carried on the business of navy agents as partners in equal shares, and R. having retired, leaving the partnership accounts unsettled, with balances due to the firm from its customers, A. T. took C. into partnership, the customers' accounts were transferred to the new partnership books, and the business was carried on as before until A. T.'s death, without any agreement in writing, or settlement of accounts between these partners, or other evidence to show their shares in the concern. On a bill being filed by A. T.'s representatives against C. for an account, he stated that the agreement was if A. T. would bring into the partnership 40,000*l.* of good debts due from the customers to the former partnership, his share in the concern should be two-thirds and C.'s one-third, otherwise they should have equal shares; and that, in consequence of A. T.'s not bringing in the 40,000*l.* of good debts, the agreement was varied accordingly. There were entries in the accounts debiting the partners equally with the prices of wines purchased, and with losses on transactions in the public funds; and one witness said that C. directed him in A. T.'s presence to make up the general partnership accounts in equal shares.

Held, that as it was established by a judgment in a former appeal, that the 40,000*l.* of good debts were brought into the new partnership according to the agreement, the event in which it was to be altered never occurred; and as the accounts were uniform and contained no evidence of an alteration, the partnership was continued in the proportion of two-thirds to A. T. and one-third to C.

Held, also, that in taking the accounts between C. and A. T., and between them and the former firm, the moneys paid in by the customers of both firms without specific appropriation or contract, were to be applied first in discharge of their debts to the former firm, according to the rule in Clayton's Case, although A. T., in an affidavit made by him in a suit between himself and R.'s representative, swore that it was * agreed between him and C. that the advances to be made by them to the creditors should be first repaid out of their payments, and the surplus only in liquidation of their debts to the former firm. — Copland v. Toulmin, 350.

PLEADING. See CORPORATION, 2. DISCOVERY, BILL OF.

1. The summons in the action having claimed a certain sum from the defenders, jointly and severally; and the verdict having found them simply indebted in a different sum as libelled: Held, that there is no inconsistency between that and the judgment decreeing against the defenders, jointly and severally, for payment of the sum so found as libelled. — Campbell v. Campbell, 166.
2. By indenture made in 1827 between R. P. and his eldest son, D. P., reciting that R. P. P. of C. was seised of large real estates, was never married, and was then in a state of mental and bodily imbecility; that in the event of his dying so seised, intestate, and without issue,

R. P. as his heir-at-law would be entitled to the reversion of his estates in fee ; that R. P. was desirous of having a commission of lunacy sued out for the protection of R. P. P. and his property, and also of his own reversion, and that D. P., at R. P.'s request, agreed to sue out and prosecute such commission and take other necessary law proceedings at his own expense, in R. P.'s name ; R. P., in consideration of the agreement and of love and affection for D. P., covenanted to convey all the estates that would descend to him on the decease of R. P. P. to the use of himself for life, remainder to the uses expressed respecting the estate of R. in D. P.'s marriage settlement, being for the benefit of D. P. and the heirs male of the marriage. The commission was accordingly issued ; R. P. P. was declared a lunatic, and D. P. was reimbursed for his expenses out of his estate. R. P. was then sixty-three years of age ; the lunatic was forty ; D. P. was younger. The lunatic died in 1829, and R. P. entered into possession of his real estates, and conveyed them to his second son, R. H. P., for valuable consideration. On a bill filed by D. P. to set aside that conveyance and for specific performance of the covenant, R. P., by his answer, said he entered into it without legal advice, and by fraud, imposition, and misrepresentation on the part of D. P. It was proved in evidence that both parties employed the solicitor who prepared the indenture * under * 1014 advice of counsel for each ; that R. P. read it and heard it read before he executed it, and afterwards as well as before expressed his desire that the estate of C. should be united to the estate of R. and go to his eldest son.

Held, by the Lords (reversing a decree which dismissed the bill), that R. P. tendered a false defence, and that all the matters put in issue by his answer were disproved by the evidence. — Persse v. Persse, 279.

3. The agreement to sue out the commission was not void or illegal for champerty or maintenance, or as against public policy, or fraud on the jurisdiction in lunacy, or want of mutuality. Regard being had to the ages and relative situation of the parties, and to the benefits secured by the issuing of the commission, there was some, and not very inadequate, consideration for the covenant. — Id. ibid.

4. Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that a defender whose name is omitted per incuriam from the conclusions of the summons, is not to be permitted to have recourse to that omission as a fatal objection to the whole process, after his defences preliminary and on the merits have been repelled. The defect was cured by the acts and acquiescence of the defender and of his representative sisted in his place. — Creighton v. Rankin, 325.

5. A tenant of lands in Ireland, under the seventh renewal of a lease, made in 1672, not in existence, but admitted to contain an agreement as to the amount of fine to be paid "upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives," filed a bill for renewal against the lessor's assigns, and, referring to the recitals of that agreement in former renewals as evidence of the covenant contained in the original lease, prayed that that covenant be decreed to be a covenant for perpetual renewal.

Held, that the case so made, and the issues tendered by the bill, were con-

- fined to the construction of the agreement as to the amount of the fine contained in the lease of 1672, and identified by the reference to the recitals of it in the renewals ; and did not warrant either of two issues directed by the Court below, to try, 1st, whether at or before the making of the lease of 1672 (which was previous to the Statute of Frauds in Ireland), there was an agreement between the parties for a lease of lives renewable for ever ; 2dly, whether that lease con-
- * 1015 tained any agreement or covenant * for renewal, independent of the agreement as to the amount of the fine to be paid on inserting any life or lives.

The latter issue would be consistent with the bill, if it had prayed relief on the ground that, the original lease being lost, the dealings between the parties for one hundred and twenty years justified an inference that it contained a covenant for perpetual renewal. But the draftsman was precluded by former proceedings from so framing the bill. — Smyth v. Nangle, 405.

6. The plea of a defendant (a surety in a bond given to the commissioners of assessed taxes) averred that the collector had lands and goods, of which the commissioners had notice, and that they did not seize and sell. The replication was, that the collector had no property subject to seizure and sale, of which the commissioners had notice; the rejoinder was, that the collector had lands and goods which might have been seized and sold, but were not modo et forma, as alleged by the plaintiffs, concluding to the country. The rejoinder did not say any thing of notice. The verdict was, that the collector had lands and goods which might have been seized and sold, but that the commissioners had no notice of the collector's lands, but had reasonable grounds for believing that he had goods.

Held, that there could be no judgment for the defendant on these pleadings, nor any judgment for the plaintiffs, non obstante veredicto, but only a venire de novo. — Gwynne v. Burnell, 572.

PRACTICE. See CORPORATION, 1-3. INQUIRY BEFORE THE MASTER. JURISDICTION, 1. REHEARING, 1.

1. An order having been obtained for a rehearing, upon a motion to discharge it on the ground that the decree was enrolled, the Lord Chancellor ordered the enrolment to be opened, without any application to vacate it ; then reheard the cause, and decreed against the leases.

Held, that the orders and proceedings were irregular ; that although the opening of an enrolment is in the discretion of the Judge, with which a Court of Appeal would not interfere, still that discretion ought to be regulated by precedent and authority. — Sheehy v. Lord Muskerry, 1.

2. Upon a rehearing, a party is not bound by untrue recitals, inserted by mistake in the former decree. — Id. ibid.

- * 1016 * 3. The House of Lords will, on appeal, interfere with the practice of the Courts below in respect of procedure, when the form of procedure admitted below appears to be incompetent and to lead to dangerous results. — Fleming v. Dunlop, 43.

4. Semble, that a partner who was not a participator in the delict was legally entitled to indemnity from those who were, although he consented to the penalty. But held, that by having omitted all opportunities of taking a decision on the legal question in the Court below, and being unable to appeal against the verdict, he was precluded from having a decision on that question from the House of Lords. — Campbell v. Campbell, 168.

5. A party after failing in the defence set up by his answer, is not to be permitted to try another defence depending on matters not put in issue by the answer, and which, therefore, his adversary had no opportunity of disproving. — Persse v. Persse, 279.
6. It requires a very strong case to induce the Lords to reverse a decree, nine years after its date, especially if that decree established no fact, adjudicated no right, but merely directed proper inquiries to obtain information for the Court, and the objects of it were exhausted, the appellant himself having joined in the inquiries and failed. — Copland v. Toulmin, 350.
7. It is irregular, by an exception to a report, to raise a proposition foreign to the subject-matter of the report. — Id. ibid.
8. A party comes too late to complain of a decree after joining in the inquiry directed by it, and the result is against him; and he is not entitled to question the Master's report after it is confirmed by decree, having taken no exceptions to it. — Earl of Aldborough v. Trye, 436.
9. It is improper to print in the Appeal Cases, or Appendix, the interrogatories in a bill or other unnecessary matter. — Booth v. The Bank of England, 509.
10. If the second counsel for an appellant cannot attend in his turn, the House will hear him afterwards in reply to the respondent's counsel, but will confine him strictly to the reply. — Id. ibid.
- * 11. An appeal was called on in its regular course; the appellant's counsel were not present, but he appeared in person. * 1017
The House would not dismiss the appeal, but allowed it to stand over, and ordered the appellant to pay the costs of the day. — Godson v. Hall, 549.
12. By a settlement made on the marriage of A., certain premises were assigned to trustees for his use for life; and power was also given him "to raise by deed, mortgage, or any other writing, a sum of 1000*l.*, to be applied to any purpose that the said A. should please, but the same was not to be raised by way of sale of the said lands." A. raised the 1000*l.* by way of mortgage of the settled premises, and afterwards became bankrupt; his assignee sold his interest as such assignee, in the settled premises, to B., who also purchased the mortgage; A. afterwards died.

The Court below having directed an inquiry into the value of the estate at the time of the assignment, and the amount of B.'s interest therein, this House reversed the order directing such inquiry, and, without making any order, remitted the case with the declaration of what were the nature and extent of B.'s rights, leaving it to the Court below to carry that declaration into effect. — Simpson v. O'Sullivan, 550.

13. The Court below, in which the action is brought, may award a repleader; but a Court of Error cannot award it. — Gwynne v. Burnell, 572.

The House, in remitting a case for inquiry on a main question, will, to save delay and expense, direct inquiries on other questions consequential upon the probable finding on the main question. — Jackson v. Jackson, 977.

SECURITIES.

A. being tenant in tail of large estates expectant on the death of his father, in consideration of 6000*l.* and 10,000*l.* advanced to him by O., charged the estate with 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.*, to be paid only in the event of surviving his father, who was about eighty years of age, A. being about forty-three; *and he granted to R., his agent in these transactions, in consideration of his services, an annuity charged on the same estates. R. assigned the annuity to O. for valuable consideration. O. filed a bill against A., after his father's death, to enforce these securities; and A. filed a cross-bill to set them aside, charging that O. and R. took advantage of his distress, and that no adequate consideration was given him for the post-obit securities, and no consideration for the annuity; and at the hearing he gave evidence that the consideration for the two sums of 12,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* was not the full value, according to the tables and calculations of actuaries. O. gave no evidence.

Held, that the Court, in the absence of evidence to enable it to decide the question, exercised a proper discretion in directing the Master to inquire what, at the time of the transaction, was the fair market price of the two sums so secured to be paid, regard being had to the ages of A. and of his father, and to the circumstances of the estates and A.'s interest in them. — Earl of Aldborough v. Trye, 438.

TITHES.

To a vicar's bill for an account of all small tithes, the defendants answered that the right to all tithes, as well small as great, became vested in the rector, and in the owners of the lands by grants and conveyances, and that they and their tenants held the lands, with the tithes, or free from all tithes whatsoever; but that some occupiers paid annually to the vicar, in respect of their houses, certain small sums in the name of "privy tithes," which the defendants alleged were personal tithes, and not compositions for small tithes. The vicar, unable to produce an endowment, gave secondary evidence showing that the vicarage was endowed generally with small tithes. There was no evidence that any small tithes were ever paid to or claimed by the rector, or the persons entitled to the rectory. Held,

1. That the defendants, after failing to show title to the small tithes in themselves or the owners of the lands, could not be heard to say that the small payments in the name of privy tithes were compositions.
- * 2. That, in the district in which those lands are situated, privy * 1019 tithes are not personal tithes, but are the same as small tithes.
3. That where there is evidence that the vicarage was endowed with small tithes, the vicar's right to them is established against all occupiers of lands within the parish as to which no particular discharge is proved; although no small tithes have ever been paid.
4. Where any of the defendants proved a particular discharge of the lands in his occupation, or showed that they were originally part of the glebe lands, the vicar's bill against them was dismissed with costs, but without costs as to such defendants as did not set up and prove that defence in the Court below. — Clee and others v. Hall, 744.

To a rector's bill against the owner and occupiers of lands for an account of tithes, they, by their answers, set up an agreement made in 1711, between the then rector and the owner of the lands (who was also patron of the living), by which certain lands and a perpetual annuity were given to the rector in exchange for his glebe lands, and for the discharge from tithes of the lands occupied by the defendants. The agreement continued to be beneficial to the church, having been made with reference to the probable future increase in the value of the tithes: it was approved by the Ordinary, and established by a decree of the Court of Chancery, and acted on down to the filing of the bill, when the rector refused to accept the annuity, but still retained the lands which were allotted to him in the exchange, and which were much more valuable than the old glebe lands.

Held, that although it was open to the rector to put an end to the agreement, as being void under the disabling statutes, he was not entitled to the aid of equity to enforce his legal title to the tithes while he retained part of the consideration for their discharge, contrary to the principle that "he who seeks equity must do equity." — Plowden v. Thorpe, 137.

To a bill filed for tithes against occupiers of lands, in July, 1833, the owner was made a defendant by amendment in January, 1835.

Quære, whether he was defendant to a suit commenced within the time limited by the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 100, § 3; that is, within a year from the 17th of August, 1832? — Id. ibid.

tenant. Its operation is so restricted by the 23 & 24 Geo. 3, c. 39. — Galwey v. Baker, 379.

TRUSTS.

The execution of a trust-deed for (among other things) the payment of creditors does not constitute one of the creditors, who became so after the execution of the deed, and was not a party to it, a cestui que trust, entitled to call on the trustee to execute the trusts of the deed.

A. executed a trust-deed, appointing B. trustee for certain purposes therein stated, one of which was for the payment of creditors, and another was to raise a sum of money by way of mortgage, in order to satisfy a claim for rent due in respect of A.'s lands, then about to be enforced by ejectment. B. obtained from C. an advance of money with which he satisfied this claim. B. afterwards gave to C. a letter, written subsequently to, but dated before the day of the advance; in which, appearing to ask for the advance, he said, "I will consider such advance as raised by me under the power given me; and will, whenever you please, exercise that power, by securing such advance in the best manner I am empowered by the deed." No security was ever executed by B.

Held, that C. did not stand in the situation of a cestui que trust under the deed, and could not maintain a bill in equity, calling on B. to execute the trust of the deed. — La Touche v. Earl of Lucan, 772.

WILL, CONSTRUCTION OF.

A testator by his will gave the residue of his personal estate to his wife for her life, and after her decease to Sir C. E. D. absolutely: he subsequently, by a codicil, which did not affect the gift of the residue, altered his will in some respects, and confirmed it in every other. Next day he made a second codicil, by which he gave some pecuniary and specific legacies, and concluded thus: "All the rest and residue of my property, not herein before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew, C. P. Y. and to Sir C. E. D., their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them."

Held (the Lord Chancellor dissentiente), that the above clause of the second codicil was a revocation of the gift, by the will, of the residue to Sir C. E. D., and that he was accordingly only entitled to an equal share thereof with C. P. Y. — Earl of Hardwicke v. Douglas, 795.
